Rice v. ReliaStar Life Ins. Co., 770 F.3d 1122, 1131-33 (5th Cir. 2014) ("This is not the first time we have encountered a tragic factual scenario like the one present here: a police officer, in an attempt to aid a potentially suicidal individual, entered without a warrant and killed the person the officer was trying to help. . . In these cases, we have resolved the case on the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, holding that the officer was entitled to qualified immunity because, at the time of the incident, the law was not clearly established that it was unreasonable for an officer to enter without a warrant to address the threat an individual posed to himself. . . Having only held that the law was not clearly established, our Court has not yet resolved the constitutional question these cases present: whether the exigent circumstances exception to the warrant requirement may allow for a warrantless entry based on the threat an individual poses to himself. Today we reach that issue and hold that the threat an individual poses to himself may create an exigency that makes the needs of law enforcement so compelling that a warrantless entry is objectively reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . . Our decision is consistent with the decisions of our sister circuits. [collecting cases] Turning to the facts of this case, we hold that Arnold did not violate Rice's Fourth Amendment rights when he entered Rice's home without a warrant because he had an objectively reasonable belief that Rice would imminently seriously injure himself. After Craig's 911 call, Arnold knew the following: Rice was suicidal; Rice had a gun; and Rice had been drinking and was sitting in his truck holding a gun to his head. Based on these facts, it was objectively reasonable for Arnold to believe he needed to protect Rice from imminent injury. . . .Finally, the fact that Arnold's entry into Rice's home may have violated departmental policies does not deprive him of qualified immunity. Admittedly, the fact that Arnold allegedly failed to follow departmental policy makes his actions more questionable, because it is questionable whether it is objectively reasonable to violate such a departmental rule. . . .Violating a departmental regulation, on its own, is not sufficient to deprive Arnold of qualified immunity. . . .Thus, we hold the district court did not err in granting Arnold's motion for summary judgment on the warrantless entry claim because Arnold is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Velasquez v. Audirsch, 574 F.3d 476, 480-83 & n.3 (5th Cir. 2014) ("The district court's analysis was arguably correct in evaluating the merits of the Velasquezes' underlying constitutional claim . . . . We express no opinion on the first step, whether the plaintiff has shown a violation of a constitutional right. . . . [H]owever, this analysis misconstrues qualified immunity doctrine. As discussed above, the ultimate question is not whether the Officers' actions were reasonable under the Fourth Amendment; the question is whether the law at the time of the Officers' entry into the Velasquezes' home clearly established that their actions were unreasonable. The Supreme Court's decision in Ryburn v. Huff, 132 S.Ct. 987 (2012) (per curiam) leads us to the inescapable conclusion that the law was not clearly established in the circumstances here. . . .Applying the Court's guidance from Ryburn to the facts here, the law at the time of the Officers' entry into the Velasquezes' home did not clearly establish that the officers were unreasonable in believing the threat Efrain posed to himself or others constituted exigent circumstances. . . . The Velasquezes do not direct this Court to precedent clearly establishing the Officers' conduct here was unlawful, and we are aware of none. The Velasquezes do not respond to Ryburn or even cite it. Thus, accepting the Velasquezes' version of all disputed facts, 'reasonable police officers in [the Officers'] position could have come to the conclusion that the Fourth Amendment permitted them to enter the [house based on the] objectively reasonable basis for fearing that violence was imminent.'. . Therefore, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity.") Doe v. Robertson, 751 F.3d 383, 388-92 & n.14 (5th Cir. 2014) ("We conclude that the Complaint contains well-pleaded factual allegations that Robertson and Rosado had actual knowledge both of the Service Agreement violations and of the violated provision's objective of preventing sexual assault. . . . Stated simply, the Complaint alleged that Robertson and Rosado were aware both of violations of the Service Agreement provision requiring at least one transport officer to be the same gender as that of transported detainees, and of the provision's assault-preventing rationale. . . . Plaintiffs did allege that Robertson and Rosado had actual, subjective knowledge of the Service Agreement violations. . . And as already explained, this allegation is not a mere 'naked assertio [n]'; it is supported—though not proven—by the additional factual allegations recounted above. . . .We accordingly conclude that Plaintiffs properly alleged that Robertson and Rosado had actual knowledge both of the violations of the Service Agreement provision and of that provision's assault-preventing objective. . . .Accepting the truth of the facts as alleged, we next consider whether these facts are sufficient to nudge the Bivens claim across the 'plausibility' threshold. . . That is, we must decide whether Robertson and Rosado's knowledge of violations of the Service Agreement provision prohibiting a lone male officer from transporting female detainees, where they also knew the provision aimed to prevent sexual assault, . . . make plausible Plaintiffs' claim that Robertson and Rosado were deliberately indifferent to a substantial risk of serious harm, in violation of 'clearly established' law. . . Even presuming the truth of their factual allegations, we conclude that Plaintiffs' claim is not plausible because no clearly established law provides that violations of contractual terms that aim to prevent sexual assault are 'facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists.'. . .Here, even if Robertson and Rosado knew of the Service Agreement violations, no clearly established law demonstrates that these contractual violations are sufficiently proximate to a substantial risk of serious harm. . . . Although Robertson and Rosado were allegedly aware of ICE's past struggles with sexual assault in general, the Complaint fails to allege any 'longstanding, pervasive, well-documented, or expressly noted' risk of assaults either at Hutto or during detainee transports. . . Here, we simply cannot equate knowledge of the Service Agreement violations with the violation of a 'clearly established' constitutional right. . . .Accepting the truth of Plaintiffs' factual allegations, we hold that no clearly established law provides that an official's knowledge of contractual breaches and of the breached provision's aim to prevent sexual assault of detainees, standing alone, amounts to deliberate indifference in violation of a detainee's Fifth Amendment rights, because no controlling authority provides that such breaches are 'facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm exists.'. . Accordingly, because the Complaint did not plausibly allege the violation of a 'clearly established' constitutional right, Robertson and Rosado are entitled to qualified immunity . . . and the district court erred in denying their motion to dismiss. .

. . We hold only that it is not clearly established that Farmer extends to the facts alleged here, and do not decide whether this case presents any constitutional violation.")

Stauffer v. Gearhart, 741 F.3d 574, 584, 586, 587 (5th Cir. 2014) ("We need not decide whether Stauffer's rights were actually violated, because even if they were, Stauffer has not proven that those rights were clearly established at the time of the alleged violations. . . .Even assuming the applicability of Mann and Green, Stauffer has not shown that the contours of his right to receive the magazines was 'sufficiently clear' that every 'reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . . In sum, Stauffer did not have a clearly established right to receive the magazines at the time that they were confiscated. He has not pointed to any case law indicating that Defendants should have reasonably known that he had a right to the magazines. His claim for damages therefore fails.")

Whitley v. Hanna, 726 F.3d 631, 649, 653-55 (5th Cir. 2013) (Elrod, J., concurring only in the judgment) ("I write separately to address Whitley's § 1983 deliberate-indifference claim against Ranger Hanna. Taking Whitley's allegations as true, Hanna made a conscious decision to allow a fifty-five-year-old law enforcement official to engage in predictable, preventable, and yet repeated sexual assaults on a fifteen-year-old participant in a law-enforcement-learning program. Thus, at this early stage of the case, I would hold that Whitley states a plausible § 1983 claim. I concur in the judgment, however, because Whitley cannot overcome Hanna's assertion of qualified immunity. . . . The implicit message in the majority opinion's deliberate-indifference analysis is that an officer can escape § 1983 liability for a conscious endangerment of a victim's constitutional rights, provided that he acted with good intentions. . . . No matter how well-intended, investigatory and prosecutorial strategies must yield to the inviolable constitutional rights of those involved (typically the defendant, but here the victim). . . .In short, while Hanna may have preferred perfect proof of Ariaz's sexual abuse, video or eyewitness evidence was by no means a mandatory prerequisite to Whitley's rescue. I would hold at this preliminary stage that Hanna's alleged deliberate choice to prioritize Ariaz's eventual prosecution over Whitley's immediate safety plausibly constitutes deliberate indifference to a known risk of constitutional violations. . . . I would hold that Hanna lacked fair notice that his conduct would amount to a constitutional violation. . . Although there is no debate that a child has an inviolable right to bodily integrity, . . .our case law regarding an individual's obligation to intervene in incidents of child sexual abuse arises almost exclusively in the context of school officials. . . The other analogous body of law arises in bystander-liability cases, in which we require both actual presence at and acquiescence in the underlying constitutional violation. . . There simply is not enough controlling or persuasive authority to conclude that every reasonable official in Hanna's position would understand that what he was doing violated the law. For that reason, Hanna is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .This case is about a state actor's knowing, deliberate choice not to intervene despite a substantial risk of continued statutory rape by a public official, in hopes of obtaining direct evidence for a conviction. While the underlying law-enforcement goal may be laudable, it must bend where a constitutional right is in play. Therefore, I would hold that Whitley states a plausible deliberate-indifference claim under § 1983. Nevertheless, I concur in the judgment because Hanna is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Carty v. Rodriguez, No. 11–40253, 2012 WL 851622, at *2-*4 (5th Cir. Mar. 14, 2012) (not reported) ("Recent decisions suggest that the Supreme Court continues in its retreat from the old Saucier two-step analysis. In Camreta v. Greene, . . . using stronger language than before, the Court clarified that lower courts 'should address only the immunity question' in the circumstances outlined in Pearson. The Camreta Court further cautioned that lower courts should 'think hard, and then think hard again' before unnecessarily deciding the merits of a constitutional issue, and thus risk 'turning small cases into large ones.'. . Then, only days later, in Ashcroft v. al-Kidd,. . . the Court cautioned that we should 'think carefully before expending "scarce judicial resources" to resolve difficult and novel questions of constitutional or statutory interpretation that will "have no effect on the outcome of the case."'. . On appeal, Defendants contend that Plaintiff failed to show (1) a violation of a constitutional right and (2) that the alleged constitutional right was clearly established at the time of the incident. We address the second question first. . . The district court found that a constitutional right was clearly established at the time of the Defendants' alleged misconduct, generally relying on a clearly established constitutional right to bodily integrity and life recognized in cases involving the sexual abuse of children. To support her position that Defendants' deliberately indifferent conduct caused Carty's death and thus violated his substantive due process right to bodily integrity and life, Plaintiff relies principally on Fifth Circuit decisions recognizing a student's right to be free from physical abuse by school employees. . . The court has grounded this right in the student's substantive due process right to bodily integrity. . . Under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, it cannot be said that this line of authority provides clearly established law for Plaintiff's position. These cases are not 'sufficiently similar' to the facts here [My note: plaintiff's husband died as result of injury sustained during training exercise at academy for state police] to have given the Defendants 'fair warning' that their conduct violated constitutional rights. . . That these cases typically involved sexual abuse, and an adult intentionally taking advantage of a child under his or her care, sufficiently demonstrates their inadequacy for giving 'reasonable warning' to the Defendants in this case. . . Plaintiff fails to persuade us that Defendants violated a clearly established right.")

Sama v. Hannigan, 669 F.3d 585, 592, 594, 595 (5th Cir. 2012) ("Exercising our discretion under Pearson v. Callahan, we may analyze and resolve this issue under the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity test. Because Sama did not meet her burden of demonstrating Benoit's and Hannigan's conduct was not objectively reasonable in light of clearly established law, the district court did not err in dismissing the case. Raising a fact issue as to whether she consented to removal of her ovary did not suffice to meet her burden regarding clearly established law. . . .In light of all of these circumstances, we cannot say that the law is, or was at the time of the defendants' conduct, clearly established such that a reasonable official in Benoit's and Hannigan's position would understand that their conduct violated Sama's Fourteenth Amendment due process rights. Sama had the burden to negate qualified immunity. Accepting her assertions as true, and considering the other undisputed facts in the record before us, Sama has not cited, and we have not located, a Supreme Court or circuit court decision holding that a violation occurred under similar circumstances, in which an inmate had consented to at least part of the treatment provided, the additional treatment was deemed medically necessary as well as necessary to complete the consented-to procedure that was underway, and the attending physicians determined that it would be potentially life-threatening to end the surgery without removing the ovary and completing the radical hysterectomy. The few circuit and district court cases involving somewhat similar factual situations provide support for the position that an inmate's liberty interest in such circumstances is outweighed by the state's interests and that a reasonable person in the defendants' position could not have believed his actions violated the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . We are not presented with a proceeding in which Sama is seeking to prevent the State from going forward with treatment against her will. We are looking in hindsight at physicians' actions to determine if the law was so clearly established in this area that it 'compel[s] ... the conclusion for every like-situated, reasonable government agent that what [the] defendant [was] doing violate[d] federal law in the circumstances.' This is a question of law and one which this court routinely answers in qualified immunity cases, even if the district court did not reach it. It was Sama's burden to negate the applicability of qualified immunity. She did not satisfy that burden. . . .In sum, the law governing Fourteenth Amendment claims involving unwanted medical treatment in the prison context is far from certain. Given the dearth of case law and the existence of at least some case law supporting the position that Hannigan's and Benoit's conduct was not contrary to clearly established law, Sama has failed to rebut the defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity on her Fourteenth Amendment claim, and summary judgment was appropriate." footnotes omitted)

Morgan v. Swanson, 659 F.3d 359, 371, 382-90 (5th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (opinion of Benevides, J., holding for majority that "the principals are entitled to qualified immunity because clearly established law did not put the constitutionality of their actions beyond debate. . . . The principals are entitled to immunity because the general state of the law in this area is abstruse, complicated, and subject to great debate among jurists. At the time of the incidents in question, neither a single 'controlling authority' nor a 'robust consensus of persuasive authority' had held that the First Amendment prohibits school principals from restricting the distribution of written religious materials in public elementary schools. Nor had a single federal court of appeals definitively held that Tinker-based speech rights inhere in public elementary schools, let alone defined the scope of those rights with a high degree of particularity. The generalized prohibition against viewpoint discrimination is far too abstract to clearly establish the law in this case, and the circuits are divided over its application in public elementary schools. The speech rights asserted in this case cannot be said to be 'clearly established' when balanced against competing Establishment Clause concerns that inhere in public elementary schools. . . .The defendants in this case are entitled to qualified immunity because existing precedent failed to place the constitutionality of their conduct 'beyond debate.' Like other educators to have contended with religious speech in public schools, Swanson and Bomchill had to make on-the-ground decisions balancing constitutional imperatives from three areas of First Amendment jurisprudence: the Supreme Court's school-speech precedents, the general prohibition on viewpoint discrimination, and the murky waters of the Establishment Clause. The law tasked them with maintaining the most delicate of constitutional balances:

between students' free-speech rights and the Establishment Clause imperative to avoid endorsing religion. But it failed to provide any real, specific guidance on how to do so. Moreover, almost all of the federal courts of appeals to have to considered speech restrictions in this area have found no constitutional violation in the first instance, including one case with facts nearly identical to those now before us. And no federal court of appeals has ever denied qualified immunity to an educator in this area. We decline the plaintiffs' request to become the first." [footnotes omitted])

Morgan v. Swanson, 659 F.3d 359, 396, 401-09 (5th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (opinion of Elrod, J., holding for the majority on prong one of the qualified immunity analysis that "this right–to engage in private, non-disruptive, student speech–is protected from viewpoint discrimination under the First Amendment, and that the right extends to elementary-school students. . . . Under Pearson v. Callahan, courts have discretion to decide which of the two prongs of qualified immunity to tackle first. . . Although courts should 'think hard' before exercising this discretion, 'it remains true that following the two-step sequence–defining constitutional rights and only then conferring immunity–is sometimes beneficial to clarify the legal standards governing public officials.'. . Here, the students argue that the principals violated their First Amendment rights by discriminating against their speech because of its religious viewpoint. Based on the facts alleged, we agree. . . . In short, whatever latitude school officials may have with respect to school-sponsored speech under Hazelwood, or with government-endorsed speech under the Establishment Clause–that is, speech that could be erroneously attributed to the school–outside of that narrow context, viewpoint discrimination against private, student-to-student, non-disruptive speech is forbidden by the First Amendment.")

Morgan v. Swanson, 659 F.3d 359, 413, 414 (5th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (opinion of Eldrod, J., concluding for minority that "the principals had fair, unmistakable warning that private, non-disruptive student speech is protected from viewpoint discrimination, and that any attempts to censor student speech should be undertaken only on the firmest of grounds. Even if the Supreme Court's unbroken line of decisions were somehow not enough to give school districts fair warning that the First Amendment prohibits viewpoint discrimination against non-disruptive, private student speech, moreover, the Department of Education (DOE) has made clear to schools that viewpoint discrimination against religious speech in schools is prohibited. In sum, the Supreme Court, the Fifth Circuit, and the United States government all provided fair warning to the principals that elementary school students have a right to be free from viewpoint discrimination. That school officials nonetheless discriminated based on viewpoint under the facts alleged is not a failure of our precedent or that of the Supreme Court, but rather of the officials themselves.")

Kovacic v. Villarreal, 628 F.3d 209, 213-15 (5th Cir. 2010) ("In light of the Supreme Court's decision in Pearson v. Callahan, we are permitted to consider the question of whether a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity without determining whether or not the plaintiff's constitutional rights were violated. . . .The plaintiffs argue that a 'special relationship' existed between Kovacic and the defendant officers because he had been in their custody at one point in time and thus the officers should be liable for the private violence perpetrated against him by the hit-and-run driver.

Plaintiffs have not referenced a single case in either the district courts or the court of appeals of this circuit in which state actors were held liable for private harm caused to an individual after he was released from custody. . . . As stated above, once a defendant invokes qualified immunity, the burden shifts to the plaintiff to show that the defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity. The plaintiffs in this case have not presented any evidence to contradict Rubio's and Villarreal's affidavits that Kovacic demanded to be let out of the squad car in the Speedy Stop parking lot and thus was released from their custody at his request. There is also no evidence in the record that shows that the officers had any reason to think that Kovacic likely would not call his wife to pick him up as he indicated, or that the officers were aware that Kovacic was lacking the resources to secure another way home. . . . A number of courts have interpreted DeShaney to allow a second exception to the rule against state liability for violence committed by private actors in situations where 'the state actor played an affirmative role in creating or exacerbating a dangerous situation that led to the individual's injury.'. . The Fifth Circuit has not adopted the 'state-created danger' theory of liability. . . . Given the lack of any contrary precedent, we hold that reasonable, competent officers would not conclude that it would violate Kovacic's constitutional rights to honor his request that he be let out at the Speedy Stop. No such constitutional law was then, or is now, clearly established. The defendant officers are entitled to qualified immunity, and the district court's denial of their motion for summary judgment is reversed.")

Morgan v. Hubert, 335 F. App'x 466, 2009 WL 1884605, at *4 (5th Cir. July 1, 2009) ("Federal courts now have the discretion to sidestep the preliminary inquiry-whether plaintiff has sufficiently alleged the violation of a constitutional right-and proceed directly to consider the right's clarity. . . In the context of the Eighth Amendment issue presented here, the order is of less importance because the obligation of prison officials to protect prisoners from violence at the hand of other inmates is clear. . .Thus, we will proceed directly to consider whether Morgan has alleged a substantial risk of serious harm of which Hubert was deliberately indifferent. If he has, then he has alleged the violation of a clear constitutional right.") [See also Morgan v. Hubert, 459 F. App'x 321 (5th Cir. 2012) (holding that because warden was not deliberately indifferent, warden was entitled to qualified immunity with respect to inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim.]

Pasco ex rel. Pasco v. Knoblauch, 566 F.3d 572, 579 (5th Cir. 2009) ("Until recently, we resolved government officials' qualified immunity claims under the strict two-part test mandated by the Supreme Court in Saucier v. Katz, deciding (1) whether facts alleged or shown by plaintiff make out the violation of a constitutional right, and (2) if so, whether that right was clearly established at the time of the defendant's alleged misconduct. . .However, the Supreme Court has revisited this rule and determined that the rigid two-step structure is no longer mandatory. . . Accordingly, as the Court did in Pearson, we will first consider whether the officer's conduct violated clearly established law. . . If we determine that the answer is no, qualified immunity will shield Knoblauch from suit.").

Ontiveros v. City of Rosenberg, Tex., 564 F.3d 379, 382, 385 (5th Cir. 2009) ("For several years, the Supreme Court required that the first of these criteria–whether plaintiffs' facts allege a constitutional violation–must be decided at the outset. . .Recently, however, the Court reversed course, holding that 'courts of appeals should be permitted to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.'. . The district court's decision, rendered before Pearson, principally addressed the merits question whether Lt. Logan's use of deadly force was unconstitutional. We see no reason, post-Pearson, to alter that approach here. . . .[W]e agree with the district court that 'an officer could have reasonably believed that Ontiveros posed a threat of serious physical harm to himself or other officers' and that Lt. Logan's actions were reasonable under the circumstances as he described them. Because we hold that Lt. Logan did not violate Ontiveros's constitutional rights, we need not determine whether Lt. Logan would have had qualified immunity or whether the City of Rosenberg would have been liable had Lt. Logan's use of force violated the Fourth Amendment.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Brennan v. Dawson, No. 17-2210, 2018 WL 4961332, at *4-5, *7-8 & n.4 (6th Cir. Oct. 15, 2018) (not reported) ("We recently held in Morgan v. Fairfield County that the area five to seven feet from the home was part of the home's curtilage. . . The dashcam video from Dawson's police cruiser shows that he was within an arm's length from the home when he set out from the porch and began to walk the perimeter. And he remained within the curtilage as he continued around the home's perimeter, knocking on and peering into windows. Although the Fourth Amendment protects the curtilage, a police officer has an implied license to enter the curtilage and attempt to speak with the home's occupant, even if the officer lacks a search warrant. . . And until recently, this Court, along with the Third, Fourth, and Eighth Circuits, also recognized special circumstances under which a police officer may travel to the rear of the home without a warrant during a 'knock and talk' investigation. . . In Hardesty, we explained that when 'circumstances indicate that someone is home' and an officer's knocking at the front door goes unanswered, 'an officer may take reasonable steps to speak with the person being sought out even where such steps require an intrusion into the curtilage.'. . We held that an officer may travel to the rear of the home when he has reason to believe that the occupant is inside but does not answer the front door. . . Hardesty, however, set no specific limitation on how long officers could continue to search for an occupant who they suspected was inside but was not answering the door. . . .This Court recently considered the viability of Hardesty and a related decision, Turk v. Comerford, 488 F. App'x 933 (6th Cir. 2012), and concluded that Jardines and Collins v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 1663 (2018), overruled both decisions. . . Morgan, 903 F.3d at 565. ("[I]n light of recent Supreme Court decisions, neither Hardesty nor Turk remains good law"). Thus, law enforcement officials cannot linger on the curtilage once they have exhausted the 'implied invitation extended to all guests,' even if they suspect that someone is inside. . . Here, even if Hardesty were still good law, Dawson arguably violated the Constitution. . . But regardless, that conclusion is now clear in light of Morgan. To be sure, Dawson's initial approach to the home and knocking on the front door to administer the breath test fell squarely under his implied license as established in Jardines. But Dawson overextended his stay. . . . A police officer simply cannot linger and continue to search the curtilage of the home if his knocking at the front door goes unanswered. . . Those actions are inconsistent with the limits of the implied license recognized in Jardines. As a result, we hold that Dawson exceeded his implied license when he repeatedly entered and traveled through Brennan's curtilage over the course of ninety minutes and thus violated Brennan's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Brennan argues that Jardines clearly establishes that Dawson could not linger on the curtilage for more than ninety minutes after no one inside the home answered the door. True, recent developments in our case law—including our decision to overturn Hardesty and Turk because of Jardines—leave no room for doubt that Dawson violated Brennan's constitutional rights. But the law was not so clear on February 21, 2015, which is the reference point we must use to determine whether Dawson is entitled to qualified immunity. To be sure, this is a close question. As discussed above, the court's decision in Nyilas, which found conduct like Dawson's unconstitutional, determined that the law was not clearly established largely because the Supreme Court did not decide Jardines before the conduct in that case. . . But the Court decided Jardines before Dawson's conduct, so that impediment to Brennan's recovery does not exist here. That said, we still hold that the law was not clearly established. When this Court affirmed the trial court's decision in Nyilas, we offered no view on the constitutionality of the conduct or the continuing viability of Hardesty and Turk. Instead, we held that the officers 'did not violate clearly established rules of constitutional law in these circumstances.'. . Thus, as of the time of the actions here, we cannot conclude that Dawson's conduct was clearly prohibited. . . .Because we continued to treat Hardesty as good law when the violation occurred, it was not clearly established that Jardines governed situations in which a police officer had reason to believe that someone was inside the home. . . .Thus, we hold that the law governing the scope of Dawson's implied license was not clearly established at the time of the violation and affirm the district court's decision to grant Dawson qualified immunity on Brennan's unlawful search claim. . . .The dissent takes issue with our conclusion regarding whether the law was clearly established at the time of the incident. To be sure, the dissent makes some good points and we agree with many of them. Our conclusion, however, is compelled by the standard for determining whether a legal principle is clearly established as set forth in Wesby. Here, the constitutionality of the officer's conduct was not 'beyond debate.'").

Brennan v. Dawson, No. 17-2210, 2018 WL 4961332, at *10-12 (6th Cir. Oct. 15, 2018) (Moore, J., dissenting) (not reported) ("The majority today determines that although Brennan's constitutional rights under the Fourth Amendment were violated, Officer Dawson is entitled to qualified immunity because Brennan's specific right to be free from a prolonged intrusion into his curtilage was not clearly established in February 2015. Although I emphatically concur that Brennan's Fourth Amendment rights were violated when Dawson walked into and around Brennan's curtilage for over an hour in an attempt to give him a breathalyzer test, I dissent from the majority's affirmance because I believe Brennan's constitutional rights were clearly established at the time of Dawson's conduct. The majority poses the question at issue in this case as 'whether it was clearly established that a police officer could not repeatedly enter and pass through the curtilage of the home when: (1) the officer had reasonable grounds to believe that someone was inside of the home; and (2) the officer was trying to conduct a probation check.'. .

However, in answering this inquiry, the majority primarily relies on Hardesty v. Hamburg Twp., 461 F.3d 646 (6th Cir. 2006), and Turk v. Comerford, 488 F. App'x 933 (6th Cir. 2012), cases that the majority agrees did not consider the central question at issue here: the ability of an officer to linger in the curtilage of an individual's home while conducting a knock and talk. . . Rather than address Dawson's conduct specifically, these cases merely held that, when an officer has a reasonable belief that a suspect is at home and has not answered the door, the officer is permitted to 'take reasonable steps to speak with the person being sought out even where such steps require an intrusion into the curtilage,' including walking to the back door. . . . Neither Hardesty nor Turk suggests that an officer can linger in a suspect's curtilage for over an hour when investigating a suspect who the officer has reason to believe is home. At most, Hardesty and Turk put officers on notice that they are permitted to take 'reasonable steps' to talk with the individual in the house. . . Under this correctly limited view of Hardesty and Turk, it is clear that the Supreme Court's decision in Florida v. Jardines (decided in 2013) prohibited Dawson's conduct in February 2015. . . Specifically, Jardines necessarily limited the temporal parameters of the 'reasonable steps' discussed in Hardesty and Turk. . . . [E]ven if Dawson understood that, under Hardesty and Turk, he was permitted to go to the back of Brennan's home, he was still allowed to take only the 'reasonable steps' necessary to confront Brennan, namely knocking, briefly waiting, and then leaving. Stated differently, just because our Circuit may not have explicitly stated until 2018 that the primary holding in Hardesty and Turk (if an officer has a reasonable belief that a suspect is at home and is refusing to answer the door, the officer is permitted to enter the curtilage and knock on the back door) could not survive Jardines or Collins v. Virginia, 138 S. Ct. 1663 (2018), does not mean that the validity of the secondary holding (officers may take only "reasonable steps") was similarly reliant on our decision in Morgan. . . . I conclude that in February 2015 the law was clearly established that, even if an officer was arguably permitted to walk to the back of a suspect's house to knock on their door, this authority was temporally limited by Jardines to a reasonably brief period and certainly could not be extended to over ninety minutes. Put simply, no reasonable officer could have concluded that, following the Supreme Court's decision in 2013 in Jardines, Dawson engaged in actions that 'any private citizen might do' while conducting a knock and talk for a probationer. . . Consequently, Dawson is not entitled to qualified immunity, and I respectfully dissent.")

Morgan v. Fairfield County, Ohio, 903 F.3d 553, 560-65 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Government officials sued in their individual capacities for constitutional violations are free from liability for civil damages unless (1) they violate a constitutional right that (2) was clearly established at the time that it was violated. . . Courts can address these two elements in any order. . . And although this decision turns on the second element—whether the law was clearly established—we have the ability, if not the responsibility, to clarify the state of the law in this circuit so that government agents can understand the limits of their power and that citizens will be protected when those limits are transgressed. For that reason, we address both parts of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . . Because the area surrounding Morgan's and Graf's house was curtilage, and curtilage is treated as part of the home for Fourth Amendment purposes, the officers' entry onto the curtilage could be justified only by a warrant or one of the recognized exceptions to the warrant requirement. It is undisputed that the SCRAP unit had no warrant. As for exceptions to the warrant requirement, the county argues that the entry was justified for three reasons. None, however, is convincing. . . .The SCRAP unit was concerned about general drug activity at Morgan's and Graf's house. But the Fourth Amendment prohibited them from entering the property: they had no warrant, no exigent circumstances, and no other exception to the warrant requirement. A "knock and talk" by police was permitted 'precisely because that is "no more than any private citizen might do."'. . Thus, the officers' right to enter the property like any other visitor comes with the same limits of that 'traditional invitation': 'typically ... approach the home by the front path, knock promptly, wait briefly to be received, and then (absent invitation to linger longer) leave.'. . Certainly, '[a] visitor cannot traipse through the garden, meander into the backyard, or take other circuitous detours that veer from the pathway that a visitor would customarily use.'. . Neither can the police. By doing so here, the SCRAP unit violated Morgan's and Graf's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . In determining the contours of the right, there is a tension between defining the right at too high a level of generality, on one hand, and too granular a level, on the other. There does not need to be 'a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . . In all, the most important question in the inquiry is whether a reasonable government officer would have 'fair warning' that the challenged conduct was illegal. . . For centuries, the common law has protected the curtilage of the house. . . And the Supreme Court long has held that the curtilage is 'considered part of the home itself for Fourth Amendment purposes.'. . That means that the police can enter the curtilage on the same terms that they can enter the rest of the home—no more, no less. . . Under those long-settled principles, warrantless searches 'are per se unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment—subject only to a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions.'. . A reasonable officer thus would understand that without a warrant or an exception to the warrant requirement, entering the curtilage violates a clearly established right. Despite these long-settled standards, one case from this circuit, although incorrectly decided, requires that we grant qualified immunity. That case, Turk v. Comerford, decided within a month of the "knock and talk" in this case, found that the law was not clearly settled against a factual background that was, in every material way, the same as here. . . Central to Turk's analysis was our published decision in Hardesty, in which we held that '[if] knocking at the front door is unsuccessful in spite of indications that someone is in or around the house, an officer may take reasonable steps to speak with the person being sought out even where such steps require an intrusion into the curtilage.'. . Hardesty's extension of the knock-and-talk doctrine was, by its terms, limited to particular circumstances. . . And if our case law ended there, qualified immunity here would be improper. But in Turk, this court read Hardesty more broadly and reasoned that because some limited intrusions of the curtilage were allowed, it was not clearly established that surrounding a house for a "knock and talk" was in the category of unacceptable intrusions. . . Although Hardesty and Turk are outliers, Morgan and Graf cannot overcome their burden of showing that the law was clearly established at the time of the search in this case. In those two cases, this court should have reaffirmed long-settled Fourth Amendment principles. . . But it did not. And although unpublished cases do not upset the state of the law, in rare instances they can show that members of this court, during the same time period, facing the exact same question, did not think the law to be clearly established. And '[i]f judges ... disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.'. . For that reason we affirm the district court's grant of qualified immunity to the officers in their individual capacities. Nevertheless, in light of recent Supreme Court decisions, neither Hardesty nor Turk remains good law. . . Jardines and, more recently, Collins made clear that, outside of the same implied invitation extended to all guests, if the government wants to enter one's curtilage it needs to secure a warrant or to satisfy one of the exceptions to the warrant requirement. . . Our acknowledgment that those cases are no longer good law does not affect the qualified-immunity analysis here, which looks to the law at the time of the challenged action. . . But it does put officers on notice that principles of Jardines and Collins—and not Hardesty or Turk—should guide their actions going forward.")

Carter v. Carter, 728 F. App'x 419, 423 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Carter argues that the force employed by the officer was per se excessive because the earlier strikes had incapacitated him such that he was, at most, passively resisting. . . Our precedents do suggest that officers cannot continue using force against an arrestee who has stopped resisting. . . . But the fact remains that the officers had the lawful authority to arrest Carter, and it is undisputed that his 'balling up' left the officers unable to place him in handcuffs because they did not have access to his hands. . . . That means that some amount of force was necessary to secure Carter's arrest, and the officer's decision to apply three to four modest punches, rather than, for instance, rolling him over or pulling his arms out from under him, was not constitutionally infirm. . . In other words, that the officers' use of force may not have been the only—let alone the best—method to secure Carter's arrest does not make it a constitutionally impermissible method of so doing. . . . Here the governmental interest in securing Carter's arrest outweighs Carter's interest in being free from a few modest strikes. Thus, even though we assume that Carter was merely passively resisting, the officer's use of force was still an objectively reasonable way to arrest him.")

Stanfield v. City of Lima, 727 F. App'x 841, 850-51 (6th Cir. 2018) ("Stanfield has cited no case that 'clearly establishes' that it is a violation of the law for an officer to 'take down' a suspect who is resisting arrest. Therefore, despite the fact that Montgomery violated Stanfield's constitutional rights, he is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim because Stanfield has not demonstrated that it was 'clearly established' that such conduct was in violation of the law. . . .Garman fractured Stanfield's rib in an attempt to secure his hands, even as Montgomery was on top of Stanfield's back and Stanfield was saying that he was incapable of removing his arms from under himself. Of the cases Stanfield cited to demonstrate that the unlawfulness of this conduct was 'clearly established,' the most analogous is Lawler. . . . However, Lawler is readily distinguishable from the instant case because its reasoning was premised on the fact that the force took place 'in a booking room—beyond the point at which any threat could have been reasonably perceived.' . . As such, a reasonable officer would not be on notice that the reasoning in Lawler applied to situations outside of a booking room or in a context in which 'any threat could have been reasonably perceived.' Therefore, despite the fact that Garman violated Stanfield's constitutional rights, he is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim. . . .Rode struck Stanfield in the leg twice with his flashlight in an attempt to coerce Stanfield into giving Montgomery and Garman his hands. Of the cases Stanfield cited to demonstrate that the unlawfulness of this conduct was 'clearly established,' the most analogous is Harris v. City of Circleville, 583 F.3d 356 (6th Cir. 2009). . . .The important distinction here is the fact that the plaintiff in Harris was clearly subdued when the second officer administered the peroneal strikes. In the instant case, from the perspective of Rode, there was still a struggle taking place between the other two officers and Stanfield. As such, a reasonable officer would not be on notice that the reasoning in Harris applied to situations where a suspect was not subdued, or at least in handcuffs, like the plaintiff in Harris. Therefore, despite the fact that Rode violated Stanfield's constitutional rights, he is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim.")

Stanfield v. City of Lima, 727 F. App'x 841, 852 (6th Cir. 2018) (Kethledge, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("For substantially the reasons stated by the majority, I agree that the officers here did not violate Stanfield's clearly established rights. But I would also hold that they did not violate Stanfield's rights at all. The officers received a report that Stanfield was driving an RV around the city while intoxicated. They approached Stanfield in an unlit vacant lot, late at night. Stanfield was in fact obviously drunk and kept putting his hand in his jeans pocket, despite the officers' repeated demands that he not do that. Finally they told him they were going to pat him down. At that point—as the cruiser's dash-cam video makes clear—Stanfield resisted the pat-down search and then forcibly resisted the officers' attempts to handcuff him. In my view that resistance continued well past the point that the majority thinks it stopped, since for another 20 seconds the video shows Stanfield rolling around on the ground and trying to keep the officers from controlling his arms. And it was only after the fourth or fifth time that the officers told Stanfield to "put your hands behind your back," that he responded, "I can't." Under these circumstances, the officers' force—a knee to the ribs and a flashlight strike on his calf—was as calibrated as it needed to be. See, e.g., Rudlaff v. Gillispie, 791 F.3d 638, 641 (6th Cir. 2015).")

Thornton v. City of Columbus, 727 F. App'x 829, 836-38 (6th Cir. 2018) ("In this circuit, the court 'consider[s] the officer's reasonableness under the circumstances he faced at the time he decided to use force.'. . Accordingly, '[w]e do not scrutinize whether it was reasonable for the officer to create the circumstances.'. . '[A] different Fourth Amendment violation cannot transform a later, reasonable use of force into an unreasonable seizure.'. .Lastly, in the use-of-force context, 'once the relevant set of facts is determined and all reasonable inferences are drawn in favor of the plaintiffs, to the extent supported by the record, the question of whether the [officers'] actions were objectively unreasonable is "a pure question of law."'. . But 'if there is some evidence – more than a mere scintilla of evidence – that [the appellant], through his conduct, judged from the perspective of reasonable officers on the scene, did not give the officers probable cause to believe that he posed a serious threat of harm, a genuine fact dispute is created.'. . Analyzing the use of force from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, we hold that the use of deadly force by the Officers in this instance was justified even though there are issues of fact concerning (1) whether Thornton saw or heard the Officers, (2) whether Thornton had time to comply with the Officer's orders, and (3) whether Thomson was actually facing or walking towards the Officers.

This is so, because what is undisputed is that the Officers responded to a report of a man threatening others with a gun while standing on a front porch of a residence. Further, as the Officers exited their police cruiser, several individuals informed the officers that Thornton had run inside the residence while possessing a firearm. After moving to the porch, the Officers witnessed Thornton emerge from the back of the house with a shotgun, in addition to seeing an armchair in the living room with an assault rifle resting on it. Moreover, there is no dispute that the Officers could have reasonably believed that the man with the shotgun was the same man who had, only moments earlier, threatened another person with a gun. Officers repeatedly ordered Thornton to drop the shotgun but Thornton failed to comply with the Officers' orders, and whether Thornton actually heard the commands has no bearing on this court's analysis. . . And though Thornton never pointed the shotgun at the Officers before they fired their weapons, the undisputed manner in which Thornton was holding the weapon combined with the short distance between himself and the Officers further leads this court to conclude that any reasonable police officer would believe that Thornton posed a serious physical threat that required a use of deadly force. Additionally, because the deadly threat posed by Thornton could have easily and quickly transformed into deadly action in a split-second, any reasonable police officer in the Officer's position would know that a decision to use deadly force would need to be rendered quickly. The Officers . . . did not have to wait for Thornton to raise his weapon before employing deadly force. . . Relatedly, this court has recently rejected a 'categorical rule that force can only be reasonable if a suspect raises his gun.'. . Accordingly, for the aforementioned reasons, the Officers did not violate Thornton's constitutional rights by utilizing force on him on April 21, 2013. Therefore, the district court properly granted summary judgment in favor of the Officers on Thornton's excessive force claim because the Officers were entitled to qualified immunity. We need not discuss the 'clearly established' prong of qualified immunity analysis on this claim either, because Thornton has failed to establish the violation of a constitutional right.")

Peffer v. Stephens, 880 F.3d 256, 264-66 (6th Cir. 2018) ("We need not address. . . whether there was a Fourth Amendment violation on the grounds that the affidavit did not properly allege that a crime had been committed. That is because we are convinced that there was no clearly established constitutional violation and therefore qualified immunity applies. Although we generally determine whether a constitutional violation occurred before we determine whether qualified immunity applies, we need not follow this order of inquiry when determining whether a constitutional violation occurred would require interpreting unsettled state law. . . .It is an open question of Michigan law whether a private citizen writing under the guise of a police officer to request an official to perform an official action constitutes an attempt to 'compel' action under § 750.215(1)(c). . . We therefore cannot say that it is clear that Michigan courts would find that a request from a (purported) police officer to assist minor children in (imagined) danger is not, as a matter of Michigan law, an attempt to 'compel' the recipient of the request to act. Accordingly, we hold that even if the sending of the letters were not criminal under Mich. Comp. Laws §§ 750.122(3)(a) and 750.215(1)(c), the law on this point was not clearly established. Sergeant Stephens thus would be protected by qualified immunity from liability for executing an otherwise valid search warrant seeking evidence that Mr. Peffer violated those criminal statutes.")

Thomas v. City of Eastpointe, 715 F. App'x 458, 460-62 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Before asking whether Officer Barr violated Thomas's rights, it makes sense to ask whether those rights were clearly established at the time of the incident. The reason is simple: If Thomas's rights were not clearly established, Officer Barr is entitled to qualified immunity. So we turn first to a 'particularized' determination based on the facts at hand. . . May an officer tase someone he reasonably perceives to be ignoring his commands and walking away? This circuit—and several others—have drawn the line at the suspect's 'active resistance.'. . If the suspect was actively resisting, use of a taser to subdue him was reasonable. If not, then tasing was unreasonable. . .We have found active resistance where a suspect physically struggles with police, threatens or disobeys officers, or refuses to be handcuffed. . . But when a suspect is 'compliant or ha[s] stopped resisting,' the law is clearly established that using a taser constitutes excessive force. . . This case does not fit cleanly into either camp. Officer Barr arrived on the scene to respond to emergency calls reporting an assault. He did not personally witness any violence. But following the officers' arrival, Thomas walked away from the officers without saying a word. The dash-cam video shows that Officers Barr and Menzer told Thomas to 'get on the ground' several times prior to tasing him. . . And though Thomas claims he never heard the officers' commands, we review only those facts that were 'knowable' to Officer Barr at the time of the incident. . . Officer Barr's commands were clearly audible, and Thomas's purported inability to hear him was not knowable. So we are left to consider whether, under the circumstances as they appeared to Officer Barr, clearly established law made it unreasonable for him to tase Thomas. . . On the one hand, Thomas was not verbally or physically aggressive toward Officer Barr. So this case differs from the active-resistance cases in which we found that tasing the suspect did not constitute excessive force. On the other hand, the facts indicate that Thomas was not entirely compliant either: He appeared to ignore police commands to get on the ground and instead walked away. Thomas's actions thus fall somewhere in the middle. We do not stand in this gray area alone. In Cockrell, this court concluded that nonviolent flight does not fit neatly into the active-resistance camp. . . One might argue that Thomas was not fleeing—he was simply walking in a direction opposite the officers. But a suspect who ignores an officer's order to stop and walks away can 'reasonably' be considered to flee, even where the suspect does not run. . . So even though Thomas's actions may not look like flight in the ordinary sense of the word, they constitute 'flight' under the law. And this court has not yet addressed whether tasing a suspect in flight violates his clearly established rights. . . This unresolved question provides all the answer that we need: How the law applied to this set of facts was not 'beyond debate' in May 2013. . .Thomas argues that Officer Barr should have warned him prior to deploying the taser. But however prudent it may have been for Officer Barr to warn Thomas, no clearly established law required him to do so. . . And in the absence of clearly established law, Officer Barr is entitled to qualified immunity. . . .The law is not clearly established that an officer cannot tase a suspect who refuses to comply with a police officer's commands and walks away. We cannot say then that 'every "reasonable official would have understood"' that tasing Thomas under these circumstances would violate his Fourth Amendment rights. . . Officer Barr is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Smith v. City of Wyoming, 821 F.3d 697, 714 (6th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e have found no cases holding that preventing the closure of the door to a home to briefly extend a consensual interview violates the Constitution. Smith cites no case law that clearly establishes this proposition. Surveying the opinions of our sister circuits, we have found only one—loosely—analogous case. . . . We disagree that existing Supreme Court precedent clearly establishes the law on this question. The relevant cases deal with intrusions that were unauthorized ab initio, not those that prolong an otherwise consensual encounter. . . And while an 'occupant ... may refuse to answer questions at any time' during a knock-and-talk, . . . Officer Riggs did not persist in questioning Smith after she attempted to close the door. Further, the facts of the Tenth Circuit case are starkly different from those here. In Dalcour, an officer kept her foot in the doorway of a home despite the occupant repeatedly attempting to slam the door shut, long enough for reinforcements to arrive. . . Here, by contrast, Smith's own deposition testimony shows that the entire encounter was consensual until Officer Riggs 'put his foot in the door,' causing Smith to 'pause[ ] briefly,' before Riggs removed his foot and allowed the door to close. Hence, we need not decide whether a police officer briefly prolonging a consensual 'knock and talk' by placing a foot in a doorway offends the Fourth Amendment. It is sufficient to hold that, even viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Smith, Officer Riggs did not violate clearly established law, and he therefore was protected by qualified immunity. Appellee was entitled to summary judgment on this claim.")

Goode v. Berlanga, 646 F. App'x 427, 430-31 (6th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e define the question this case presents as whether at the time of the incident it was clearly established that the Eighth Amendment forbids a prison guard, who had observed a prisoner sleeping in his bunk only minutes earlier, from delaying five to seven minutes in checking on that prisoner after being asked by other inmates to attend to the prisoner because he appeared to be seriously ill. Because neither Supreme Court precedent, our precedents, nor those of our sister circuits would have put every reasonable officer on notice that Berlanga's conduct violated the Eighth Amendment in April 2011, we hold that Berlanga is entitled to qualified immunity even if he did act with deliberate indifference to Goode's serious medical condition. We need not decide the separate 'deliberate indifference' question.").

Peatross v. City of Memphis, 818 F.3d 233, 240-47 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Courts have discretion to decide which prong of the analysis to address first, Pearson, 555 U.S. at 236, and the plaintiff 'bear[s] the burden of showing that a clearly established right has been violated and that the official's conduct caused that violation,' Essex v. Cty. of Livingston, 518 F. App'x 351, 357 (6th Cir.2013). For the purposes of this appeal, we find it appropriate to first address whether Armstrong's conduct violated Vanterpool's constitutional rights. . . . Although Officers Dunaway and McMillen shot Vanterpool, the Estate seeks to hold Armstrong liable in his individual capacity under a claim of supervisory liability. It is important to note at the outset that a § 1983 individual-capacity claim differs from a § 1983 official-capacity claim. . . . [fn. 3 Since Iqbal, the circuits have grappled with the precise contours of § 1983 supervisory liability, and while the claim of supervisory liability has not been altogether eliminated, the requirements for sustaining such a claim vary by circuit]. . . . We have long held that supervisory liability requires some 'active unconstitutional behavior' on the part of the supervisor. . . However, 'active' behavior does not mean 'active' in the sense that the supervisor must have physically put his hands on the injured party or even physically been present at the time of the constitutional violation. . . . '[A] supervisory official's failure to supervise, control or train the offending individual is not actionable unless the supervisor either encouraged the specific incident of misconduct or in some other way directly participated in it.'. . We have interpreted this standard to mean that 'at a minimum,' the plaintiff must show that the defendant 'at least implicitly authorized, approved, or knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of the offending officers.'. . As part of this inquiry, this court also considers whether there is a causal connection between the defendant's wrongful conduct and the violation alleged. . . A close reading of § 1983 affirms this point. The statute states that every person acting under color of law who 'subjects, or causes [a person] to be subjected' to deprivation of constitutional rights 'shall be liable to the party injured[.]' 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (emphasis added). Accordingly, where an official's execution of his or her job function causes injury to the plaintiff, the official may be liable under the supervisory-liability theory. . . In the instant case, the Complaint sufficiently alleges that Armstrong violated Vanterpool's constitutional rights because: (1) the facts plausibly allege that Armstrong knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates through the execution of his job function; . . . and (2) the facts plausibly allege that there is a causal connection between Armstrong's 'acts and omissions' and Vanterpool's death[.] . . . Taken as true, these facts and the inferences drawn therefrom . . . support the plausible inference that in the execution of his job functions, Armstrong at least knowingly acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of Officers Dunaway and McMillen. . . .For the foregoing reasons, the Complaint sufficiently alleges that Armstrong 'at a minimum, knowingly acquiesced' in the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates through the execution of his job functions. . . . [fn. 6 To be clear, we do not suggest that every time an MPD officer violates the constitutional rights of a citizen, Armstrong can be held liable for the conduct in his individual capacity. Qualified immunity is a fact-intensive analysis and will, therefore, turn on the particular circumstances of each case. Here, the Complaint sufficiently pleads that Armstrong knowingly acquiesced to the conduct that proximately caused the injury alleged, and we have long held that this behavior is enough.]. . . . [T]he Complaint here alleges that Armstrong essentially allowed the officers to 'do whatever they want, whenever they want, to whomever they want, irrespective of the United States Constitution.' It alleges that Armstrong was involved at least in part in creating and enforcing all department policies; that he did not punish officer misconduct, including the use of excessive force; that he failed to take action in the face of the growing use of excessive force by officers and admonishment from the Mayor on the issue; and that he 'rubber stamped' officer misconduct. . . .Armstrong's alleged conduct of 'rubber stamping' the behavior of officers who shot and killed individuals with increasing frequency 'could be reasonably expected to give rise to just the sort of injuries that occurred'—Vanterpool's unfortunate death. . . Accordingly, the Complaint sufficiently pled a causal connection between Armstrong's acts and omissions and Vanterpool's death. . . . We next examine whether the right alleged to have been violated was clearly established at the time of the violation. As an initial matter, Armstrong argues that the Estate failed to allege a clearly established right because the Estate seeks to hold Armstrong liable under a theory of supervisory liability, and Vanterpool did not have a constitutional right to additional police training. Armstrong's argument evinces a misunderstanding of this prong of the qualified immunity analysis. The Estate need not show that Vanterpool had a constitutional right to additional training or adequate supervision from Armstrong; it need only show that the right that Officers McMillen and Dunaway violated was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . Armstrong admits that Vanterpool's 'Fourth Amendment rights are clearly established insofar as the alleged misconduct of Officer's Dunaway and McMillen are concerned.'. . Based on Armstrong's concession, which is consistent with this court's precedent, see Smith v. Cupp, 430 F.3d 766, 774 (6th Cir.2005), the right is clearly established. Viewing the allegations in the light most favorable to the Estate and accepting the facts and drawing all reasonable inferences from those facts in favor of the Estate, the Complaint 'adequately alleges the commission of acts that violated clearly established law.'. . .In discussing what is now known as § 1983 in the late 1800s, Congressman Hoar of Massachusetts summed up the need for a 'duty of protection':

[For example,] [i]f every sheriff in South Carolina refuses to [hold persons accountable for wrongs allegedly committed against] a colored man and those sheriffs are kept in office year after year by the people of South Carolina, and no verdict against them for their failure of duty can be obtained before a South Carolina jury, the State of South Carolina, through the class of officers who are [tasked with affording] the equal protection of the laws ... has denied that protection.

The words of Congressman Hoar capture the essence of the issue before the Court today, well over a century later. This fact is both ironic and disappointing. There is no doubt that several cities in this nation today are in a state of crisis regarding civilian and police relations. Here, we have allegations that a government official with supervisory responsibility ratified the conduct of officers who shoot first and make judgments later, evincing a brazen disregard for human life. Ratification of such conduct is abhorrent. It not only flouts accountability, but it undermines the integrity of our justice system. Where internal investigations repeatedly yield only 'rubber stamps' of approval for unconstitutional conduct, it sends the message that human beings are not being killed by accident—they are being killed by design. The law simply does not allow government officials to use qualified immunity to escape liability for such wrongs. At this stage of the proceedings, it is not known whether the Estate will be able to sustain these allegations, but it is clear that the facts alleged in the Complaint set forth a plausible claim of supervisory liability. The sufficiency of the complaint requires rejection of Armstrong's claim of qualified immunity at the dismissal stage. Importantly, the law does not impose too heavy a burden on the litigant at this early stage of the proceedings. It would be a perversion of justice to allow a person who might be crippled by officials acting under color of state law to then be crippled by the courts during the infancy of his or her case.") Pennington v. Terry, 644 F. App'x 533, 544-47 (6th Cir. 2016) ("The issue thus becomes whether Pennington had a clearly established right as of March 2, 2012 not to be tased when, on the one hand, he did not threaten the officers, was not resisting arrest, and was not attempting to flee, but on the other hand, was attempting to destroy evidence, disobeying police orders to spit out the pills, and potentially putting himself at risk of harm. As the district court observed, Sixth Circuit precedent clearly establishes that using a Taser on a non-resistant, non-threatening person violates the Fourth Amendment. . . The district court, however, identified two governmental interests making the use of a Taser constitutional in this case: (1) prevention of a potential drug overdose, and (2) preservation of evidence. While we reserve judgment on the constitutional question, an examination of controlling and persuasive case law demonstrates that it was not clearly established as of March 2, 2012 that using a Taser in furtherance of these two legitimate governmental interests violated the Fourth Amendment. . . .No Sixth Circuit case or lower court case within the Sixth Circuit . . . has addressed the specific balance between a subdued, non-threatening individual's right not to be tased and the governmental interest in preventing a potential drug overdose. One lower, out-of-circuit case has ruled, on facts similar to this case, that multiple applications of a Taser to force a suspect to spit out a bag of cocaine was a reasonable use of force to thwart a potentially fatal overdose. . . Several lower courts and at least one state supreme court have also upheld law enforcement's use of force, including Tasers and mace, to prevent the destruction of evidence. . . . Other courts have found use of a Taser to prevent destruction of evidence objectively unreasonable, particularly where the facts featured multiple tasings or where the destruction of evidence was unlikely. . . . But as of March 2012, no Sixth Circuit cases, and only one unpublished district court case within the Sixth Circuit, had addressed whether any measure of force was objectively reasonable to preserve evidence in the process of being destroyed. The case at hand implicates both of these legitimate governmental interests: preventing a potential drug overdose and preserving evidence. . . . The dearth of Sixth Circuit precedent and case law in general addressing—much less condemning—the use of force to prevent a drug overdose or to preserve evidence would not put a reasonable officer on notice that discharging a Taser to accomplish these goals violated constitutional rights. Without deciding the underlying constitutional issue of whether tasing Pennington constituted excessive force, we hold that it was not clearly established as of March 2, 2012 that tasing an arrestee attempting to swallow illegally possessed drugs constituted excessive force. Because we cannot say every reasonable official would have known it was excessive force to tase an individual attempting to destroy evidence and potentially endangering him or herself in the process, Sergeant Harris and Officer Long would be entitled to qualified immunity even if there were a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Sergeant Harris tased Pennington.")

Barber v. Miller, 809 F.3d 840, 844-48 (6th Cir. 2015) ("In Pearson, the Supreme Court detailed a range of circumstances in which courts should address only the clearly established prong. . . . Several of those circumstances apply here. First, 'it is plain' that the constitutional right that Barber seeks to enforce is not clearly established but it is 'far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.'. . Second, because the question of qualified immunity arose at the pleading stage, 'the parties have provided very few facts to define and limit any [constitutional] holding.'. . Third, Barber's briefing on the constitutional question lacks clarity and detail, posing a risk that we will decide the issue incorrectly. . . We therefore confine our inquiry to the clearly established prong of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . .We find that J.B.'s Fourth Amendment right to avoid warrantless, in-school interviews by social workers on suspicion of child abuse not to have been clearly established in January 2011, when Miller interviewed J.B. . . . .Andrews and Kovacic instruct that, by 2008, social workers entering a home without a warrant violated no clearly established rights, but those removing a child from a home without a warrant did. Inasmuch as both decisions turned on the greater constitutional concerns surrounding government intrusion into a citizen's home, . . .they offer Barber little support in arguing that the in-school interviews violated J.B.'s clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. . . .In the end, Barber falls short of demonstrating that J.B.'s Fourth Amendment rights in the context of warrantless, in-school interviews by social workers on suspicion of child abuse were clearly established in our circuit at the time of the interviews. Given the lack of guidance in this area, we are hard pressed to say that a 'reasonable social worker, facing the situation in the instant case, would have known that [his] conduct violated clearly established law.'. . Accordingly, Miller enjoys qualified immunity from these Fourth Amendment claims. . . . Barber points to no Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit case law clearly establishing J.B.'s right to avoid removal from school under the circumstances here. And his reliance on Kovacic again proves unhelpful. The social workers there effectuated a warrantless removal of the children from their home. . . . In contrast, Miller obtained a court order before removing J.B. from school. Barber's general assertions that 'the Fourth Amendment was violated as to J.B. when he was seized pursuant to the order' that he claims 'was based on false statements and otherwise lacked probable cause' invoke no clearly established right.")

Ondo v. City of Cleveland, 795 F.3d 597, 608-10 (6th Cir. 2015) ("First, Plaintiffs cannot demonstrate that the state action of which they complain burdens a fundamental right. When the Supreme Court held that state laws against sodomy violate the Due Process Clause, it did so using the language of rational-basis review, rather than any form of heightened scrutiny. See Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 574–78 (2003). The Court did not hold that the Constitution includes a fundamental right to homosexual conduct. Whether the Court's recent decision in Obergefell v. Hodges, 135 S.Ct. 2584 (2015), recasts engaging in homosexual acts as a fundamental right is irrelevant, because the decision by the police relevant here does not impair Plaintiffs' ability to engage in such conduct. Nor can Plaintiffs establish that homosexuals are a suspect or quasi-suspect class. The Court has never held that homosexuals satisfy the criteria for such classification. . . The Court has further explained that the rationale underlying these factors is that heightened scrutiny may be justified if a group requires 'extraordinary protection from the majoritarian political process.'. . The Supreme Court has not recognized any new constitutionally protected classes in over four decades, and instead has repeatedly declined to do so. Moreover, the Court has never defined a suspect or quasi-suspect class on anything other than a trait that is definitively ascertainable at the moment of birth, such as race or biological gender. In Obergefell, the Court was explicitly asked by the petitioners and various amici to declare that homosexuals are a specially protected class, and thus that government actions that disfavor homosexuals are subject to heightened scrutiny. . . But the Court held only that the Equal Protection Clause was violated because the challenged statutes interfered with the fundamental right to marry, not that homosexuals enjoy special protections under the Equal Protection Clause. . .We have always applied rational-basis review to state actions involving sexual orientation. . . Under the law-of-the-circuit doctrine, an issue decided by a panel of this court can be reconsidered only by the full court sitting en banc, or if there has been a supervening decision by the Supreme Court. . . Plaintiffs have not offered any argument as to why heightened scrutiny should apply to state actions involving homosexuals, and indeed failed even to explore the relevant cases. And as we have already explained, Obergefell did not abrogate those prior cases. We therefore have no basis for reviewing Plaintiffs' equal-protection claim on any basis more stringent than rational-basis review. Applying the rational-basis test here, viewing the admitted evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs and drawing all inferences in their favor, we hold that a police officer's decision to keep Plaintiffs in their boxer shorts does not violate the Constitution. Plaintiffs have not shown that our precedents recognize as an equal-protection violation the decision to keep suspects in their current state of dress—including boxer shorts—so long as the person is attired such that his appearance is not obscene and the police officer provides an explanation that satisfies the rational-basis test. Sergeant Galmarini's explanation here of concern for officers' safety—whether subjectively true or not—is presumed valid and rationally related to a legitimate public interest. Therefore Plaintiffs' grievance regarding being kept in their boxer shorts until the police could issue them jumpsuits, even if motivated in part by sentiments regarding homosexual behavior, still does not violate the Constitution.")

Pollard v. City of Columbus, Ohio, 780 F.3d 395, 402-04 (6th Cir. 2015), cert. denied, 136 S. Ct. 217 (2015) ("Because we conclude Bynum's constitutional rights were not violated, we reach only step one of the analysis. . . .Ultimately, her claim fails because she assumes Bynum was shot to prevent his escape. But as the officers explain in affidavits and deposition testimony, their concern was not that Bynum would escape. To the contrary, the officers knew Bynum would not escape, given his injuries and the damage to the Cadillac. . . They shot because, after Bynum repeatedly made a shooting gesture, they thought he had a gun and considered him a threat. . . .Here, the totality of the circumstances clearly gave the officers probable cause to believe Bynum threatened their safety. The officers knew from police radio that Bynum was wanted on serious rape charges and was potentially armed, and they were told he had a concealed-carry permit. That Bynum was actually unarmed and did not have a permit is beside the point; what matters is the reasonableness of the officers' belief as they 'did not and could not have known' otherwise. . . .Because the undisputed record shows the officers had probable cause for believing that Bynum posed a threat of serious harm, the use of deadly force was constitutionally permissible. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity.") Occupy Nashville v. Haslam, 769 F.3d 434, 441-46 (6th Cir. 2014) ("[W]e agree with the State Officials that the claimed right must be defined as one of indefinite occupation of a public park, and that, even if the Protesters had a First Amendment right to occupy the Plaza indefinitely, that right certainly was not, and is not, clearly established. . . .To avoid potentially 'difficult questions that have no effect on the outcome of the case,'. . . and being mindful of the unusual circumstances under which we preside [All of the judges of the Sixth Circuit have recused themselves in this appeal], . . . we will focus on Saucier's second step—whether the alleged constitutional right was clearly established at the time of the Use Policy's adoption. . . .The State Officials here define the right claimed by the Protesters as a '24–hour occupation' of the public square, which they argue is not a 'right' at all. . . The Protesters, by contrast, argue that the constitutional right at issue is not a right to 'occupy' the Plaza, but a 'clearly established First Amendment right to be present on the Plaza to air their grievances against the government.'. . The more specific and accurate framing of the issue is the one provided by the State Officials. . . . It was neither 'plainly incompetent'. . . nor was it 'beyond debate'. . . to read Clark as permitting a curfew and to take steps to implement that policy. Then and now, the Supreme Court's analysis can be read that way. The Clark Court's 'serious[ ] doubt' about the kind of right claimed here is the antithesis of being 'clearly established.' The few precedents available are generally contrary to the existence of the 'right' at issue. . . .In light of the sanitation problems, the violent assaults, the damage to state property, and the generally unsafe and deteriorating conditions, the State Officials were not objectively unreasonable in believing that they could promptly adopt a 10:00 p.m. curfew that would allow them to clean the Plaza and ensure the safety of the public in general and the Protesters in particular. The State Officials are thus entitled to qualified immunity for their actions. Our qualified immunity conclusion also necessarily extends to the Protesters' claims that their Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated. Again, the most that can be said for the Protesters' argument is that it is unclear whether they had a right to indefinitely occupy the Plaza for their demonstration. It is therefore also unclear that the law forbade their arrest and that they had any liberty interest that could be infringed by an alleged failure to provide adequate procedural protections.")

Robertson v. Lucas, 753 F.3d 606, 621, 622 (6th Cir. 2014) ("To the extent the failure to disclose this evidence can be attributed to appellees, as it must be, . . . their alleged misfeasance was in failing to inform the prosecutor of Brady material in their possession before the prosecutor made the disclosure. On this score, appellees are entitled to qualified immunity. Whatever rights appellants had to receive exculpatory evidence prior to entering their pleas was not clearly established. The Supreme Court recently stated that 'the contours of a right are sufficiently clear [where] every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . . Ruiz established that impeachment material need only be disclosed for trial. . . Appellants contend that the evidence at issue was exculpatory and therefore not covered by the rule set forth in Ruiz. We have not yet had occasion to determine whether Ruiz applies to exculpatory Brady material, a question that has caused some disagreement among our sister circuits. [collecting cases]Nor does our own caselaw support appellants' argument that they had a clearly established right to receive exculpatory Brady material prior to plea bargaining. We have held that '[i]n general, the principles announced in Brady do not apply to a tardy disclosure of exculpatory information, but to a complete failure to disclose. If previously undisclosed evidence is disclosed ... during trial, no Brady violation occurs unless the defendant has been prejudiced by the delay in disclosure.'. . Therefore, every reasonable officer in appellees' positions would know that they were under an obligation to present Brady material to the prosecutors 'in time for its effective use at trial.'. . And in Campbell v. Marshall, we held that a prosecutor's failure to disclose arguably exculpatory Brady material prior to plea bargaining did not render the defendant's guilty plea involuntary where a factual basis for the plea was established at the plea proceeding. . . Accordingly, we hold that appellees were under no clearly established obligation to disclose exculpatory Brady material to the prosecutors in time to be put to effective use in plea bargaining. We do not decide whether appellants have a constitutional right to receive exculpatory Brady material from law enforcement prior to entering into a plea agreement.")

Bray v. Planned Parenthood Columbia-Willamette Inc., 746 F.3d 229, 236-39 (6th Cir. 2014) ("For the reasons that follow, the marshals' alleged actions violated the Brays' Fourth Amendment rights, but the marshals are nonetheless protected by qualified immunity. . . .Under a 'scrupulous' application, the Fourth Amendment was violated by the detention of Michael Bray for four hours with no access to outside communications while armed, flak-jacketed U.S. Marshals worked with an organization Mr. Bray despised to seize his books and manuscripts (including books and manuscripts of insignificant market value) for the ostensible purpose of satisfying a debt. . . . Adding further support to the conclusion that the marshals' actions violated the Constitution, the presence of multiple unauthorized representatives of PPCW served no valid purpose under the writ. Although the Fourth Amendment does not require that all conduct by an officer within a home be expressly authorized by a court order, it does demand that actions relate to the lawful objectives of the order. . . PPCW had no articulated expertise in satisfying the ostensible purpose of the writ, identifying valuable goods to satisfy a monetary judgment. Moreover, because the presence of additional representatives of PPCW was not authorized, and because the writ made no provision for the use of a camera, it was a violation of the Fourth Amendment to permit the organization to film the home. . . . Nonetheless, the officers are protected from suit by the doctrine of qualified immunity, because these constitutional rights were not clearly established at the time of the violations. . . . Because the legal and factual scenario presented in this action is not identical to any the Sixth Circuit or the Supreme Court has previously addressed, the rights the marshals violated were not clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct, and a reasonable officer could have believed that his conduct was lawful. For one thing, the prolonged detention of Michael Bray might have been permissible in the distinct but more common context of executing a warrant for criminal contraband. The Supreme Court has approved of confinement by officers of the occupants of a house to minimize the risk of bodily harm during the execution of a criminal warrant, to facilitate the orderly completion of the search, and to prevent flight and the improper disposal of evidence. . . The right to detain in the somewhat analogous, albeit different, case of a search for contraband, is 'categorical,' with no relationship to the 'quantum of proof justifying detention or the extent of the intrusion to be imposed by the seizure.' . . Moreover, although the Supreme Court has questioned whether detention is permissible in the context of a search for evidence other than contraband, . . . the Court has not examined the Fourth Amendment implications of a search or a seizure under a civil writ of execution. It is true, though, that our court has held in the civil judgment enforcement context that absolute quasi-judicial immunity may apply if detention is specifically authorized in a valid court order. . . Accordingly, in the absence of specific guidance to the contrary, a reasonable officer could have interpreted existing precedent to permit the detention of Michael Bray. The marshals might also reasonably have believed that it was acceptable to invite additional representatives of PPCW to join the raid, because outside involvement in the execution of a court order is sometimes permissible. . . . Although here the writ of execution identified the number of PPCW representatives who were authorized to be present, a marshal might nonetheless have concluded that it was permissible to invite additional representatives of PPCW to execute the writ, because officers may sometimes seek the aid of third parties in executing court orders. Further buttressing this conclusion, the marshals' actions in seeking outside assistance were distinct from those in which this circuit has recognized a possible constitutional violation. . . . .An officer who was unaware that the additional representatives of PPCW were not authorized to be present might also have reasonably concluded that the individuals could film the home. Other circuits have assumed without deciding that videotaping the execution of a valid search warrant is lawful. . . In addition, several circuits have held that warrantless filming does not violate the Constitution if the cameramen are authorized to be present in the home. . . Although here the cameraman was not authorized to be present in the Brays' home, reasonable officers who were mistaken about the lawfulness of inviting additional representatives of PPCW to join the raid might likewise have been mistaken about whether those representatives could film the home, particularly in light of the camera's utility in capturing the condition of the property prior to its sale. Therefore, the rights the marshals breached were not clearly established at the time of the violations.")

T.S. v. Doe, 742 F.3d 632, 635-41 (6th Cir. 2014) ("To restate the plaintiffs' constitutional argument as a basic syllogism, they assert the following: Every reasonable officer should know that it is unconstitutional to conduct suspicionless strip searches of adult detainees held on minor offenses. Every reasonable officer should also know that juveniles enjoy the same, if not greater, protection under the Fourth Amendment than adults. Therefore, every reasonable officer should know that it is unconstitutional to conduct suspicionless strip searches of juvenile detainees held on minor offenses. To prevail, the plaintiffs must establish that both the major and minor premises of this syllogism were clearly established as of June 2009. . . .The reasoning of our prior holding in Masters contemplates that prison officials must do exactly what the Supreme Court held they need not—screen out detainees from a blanket strip-search policy based upon the seriousness of their offense. It is simply not possible to square our decision in Masters with that in Florence. Masters is therefore abrogated. . . Were the searches of J.S. and K.S. to occur today, the defendants would certainly be entitled to immunity. Setting aside misgivings that juvenile and adult detainees are subject to the same rules, see infra section III.D, the major premise of the plaintiffs' argument is clearly and unquestionably wrong. They argue, however, that we must put on judicial blinders and ignore Florence because it was rendered nearly three years after the conduct at issue and, thus, cannot displace the prevailing law of June 2009. We admittedly face a unique situation. If this case involved adult detainees, Florence clearly holds that there would be no constitutional violation. Here, however, Florence does not squarely address the constitutional issue, so that we could dispose of the merits of this case with nothing more than a citation. In the interest of avoiding an advisory constitutional ruling, we should first look to whether the rule that the plaintiffs advocate here was clearly established at the time, so as to trigger liability for any potential constitutional violation. . . This raises a question that we have not addressed before: In a § 1983 qualified-immunity case, may officials benefit from a subsequent Supreme Court case that would cause a reasonable official to have at least a good-faith doubt that a given practice is prohibited? The law can have a good deal of arbitrariness in its temporal development. Courts may not resolve a legal question until it is presented in a real case or controversy. Thus, neither we nor public officials have any control over when a particular rule is clearly established or (in this case) clearly rejected. We note, however, that the touchstone of qualified immunity in general, and the clearly-established-law inquiry in particular, is objective good faith. . . . For the purpose of establishing that an official has acted in objective good faith, the most recent pronouncement of the Supreme Court on the issue will often serve as the best analytical starting point, regardless of when the case was decided. Florence provides an excellent example of this. . . . Citation to Florence is, in large respect, a shorthand for the fundamental shift in the law that has taken place over the past three decades and that so weakened the foundation of Masters as to bring about its final collapse in Florence. By June 2009, a reasonable official could have consulted the numerous Supreme Court opinions cited above, or the more recent opinions of our sister circuits, and, in objective good faith, concluded that Masters was no longer good law. Florence did nothing more than articulate this fact. It is thus wholly consistent with the principles of qualified immunity to give the defendants the benefit of the Court's ruling. Accordingly, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity against the plaintiffs' federal claims. . . . In sum, the plaintiffs have failed to meet their burden of demonstrating that every reasonable official in June 2009 would have known that conducting a suspicionless strip search of a juvenile detainee during his or her intake into a detention facility violated the Fourth Amendment. Without this, their federal claims cannot survive the defendants' assertion of qualified immunity. We need not, and do not, opine on the constitutionality of the strip searches. The district court erred in denying summary judgment to the defendants on the plaintiffs' § 1983 claims, and we therefore reverse.")

Ortega v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 737 F.3d 435, 439, 440 (6th Cir. 2013) ("A transfer from home confinement to prison confinement, it seems to us, amounts to a sufficiently severe change in conditions to implicate due process. . . .What process is due will vary from setting to setting and may well turn on the notice given to the individual before he was allowed to serve a prison sentence at home. Happily for us, we need not answer these more difficult questions today. In a qualified-immunity case, a court may reject the constitutional claim on either of two grounds—either because no such constitutional right existed or because the constitutional right was not clearly established at the time of the incident. . . .A clearly established constitutional violation requires on-point, controlling authority or a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority.'. . As of March 2011, no controlling authority or consensus of persuasive authority established that Ortega had a liberty interest in remaining on home confinement. The relevant Supreme Court precedent at the time dealt only with traditional confinement and probation or parole. . . Ortega's case falls somewhere between traditional confinement and probation/parole, and the Supreme Court has not addressed such a case. The Sixth Circuit has not addressed an in-between case like Ortega's either. The closest case, Ganem v. U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Serv., 825 F.2d 410 (6th Cir.1987) (per curiam) (unpublished), hurts rather than helps Ortega's cause. It involved a federal prisoner whose prison classification changed because of an immigration detainer. The court held that a 'detainer which adversely affects a prisoner's classification and eligibility for rehabilitative programs does not activate a due process right.'. . Even then, Ganem does not speak to the question here—whether a home confinee should be thought of as a prisoner without a liberty interest in avoiding a transfer to prison or as a probationer/parolee with such a liberty interest. In the absence of Supreme Court or Sixth Circuit authority, Ortega points to three cases as evidence of a 'robust consensus' of persuasive authority establishing a liberty interest in home confinement. [discussing cases] These three cases are neither robust in their relevant analyses nor evidence of an on-point consensus. The decisions from both circuits undermine the central premise of Ortega's claims by noting that today's question—whether initial home confinement gives rise to a protected liberty interest—is an open one.")

Ortega v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 737 F.3d 435, 439, 441-43 (6th Cir. 2013) (Keith, J., dissenting) ("Because I disagree with the majority's view that Ortega did not have a 'clearly established' liberty interest in home confinement, I respectfully dissent. . . . The facts of this case are such that the unlawfulness of Metro Defendants' conduct is readily apparent, even in the absence of clarifying case law. Metro Defendants seized Ortega, an American-born, United States citizen, from his home and took him to jail for four days, based upon an improper detainer, without a warrant or any semblance of process. In doing so, Metro Defendants did not allow him to produce any documentation that he was an American citizen. . . . Not only should the officers have known that removing someone from their home and taking them to jail requires a certain minimum level of process, but in my view, the relevant case law clearly establishes that criminal defendants have a constitutional due process right to remain in home confinement. . . .Clearly established rights include not only those specifically adjudicated, but also those that are established by general applications of core constitutional principles. . . . Here, the core constitutional principle—that an officer must provide some process before seizing an individual from his home and taking him to jail—is unquestionably enshrined in our case law. Admittedly, the Supreme Court and this Court have only explained this principle in the probation and parole contexts. . . Surely, however, the test for determining whether a constitutional right was clearly established does not require a plaintiff to demonstrate that 'the very action in question has previously been held unlawful, but it is to say that in the light of preexisting law the unlawfulness must be apparent.'. . Indeed, in this case, the unlawfulness of Metro Defendants' actions clearly was apparent. The majority's cursory dismissal of analogous cases from the First and Seventh Circuits, see Gonzales–Fuentes v. Molina, 607 F.3d 864 (1st Cir.2010); Domka v. Portage Cnty., 523 F.3d 776 (7th Cir.2008); and Paige v. Hudson, 341 F.3d 642 (7th Cir.2003), as 'neither robust in their relevant analyses nor evidence of an on-point consensus' misses the point. At a minimum, those decisions firmly establish that an individual serving a sentence outside of prison is entitled to some minimum amount of process before being arrested and taken to jail. . .The majority's holding allows an officer to blatantly violate the Fourth, Fifth, and Fourteenth Amendment rights of an American citizen—so long as it was done in a manner that neither this Court nor the Supreme Court has directly opined on before—with impunity. This cannot be the intent of the qualified immunity doctrine.")

Yoder v. University of Louisville, No. 12–5354, 2013 WL 1976515, *6 (6th Cir. May 15, 2013) ("We exercise our discretion to focus on the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry—whether, assuming Yoder had a First Amendment right to post the Blog that was violated by her dismissal from the SON [School of Nursing], this right was clearly established. . . .We find dispositive the absence of controlling authority that specifically prohibits Defendants' conduct. Because neither the Supreme Court nor a panel of our circuit has considered whether schools can regulate off-campus, online speech by students, Yoder relies on Layshock ex rel. Layshock v. Hermitage School District, where the Third Circuit held that 'the First Amendment prohibits the school from reaching beyond the schoolyard to impose what might otherwise be appropriate discipline.'. . We first observe that Layshock was not decided until June 2011—over two years after Yoder's dismissal—and thus cannot stand as clearly established law at the time of the incident. . . More important, other circuits have come to conflicting conclusions and permitted schools to regulate off-campus, online student speech where such speech could foreseeably cause a material disruption to the administration of the school. . . Indeed, Yoder herself acknowledges that student internet communications present an 'enigmatic issue, since these are communications available on campus, off campus, or anywhere else.' In addition, both parties rely heavily on Supreme Court cases that govern student speech standards, . . . none of which considers the unique circumstances posed here. Yoder has not identified any case—nor are we aware of any—that undermines a university's ability to take action against a nursing (or medical) student for making comments off campus that implicate patient privacy concerns. Defendants have legal and ethical obligations to ensure that patient confidentiality is protected, and that nursing students are trained with regard to their ethical obligations. . . Yoder gained access to the Patient through the SON's clinical program, and patients allow SON students to observe their medical treatment in reliance on the students' agreement not to share information about their medical treatment and personal background. Under such circumstances, Defendants could not 'fairly be said to "know" that the law forb [ids] [discharging a student under these circumstances].'")

Hearring v. Sliwowski, 712 F.3d 275, 279 (6th Cir. 2013) ("In this case, as we explain below, 'it is plain that a constitutional right [wa]s not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.'. . Because the constitutional-interpretation question of whether B.H.'s Fourth Amendment rights were violated 'will have no effect on the outcome of the case,' we need not resolve it. . .Accordingly, we will assume that Hearring has alleged a violation of a Fourth Amendment right and address whether that right was clearly established. . . . The district court concluded, following the strip-search cases, that 'the fundamental dignity of a young person's body is so obvious' that school officials had fair notice that a strip-search of a student 'without justification' is improper. . . We do not disagree. Nonetheless, a critical factor distinguishes this case from the more typical strip-search cases: namely, it is clear that Sliwowski's visual inspection of B.H.'s genital area was not an investigation for contraband, but rather was an attempt to assess B.H.'s medical condition. . . And what is not obvious from existing authority is whether this kind of medically motivated visual examination constitutes a search subject to the Fourth Amendment standards developed in the strip-search case law. This legal question, whether a visual examination conducted for medical purposes by a medical professional falls within the definition of 'search' for Fourth Amendment purposes, is critical, because the Fourth Amendment's protections are not triggered until a search occurs. . . Accordingly, we must determine whether it was clearly established that the Fourth Amendment applies to the actions of a school nurse when she attempts to provide medical care to a student. There is no Supreme Court precedent directly answering the question of whether the Fourth Amendment applies to school nurses in their provision of medical care. This court has not taken a definitive position on whether the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches applies to the provision of medical services by government-employed health-care professionals. . . . Given that there is no direct precedent from this court holding that the Fourth Amendment applies to visual examinations conducted by medical professionals for medical purposes and some precedent indicating that the Fourth Amendment does not apply in such circumstances, we cannot say that it is clearly established under our precedent that the conduct of a school nurse giving medical aid to students is subject to the standard of reasonableness imposed by the Fourth Amendment. . . .In sum, existing precedents did not give Sliwowski fair warning that her medical assessments were subject to the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness requirement, and accordingly the right at issue was not clearly established. . . Sliwowski is thus entitled to qualified immunity regardless of whether her conduct amounted to a violation of B.H.'s Fourth Amendment rights, and we express no opinion as to whether there was a constitutional violation in this case.")

Embody v. Ward, 695 F.3d 577, 581, 582 (6th Cir. 2012) ("Noting that state law authorized him to carry this gun in the park, he argues that temporarily disarming him necessarily was a 'per se Second Amendment violation.'. . But § 1983 claims are designed to vindicate federal law, not state law. He offers no explanation why the officers' alleged failure to comply with state law itself violates the United States Constitution in general or the Second Amendment in particular. . . To the extent Embody means to argue that the Second Amendment prevents Tennessee from prohibiting certain firearms in state parks (and thus prohibited Ward from detaining Embody on suspicion of possessing an illegal firearm), qualified immunity is the answer. . . No court has held that the Second Amendment encompasses a right to bear arms within state parks. . . Such a right may or may not exist, but the critical point for our purposes is that it has not been established—clearly or otherwise at this point. That suffices to resolve this claim under the Court's qualified-immunity precedents. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009).")

Hagans v. Franklin County Sheriff's Office, 695 F.3d 505, 508-10 (6th Cir. 2012) ("This qualified-immunity case, like all qualified-immunity cases, presents two questions: (1) whether the officer (Ratcliff) violated the claimant's (Hagans') constitutional (Fourth Amendment) rights (by repeatedly tasing him after he actively resisted arrest); and, if so, (2) whether that constitutional right was clearly established at the time of the incident (in May 2007, when the tasing occurred). The first question raises some complications. The second one does not. We opt to answer the easier of the two questions, saving the harder one for another day. [citing Pearson] . . . . In deciding whether a right has been clearly established, the Supreme Court has 'repeatedly' warned lower courts not to define the right at 'a high level of generality.'. . Hagans proposes a lofty definition of the right ('the right to be free from excessive force,' R. 63 at 9), one floor down from the words of the Fourth Amendment itself ("the right to be free of 'unreasonable ... seizures' ") and two floors down from the highest level of generality possible ('the right to be free from a constitutional violation'). Yet these types of inquiries do little to answer the question. . . . It is sometimes worse than that: If a court does not carefully define the right, it risks collapsing the two qualified-immunity inquiries into one, permitting the constitutional-violation inquiry always to answer the clearly established inquiry. Precedent demands instead that we go down the stairs of abstraction to a concrete, particularized description of the right. Though not too far down: just as a court can generalize too much, it can generalize too little. If it defeats the qualified-immunity analysis to define the right too broadly (as the right to be free of excessive force), it defeats the purpose of § 1983 to define the right too narrowly (as the right to be free of needless assaults by left-handed police officers during Tuesday siestas). . . . Defined at the appropriate level of generality—a reasonably particularized one—the question at hand is whether it was clearly established in May 2007 that using a taser repeatedly on a suspect actively resisting arrest and refusing to be handcuffed amounted to excessive force. The answer is no. Cases from this circuit and others, before and after May 2007, adhere to this line: If a suspect actively resists arrest and refuses to be handcuffed, officers do not violate the Fourth Amendment by using a taser to subdue him. . . .One decision bucks this trend—kind of. In two consolidated cases, the en banc Ninth Circuit held that officers used excessive force by tasing suspects who offered minimal resistance. Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433 (9th Cir.2011) (en banc). . . . Whatever glimmer of hope the Ninth Circuit's holdings on the constitutional issue offer Hagans is closed by the reality that the court held the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because the right was not clearly established at the time of the encounters. . . If it did not violate clearly established law to tase a pregnant mother who refused to sign a traffic citation in November 2004, how could it violate clearly established law to tase an out-of-control, shirtless man strung-out on drugs who was thrashing about with two officers on the ground in May 2007? Hagans has not shown any changes in the law over that period or for that matter any law specific to the Sixth Circuit that would clearly establish the illegality of this far more reasonable use of a taser.")

Hoover v. Walsh, 682 F.3d 481, 500, 501 & n. 57 (6th Cir. 2012) ("We resolve Mr. Hoover's § 1983 claim on the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, holding that his constitutional rights were not violated because the officers acted with the requisite justification at all stages of their encounter with Mr. Hoover. Consequently, Mr. Hoover's § 1983 claim cannot survive summary judgment. . . . Because we resolve the issue of qualified immunity by concluding that there was no constitutional violation, we need not address the second prong of the analysis to determine whether Mr. Hoover's rights were clearly established.")

Cockrell v. City of Cincinnati, No. 10–4605, 2012 WL 573972, at *4-*7 & n.6 (6th Cir. Feb. 23, 2012) (not published) ("[W]e define the question this case presents as whether a misdemeanant, fleeing from the scene of a non-violent misdemeanor, but offering no other resistance and disobeying no official command, had a clearly established right not to be tased on July 3, 2008. Because neither case law, nor external sources, nor '[t]he obvious cruelty inherent' in taser use. . . would have put every reasonable officer on notice that Hall's conduct violated the Fourth Amendment in July 2008, we hold that Hall is entitled to qualified immunity, even if he did use excessive force. . . . Because we resolve this case on the 'clearly established' element of qualified immunity, we express no opinion on the constitutionality of Hall's actions. . . . Cases addressing qualified immunity for taser use fall into two groups. The first involves plaintiffs tased while actively resisting arrest by physically struggling with, threatening, or disobeying officers. In the face of such resistance, courts conclude either that no constitutional violation occurred, or that the right not to be tased while resisting arrest was not clearly established at the time of the incident. [collecting cases] In the second group of cases, a law-enforcement official tases a plaintiff who has done nothing to resist arrest or is already detained. Courts faced with this scenario hold that a § 1983 excessive-force claim is available, since 'the right to be free from physical force when one is not resisting the police is a clearly established right.' [collecting cases] This case does not fit cleanly within either group. At no point did Cockrell use violence, make threats, or even disobey a command to stop. [footnote omitted] He simply fled. Yet flight, non-violent though it may be, is still a form of resistance. . . Neither line of cases, then, dictates a particular result in this scenario; both apply in some measure. The most we can draw from today's case law, in summary, is this: in no case where courts denied qualified immunity was the plaintiff fleeing, and in at least some of these cases, the court specifically referred to the fact of non-flight. . . By contrast, in all cases where a plaintiff fled from police, the court held that qualified immunity was appropriate, and some courts referred specifically to the plaintiff's flight. . . . These broad principles do not establish the contours of the right Hall allegedly violated so clearly that every reasonable officer would know his actions were unconstitutional, even today. It certainly did not do so in July 2008. . . . Finally, there is no 'obvious cruelty inherent' in the use of tasers . . . which would render Hall's conduct objectively unreasonable. . . .In short, it is not clear whether tasing a suspect who fled from the scene of a nonviolent misdemeanor constituted excessive force, as of July 2008. Nor is there consensus that taser use is categorically improper, unsafe, or cruel. We cannot, therefore, say that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what [Hall was] doing' violated Cockrell's Fourth–Amendment rights.")

Cockrell v. City of Cincinnati, No. 10–4605, 2012 WL 573972, at *7 (6th Cir. Feb. 23, 2012) (Cole, J., concurring) (not published) ("I am persuaded that Cockrell, as of July 3, 2008, did not have a clearly established right not to be tased for fleeing from a non-violent misdemeanor. I write separately because, given the totality of the circumstances, I believe that Officer Hall's use of force was excessive. In several of the cases cited by the majority, in which courts found that the use of a taser against a resisting arrestee constituted excessive force, the courts placed great weight on the officer's failure to warn the suspect prior to deploying the taser. [citing cases] Likewise, the City of Cincinnati's use-of-force policy advises officers to 'give the subject a verbal warning that the TASER will be deployed unless exigent circumstances exist that would make it imprudent to do so.'. .Here, Hall does not allege that he warned Cockrell of the impending use of his taser—or even that he ordered him to stop—nor does he allege that exigent circumstances prevented him from doing so. Thus, I would find that his use of a taser under these circumstances violated Cockrell's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force.")

Wheeler v. City of Lansing, 660 F.3d 931, 938-40 (6th Cir. 2011) ("[W]e can hold that an official is entitled to qualified immunity without determining whether a constitutional violation has actually occurred. . . This is exactly what we do here. Even assuming that Wirth violated Wheeler's Fourth Amendment rights, Wheeler has not shown that it was a clearly established violation for Wirth to rely on the warrant issued to search Wheeler's apartment. . . . [W]e can assume for the sake of this qualified-immunity analysis that Wheeler's Fourth Amendment rights were violated

when officers seized items that were identified in the warrant but not supported by probable cause in the warrant affidavit. . . . Regardless, such a deficiency is unusual, and thus it was reasonable for Wirth to fail to recognize it, especially considering the fact that the warrant affidavit and the warrant were drafted by a prosecuting attorney and that the warrant was approved by the state magistrate. Much of the problem Wheeler alleges here is not with the warrant, but with the warrant affidavit. Moreover, unlike in most cases dealing with a defective warrant affidavit, this affidavit is clearly not deficient in establishing probable cause to search, and Wheeler acknowledges that the affidavit obviously provides such probable cause. Instead, the deficiency alleged is in establishing probable cause to seize certain items listed in the warrant, an error that would not be apparent to the reasonable police officer. . . . The basis for the warrant, in Wirth's view, was the commission of the home invasions in both Ingham County and Eaton County. Thus, it was reasonable for him to believe that, as long as the search warrant established probable cause for the search, which it clearly did, he could seize any items he encountered that constituted evidence of the commission of the home invasions, which stolen property clearly does. Wirth is thus entitled to qualified immunity from this aspect of Wheeler's Fourth Amendment claim. Even though Wirth urges us to determine whether the warrant affidavit failed to establish probable cause for the seizure of certain items in the warrant, we need not do so for purposes of granting qualified immunity and do not have jurisdiction to do so for purposes of Wirth's cross-appeal. In his cross-appeal, Wirth challenges the district court's determination that Wirth violated Wheeler's Fourth Amendment rights, even though the district court ultimately held that he was immune from suit pursuant to this violation. Because Wirth was ultimately successful in his motion for summary judgment, we lack jurisdiction to consider this cross appeal. There is generally no appellate jurisdiction when the appellant does not seek a change in the relief ordered by the judgment appealed from. . . . We acknowledge the Supreme Court's recent holding in Camreta v. Greene, 131 S.Ct. 2020, 2032 (2011), that the Supreme Court has jurisdiction to review a lower court's holding that a party violated the Constitution even though the party prevailed on qualified immunity grounds in the lower court. The Court based this conclusion on the fact that the lower court's ruling would be considered to settle a question of constitutional law and thereby guide the conduct of officials in the future. . . The 'purpose and effect' of such a ruling, the Supreme Court reasoned, permits its being reviewed at the behest of the prevailing immunized official. . . The Court emphasized in Camreta, however, that its holding 'addresse[d] only [the Supreme Court's] authority to review cases in this procedural posture.'. . It did not address whether lower courts of appeals must hear appeals brought by similarly prevailing parties. Moreover, the Court recognized that 'the considerations persuading [it] to permit review of petitions in this posture may not have the same force as applied to a district court decision,' because such decisions by a district court are not binding precedent in any future matters. . . In light of this difference, at least one court of appeals has noted that prevailing immunized parties cannot appeal a district court's 'newly declared constitutional right in the higher courts.' Horne v. Coughlin, 191 F.3d 244, 247 (2d Cir.1999); but see Kalka v. Hawk, 215 F.3d 90, 96 (D.C.Cir.2000) (assuming that when plaintiffs in Bivens cases appeal adverse immunity rulings, 'the winning officials can cross-appeal the ruling against them regarding the constitutionality of their actions'). Permitting review of a prevailing party's claim creates tension with Article III's prohibition against issuing advisory opinions. . .

This is because the prevailing party has already obtained a judgment in his or her favor, and thus is not asking the court to review the lower court's judgment on appeal but instead a basis or reason for that judgment. 'The duty of this court ... is to decide actual controversies by a judgment which can be carried into effect, and not to give opinions upon moot questions or abstract propositions, or to declare principles or rules of law which cannot affect the matter in issue in the case before it.' Mills v. Green, 159 U.S. 651, 653 (1895). This consideration, and the fact that the district court's decision below does not present the sort of concern with the creation of precedent that the Supreme Court confronted in Camreta, lead to the conclusion that we are without jurisdiction to review Wirth's cross-appeal. Further, as explained above, we need not determine on Wheeler's appeal whether the warrant affidavit failed to establish probable cause for the seizure of certain items in the warrant in order to hold that Wirth is entitled to qualified immunity. Thus, we state no opinion as to whether a constitutional violation occurred from the execution of the warrant with respect to items not identified as stolen in the crime descriptions supporting the existence of probable cause.")

Holzemer v. City of Memphis, 621 F.3d 512, 519, 520, 527, 528 (6th Cir. 2010) ("Although we are not bound to follow the sequence of this inquiry, see Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808, 813 (2009), we believe that this case would benefit from the traditional sequence outlined in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001), and Feathers. Because of the nature of the constitutional right at issue, 'there would be little if any conservation of judicial resources to be had by beginning and ending with a discussion of the "clearly established" prong' because it would be 'difficult to decide whether a right is clearly established without deciding precisely what the constitutional right happens to be.'. . Therefore, we first address whether Holzemer's conversation with Peete constitutes constitutionally protected petitioning, and, finding that it is, we then examine whether that right was clearly established at the time the events took place. . . . We find that requesting assistance from a city councilman–whether in writing or in person–constitutes petitioning activity entitled to the protection of the Petition Clause of the First Amendment. Consequently, Holzemer and Downtown Buggy have a right to be free from retaliation for exercising that right. Because we find no constitutional distinction between an oral and written petition for redress, we also find that a reasonable city official would have known that retaliation for seeking such assistance from a local, elected official is unlawful. . . . We find that the case law of this court and of the Supreme Court demonstrates that the right to petition a local, elected representative for assistance in dealing with local government agencies was clearly established at the time that the relevant events took place and that a reasonable local official would have known that retaliating against a citizen exercising that right is unlawful. Moreover, a reasonable city official would have known that the Constitution prohibits retaliation for a citizen's exercise of his First Amendment right to Free Speech, whether that speech takes written, oral, or another form.")

Aldini v. Johnson, 609 F.3d 858, 863 (6th Cir. 2010) ("Until recently, courts used the two-step sequential inquiry set forth in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001), to address an assertion of the qualified immunity defense. Under Katz, a court first asked whether, viewed in the light most favorable to plaintiff, the facts show that the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right. . . If the answer to this first question was 'no,' the analysis proceeded no further and the officer need not even seek the protection of qualified immunity. . . If, however, the pleadings establish that there is a genuine issue of material fact as to a violation, Katz mandated that the next step was to determine whether the constitutional right was 'clearly established' at the time of the violation. If not, the officer would be entitled to qualified immunity. . . Under the 'clearly established' inquiry, the question is whether the right was 'so "clearly established" that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . Previously, this Court has included a third inquiry to 'increase the clarity' of the Katz analysis: 'whether the plaintiff offered sufficient evidence to indicate that what the official allegedly did was objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established constitutional rights.'. . However, in Pearson v. Callahan, __ U. S. __, 129 S.Ct. 808 (2009), the Supreme Court recently abandoned Katz's requirement that courts must address the qualified immunity inquiries sequentially. . . However, because Pearson left in place Katz's core analysis, all pre-Pearson case law remains good law.")

Stanley v. Vining, 602 F.3d 767, 771 (6th Cir. 2010) ("We understand that a pro se prisoner is unlikely to understand the complexity of federal law regarding prisoner rights, and hence we read a prisoner's complaint liberally. . . Having done so in this case, we are unable to derive from the complaint any set of facts or legal theory that would give rise to a valid, federal, § 1983 cause of action. Although Stanley does not specify with clarity what constitutional provisions–Due Process, First Amendment, or Sixth Amendment–his claims rest on, we have treated his allegations under all reasonable theories we can imagine. Our dissenting colleague melds together and confuses several theories and comes up with a theory that seems to depend on local differences in how prisons internally interpret a wide variety of regulations from state to state. Our ruling here is that there must be uniform federal constitutional theory from state to state as to each constitutional provision and that no constitutional provision flatly prohibits as unlawful censorship a prison from opening and reading a prisoner's mail unless it can be shown that the conduct interferes with the prisoner's right to counsel or access to the courts or violates his rights of equal protection or procedural due process. We find no per se constitutional rule that such conduct automatically violates a broad, general rule prohibiting censorship, as our dissenting colleague seems to imagine.")

Stanley v. Vining, 602 F.3d 767, 771 (6th Cir. 2010) (Cole, Circuit Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Plaintiff-Appellant Aubrey Stanley alleges that Defendant-Appellee Randy Vining violated his constitutional rights by reading his legal mail on two separate occasions. Although I concur in the majority opinion to the extent that it affirms the dismissal of Stanley's retaliation and supervisor-liability claims, I respectfully dissent from the rest of the majority opinion because I believe Stanley has made out a cognizable legal-mail claim.")

Binay v. Bettendorf, 601 F.3d 640, 647, 652 (6th Cir. 2010) ("Because the Saucier sequence is appropriate here, we first ask whether, under the facts that Plaintiffs have alleged, a constitutional violation occurred. Specifically, the relevant question is whether Plaintiffs have alleged sufficient facts to show that Defendants violated Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights by using excessive force in the execution of a valid search warrant at Plaintiffs' apartment. The use of excessive force in the execution of a search warrant constitutes a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . [T]he law is clearly established that the authority of police officers to detain the occupants of the premises during a proper search for contraband is 'limited' and that officers are only entitled to use 'reasonable force' to effectuate such a detention. Thus, based on the caselaw that existed on January 10, 2007, the date of the alleged use of excessive force in executing the search warrant, Defendants were on notice that their detention of Plaintiffs during the search using means that were more forceful than necessary would constitute a Fourth Amendment violation.")

Koubriti v. Convertino, 593 F.3d 459, 472 (6th Cir. 2010) ("Whether Koubriti's allegation, when characterized as a more general due process claim, amounts to a constitutional violation has not been developed in the lower court record, nor has it been briefed to this Court. Therefore, it would be improper to reach the merits of this question. . . Since the Supreme Court's decision in Pearson v. Callahan, however, we are no longer required to address the constitutionality of the alleged conduct first and can resolve the issue by determining whether such a violation was clearly established. . . In the instant case, even if the claim were to be characterized as one alleging that Convertino violated Koubriti's right to due process by ordering agents not to memorialize the Hmimssa interviews, we could not say that it was clearly established that such behavior is unconstitutional. . . . Here, we can find no case law to support the conclusion that a reasonable official would have understood that the complained of action violated Koubriti's rights. Although Convertino's directive may be questioned, it cannot be said that its unlawfulness is apparent, particularly when reviewing the existing case law. While such behavior is in tension with the policy judgments underlying Brady, . . . it would indeed go well beyond the reasonable limits of the Brady non-disclosure doctrine to say that it also requires memorialization of interviews. Additionally, cases analyzing sets of facts more similar to the instant case than those in Brady have suggested that it is not a constitutional violation. . . Thus, Convertino's behavior, were it to be ruled as a constitutional violation, was not clearly established as a violation at the time Convertino acted.").

Jones v. Byrnes, 585 F.3d 971, 975, 978 (6th Cir. 2009) ("[I]n Pearson v. Callahan, __ U.S. __, 129 S.Ct. 808 (2009), the Supreme Court recently abandoned Katz's requirement that courts address all qualified immunity inquiries sequentially. . . The Court recognized that the lower courts had complained that the sequential mandate was cumbersome and often forced courts to decide constitutional questions unnecessarily, and also recognized that the sequential mandate was impossible to force on any given judge's thought process. On the other hand, the Court found that the Katz inquiry was still appropriate and a correct statement of the test for qualified immunity. . . . However, because Pearson left in place Katz's core analysis, all pre-Pearson case law remains good law. . . . Neither side has cited any case, from any circuit or district court, in which an officer's actions in a police chase have ultimately been found to shock the conscience, nor are we aware of any such case. . . As a result, although Lewis established in 1998 that an officer's conduct in a police chase could theoretically shock the conscience, there have been no examples of what specific kinds of conduct rise to that level. The 'clearly established' inquiry 'must be undertaken in consideration of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition....' Katz, 533

U.S. at 201. Thus, at present, it would be exceedingly difficult for an officer to be aware of what specific actions violate the clearly established general right of suspects and third parties to be free from arbitrary deprivation of life and liberty in police-pursuit scenarios. Certainly Officers Lentine and Byrnes had no guidance from this Court or the Supreme Court on what would shock the conscience, just what would not. The officers, therefore, would be entitled to qualified immunity even had we found that their actions shocked the conscience.")

Jones v. Byrnes, 585 F.3d 971, 978-80 (6th Cir. 2009) (Martin, J., concurring) ("I concur in the Court's disposition of this case. Mr. Jones's death, though truly terrible, was not the result of a constitutional violation. I write separately, however, to discuss a troubling problem highlighted by this case and to suggest an approach to apply in future cases that addresses this problem. As the Court notes, neither party has cited a single example of a case, from any circuit or district court, in which an officer's actions in a police chase have ultimately been found to shock the conscience, and I am aware of no such case. Thus, it appears that the set of examples of constitutionally impermissible police-pursuit behavior is currently an empty one. Although surprising, this was not especially troubling under the mandatory analytical regime set forth in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001). Under Katz, even if a given police-pursuit case did not amount to a constitutional violation, the court would still have to go through the exercise of explaining why the police officer's actions did not shock the conscience. However–at least in theory–sometime in the future a district court will find, and an appellate court will agree, that a police-pursuit case transgressed the Fourteenth Amendment threshold. . . And if Katz still controlled, the court confronted with this future case would, as a matter of law, have to confront the constitutional question head on, finally establishing a positive data point announcing that this police action, whatever it is, crosses the line. But Katz is no longer the law of the land; Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808 (2009), is. Under Pearson, courts are now generally free to address the two questions set forth in Katz in whichever order they deem appropriate in a particular case. In practice, this means that a court may avoid deciding whether a constitutional violation occurred if the court is of the belief that, even assuming a violation, it was not clearly established at the time of the incident that the officer's actions crossed whatever constitutional line is at play in a given case. Usually, traditional constitutional avoidance policies would counsel in favor of doing just that. These avoidance policies are why the Supreme Court's decision in Pearson makes sense now. In short, Katz generally served its purpose–in most section 1983 cases there are now sufficient data points to define the scope of constitutionally impermissible behavior. Thus, there is less of a need to continue developing the body of constitutional precedent, so the constitutional avoidance policies can come back into play. However, police-pursuit cases do not fall within the group of section 1983 cases for which Katz accomplished its goal of developing constitutional precedent because the set of examples of impermissible police-pursuit behavior remains empty. I am therefore concerned about applying Pearson in future police-pursuit cases. Except in the most overwhelmingly egregious case, an officer that crosses the Fourteenth Amendment's threshold likely still would be entitled to qualified immunity because it was not clearly established that his specific actions were of the kind that crossed the line. Under Pearson, the court confronted with this officer's actions could avoid the constitutional question entirely and resolve the case on the clearly established prong. And so too could all subsequent courts. This, of course, results in a self-perpetuating cycle in Fourteenth Amendment police-pursuit cases: district courts will skip the constitutional inquiry in favor of disposing of cases on the 'clearly established' prong, so there will never be an actual finding that an officer's conduct shocks the conscience, so courts will continue to be able to dispose of cases on the "clearly established" prong, and so on. We could see a string of cases with the same refrain: 'Even if the officer violated the Fourteenth Amendment in continuing this pursuit, it was not clearly established at the time of the incident that his actions violated plaintiff's constitutional rights. We therefore pass on the question whether a constitutional violation actually occurred, because we have discretion to do so under Pearson, and find that the defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.' The set of conscience-shocking fact patterns could remain empty, and no body of case law will develop to define the parameters of what police conduct in a pursuit case could shock the conscience. This is a troubling potential because reflexive exercise of Pearson discretion in police-pursuit cases could result in essentially writing that cause of action off the books. Thankfully, I believe Pearson anticipates this very scenario and provides a safeguard against the extinction of difficult, but nonetheless valid, constitutional tort claims. As I understand Pearson, the Supreme Court merely lifted the requirement that lower courts implement the Katz analytical sequence in all qualified immunity cases. However, Pearson 'continue[d] to recognize that [the Katz protocol] is often beneficial.' 129 S.Ct. at 818. Furthermore, Justice Alito's opinion explicitly addresses this very situation, where the body of constitutional law is thin or non-existent: 'In addition, the Saucier Court was certainly correct in noting that the two-step procedure promotes the development of constitutional precedent and is especially valuable with respect to questions that do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable.' Id. (emphasis added). I therefore read Pearson to encourage and support continued development of the constitutional law using a more targeted approach in small subsets of qualified immunity cases, such as police-pursuit cases, where the body of law still needs fattening. . . I believe this to be the proper approach and applaud the Court's decision to address the constitutional question in this case even though not required under Pearson. I further encourage the district courts and future panels of this Court to follow suit in these kinds of cases by continuing to employ Katz's analytical sequence.").

Chappell v. City Of Cleveland, 585 F.3d 901, 916 (6th Cir. 2009) ("In sum, plaintiff has failed to present a genuine issue of material fact on her claim that defendants violated McCloud's Fourth Amendment right to freedom from unreasonable seizure. At best, plaintiff has presented grounds for speculation that defendants misread her grandson's innocent intentions when he came out of the closet and advanced toward them with knife in hand. Yet, qualified immunity protects officers from liability for mistakes of law and fact. Plaintiff has failed to adduce facts demonstrating that defendants, in potentially misinterpreting McCloud's actions, were plainly incompetent or deliberately violated his rights when they acted in self-defense. Plaintiff has thus failed to carry her burden under the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis of demonstrating that defendants violated McCloud's constitutional rights. She has failed to demonstrate that they are not entitled to qualified immunity. Moreover, there being insufficient evidence of a constitutional violation, defendants, in effect, have no need of qualified immunity and are actually entitled to summary judgment as matter of law.").

Waeschle v. Dragovic, 576 F.3d 539, 544, 550 (6th Cir. 2009) (amended opinion) ("Our qualified-immunity analysis that follows does not resolve the merits of Waeschle's constitutional claim. Doing so is unnecessary because, as will be shown, Waeschle's purported constitutional right is not clearly established. . . .In sum, Michigan law regarding the rights of the next of kin in their relative's body parts removed for forensic examination during an autopsy is at best equivocal. Not a single case instructed Dragovic to treat the brain in any manner other than the way he did. Nor did any Michigan statute unambiguously instruct Dragovic on how to dispose of individual body parts retained for forensic examination as opposed to dealing with the body as a whole. Waeschle's alleged constitutionally protected property right to her mother's brain is therefore not clearly established because the underlying state-created property interest is not "sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . . [W]hether to recognize such a right is a task that the Michigan legislature and courts are better equipped to handle than this court, which is why we are exercising our discretion under Pearson to not further explore the first prong of the qualified-immunity test as set forth in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001).")

Grawey v. Drury, 567 F.3d 302, 309 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Some panels of the Sixth Circuit have employed a third step requiring the court to determine whether the plaintiff has offered sufficient evidence to indicate that what the official allegedly did was objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established constitutional right. . . In excessive force cases, however, because the defendant's conduct must have been objectively unreasonable to find a constitutional violation, Graham v. Connor, 409 U.S. 386, 395 (1989), the third step is redundant. Thus, qualified immunity in excessive force cases is a two-step analysis. . . . While excessive force qualified immunity claims should proceed under a two-step rather than a three-step analysis, we note that the Supreme Court, in Pearson v. Callahan, 128 S.Ct. 808, 818 (2009), recently granted lower courts the discretion to conduct their two-step analysis in the manner most appropriate to the case before them. We will apply the traditional analysis, examining first whether Grawey has presented evidence of an excessive force constitutional violation and then whether the constitutional right violated was clearly established at the time of the incident.").

Dominguez v. Correctional Medical Services, 555 F.3d 543, 549, 552 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Determining whether the government officials in this case are entitled to qualified immunity generally requires two inquiries: 'First, viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, has the plaintiff shown that a constitutional violation has occurred? Second, was the right clearly established at the time of the violation?'. . cf. Pearson v. Callahan, No. 07-751, 2009 U.S. LEXIS 591, (Jan. 21, 2009) (holding that the two-part test is not longer considered mandatory; thereby freeing district courts from rigidly, and potentially wastefully, applying the two-part test in cases that could more efficiently be resolved by a modified application of that framework). . . . As applied to this case, Dominguez's right to adequate medical care has long been clearly established.

Therefore, we conclude that Dominguez has satisfied both requirements for overcoming Fletcher's qualified immunity defense.")

Weinberger v. Grimes, No. 07-6461, 2009 WL 331632, at *5 (6th Cir. Feb. 10, 2009) ("While Weinberger had a right to a kosher diet while in prison–subject to reasonable restrictions–it is less clear whether that right was violated by being served a non-kosher meal on a single occasion. We therefore assume without deciding that it was, and proceed to determine whether Tomberlin is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity. See Pearson, 2009 WL 128768. . . . Here, there is no evidence that Tomberlin acted knowingly in serving Weinberger a non-kosher meal. The evidence tends to establish instead that FCI Manchester was an accredited provider of kosher meals and that Tomberlin was not personally involved in food preparation. Therefore, Tomberlin held a reasonable belief that the Passover meal presented to Weinberger was kosher. Likewise, there is no evidence that Tomberlin was incompetent. Accordingly, Tomberlin was entitled to qualified immunity, as the district court correctly concluded.")

Long v. Cnty. of Saginaw, No. 12-CV-15586, 2014 WL 5460630, at *9 (E.D. Mich. Oct. 27, 2014) ("In summary, existing precedents did not give jail officials fair warning that their surveillance of Long's meeting with his client was subject to the Fourth Amendment's reasonableness requirement, and accordingly the right at issue was not clearly established. . . Sixth Circuit precedent has indicated that visual surveillance may constitute a Fourth Amendment search, but never has it addressed the more specific issue of whether visual surveillance of an attorney-client meeting in prison may violate the Fourth Amendment. Officer Federspiel is thus entitled to qualified immunity regardless of whether the jail officials' conduct amounted to a violation of Long's Fourth Amendment rights. Accordingly, Sheriff Federspiel's motion for summary judgment with respect to his individual liability will be granted because he is immune from suit.")

Perrea v. Cincinnati Public Schools, 709 F.Supp.2d 628, 649, 650 (S.D. Ohio 2010) ("This Court already has determined that if the facts alleged are true then Hahn violated Perrea's right to equal protection under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution. . .The issue, therefore, is whether the right was clearly established. . . . In this case, it would not have been sufficiently clear to a reasonable person that Hahn violated Perrea's equal protection rights if she surplussed Perrea on the basis of the staff racial balance provisions. The staff racial balance provisions in the collective bargaining agreement arose out of the Bronson v. Board of Education of Cincinnati, No. 1:74-cv-205 (S.D.Ohio), school desegregation case. The staff racial balance provisions previously had been upheld by the Sixth Circuit in Jacobson v. Cincinnati Board of Education, 961 F.2d 100 (6th Cir.1992). This Court has concluded that today the Sixth Circuit would apply strict scrutiny analysis and find that the provisions are unconstitutional, but no court had so found in February 2008 when Perrea was surplussed. For these reasons, the Court concludes that Hahn did not violate a clearly established right and she is entitled to qualified immunity on Perrea's equal protection claim.")

New v. Perry, No. 2:07-cv-723, 2009 WL 483341, at *4, *12 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 25, 2009) ("Although Saucier also held that the questions must be decided in this exact order, the Supreme Court recently retreated from that requirement and now allows the lower courts to decide the questions is either order. [citing Pearson]However, the Supreme Court recognized that this framework will often continue to be beneficial in many cases involving qualified immunity. . . Here, the Court sees no reason to depart from the traditional approach. Accordingly, the Court will first turn to whether the facts, as alleged by the plaintiffs and taken in the light most favorable to them, show that one or more of the defendants violated a right protected by the Fourth Amendment. . . . Mr. New's allegations concerning his being dragged to the lab, kneed in the back, and slammed to the ground create a triable issue of fact concerning whether the force used was reasonably related to the goal of having his palms printed. Having found that Mr. New has asserted a viable constitutional violation, the Court must determine whether the right alleged to have been violated was clearly established at the time of the defendants' conduct. Generally speaking, a suspect has a clearly-established right to be free from the use of excessive force. . . . Reasonable officers would have been aware that this level of force could not be justified solely on the basis of the officers' perceived right to take Mr. New's palm prints, especially given the fact that he was not under arrest for a crime at the time the force was applied.").

Hysell v. Thorp, No. 2:06-cv-170, 2009 WL 262426, at *14 n.11, *20, *21 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 2, 2009) ("The Supreme Court very recently held that courts are no longer required to consider these two questions in this particular order. Pearson v. Callahan, __ S.Ct. __, 2009 WL 128768, at *9 (U.S. Jan. 21, 2009). However, it also noted that this sequence is still 'often appropriate.' Id. In this case, the Court sees no reason to vary the standard approach. . . . To summarize, the Court finds that Sergeant Carson violated Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights when he used the arm bar hold and leg sweep to take Plaintiff to the ground. The Court also finds that Sergeant Carson and Deputy Kimble violated Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights when they subsequently forced Plaintiff's arms up behind his back in order to handcuff him. Having found that these officers engaged in excessive force, the Court turns next to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, i.e., whether the constitutional right was clearly established. . . . In this case, Plaintiff was accused of committing two misdemeanors. He was not actively resisting arrest and posed no immediate threat to the officers or anyone else. . . .It is clearly established that when an arrestee is not violent and poses no immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others, officers are not entitled to inflict unnecessary pain. . . . In the Court's view, the law of this circuit, as it existed on the date of Plaintiff's arrest, put Defendants on fair notice that their conduct in effecting his arrest was unlawful. Because the law was clearly established, the Court concludes that Deputy Kimble and Sergeant Carson are not entitled to qualified immunity.").

SEVENTH CIRCUIT

Mason-Funk v. City of Neenah, 895 F.3d 504, 507-10 (7th Cir. 2018) ("We have discretion to choose which prong to address first, . . . and since the second prong is dispositive here, we address only whether the right at issue was clearly established. . . .[S]ince these two decisions, the Supreme Court has made clear that 'Garner and Graham do not by themselves create clearly established law outside an obvious case.' . . Mason-Funk argues that existing case law put Officers Hoffer and Ross on notice that their conduct and use of deadly force was unconstitutional. More specifically, she contends that the officers were on notice (1) that they had a constitutional obligation in hostage situations to protect innocents and distinguish between the suspect and innocents; (2) that Funk's conduct did not create an imminent threat justifying the use of deadly force; and (3) that deadly force may not be used without providing a warning, except in extraordinary circumstances. We first examine Supreme Court precedent and precedent from this Circuit to determine whether a right was clearly established at the time of violation. . . Mason-Funk relies on Garner for the second and third propositions above—deadly force is only permissible when the suspect poses a threat of imminent harm to the officers or others, . . . and deadly force may be used to prevent an escape only 'if, where feasible, some warning has been given.'. . But Mason-Funk admits that Garner alone does not create clearly established precedent and that this is far from the obvious case where it might create such precedent. . . . No existing precedent squarely governs the facts and circumstances that confronted Officers Hoffer and Ross. . . Consequently, the officers were not on notice that their use of deadly force on an armed individual, without warning in a dangerous and chaotic hostage situation, violated any clearly established right. Funk fails to cite to any precedent, outside of a vacated Ninth Circuit opinion and a handful of district court cases, which involved a hostage situation. On this basis alone, the remaining cases cited by Funk are factually distinct and incapable of giving the officers any fair warning that they violated a clearly established right. In the circuit cases cited by Funk, the individuals armed with guns did not pose an imminent threat to the officers based on the context of those confrontations. However, the backdrop here to the officers' use of deadly force was an active and dangerous hostage situation, one in which they had been shot at by the hostage-taker. These circumstances, absent in Garner, Weinmann, Cooper, or Baker, posed a unique and serious threat to the officers, undermining comparisons to the aforementioned cases. To drive home the point, it is worth recounting what occurred in the short span of six minutes. Flatoff had continuously made threats that he would kill the hostages, which prompted the hasty team to act. When the hasty team encountered Flatoff inside the shop, Officers Hoffer and Ross were met with a barrage of gunfire, including a shot that struck Officer Hoffer's helmet in what he believed was not a hostage situation, but rather an ambush. Within minutes of being shot at, the officers heard more gunfire coming from the rear entrance. When Funk appeared in their line-of-sight holding a gun, the officers, in a matter of seconds, concluded that Funk was one of the people inside the shop who had shot at them only minutes ago. Simply put, the facts in this case and existing precedent failed to put Officers Hoffer and Ross on notice that their use of deadly force, without a warning, on an armed individual in a dangerous hostage situation, was unlawful. The officers did not violate a clearly established right and they are entitled to qualified immunity.") Sebesta v. Davis, 878 F.3d 226, 234-35 (7th Cir. 2017) ("As the plaintiff, she bears the burden of showing that there is a case 'on point or closely analogous' that allows us to conclude that a reasonable government employee would or should know that her conduct is unlawful. . . Sebesta cites multiple cases to support her position that the three individual defendants should have known they were violating Sebesta's right to familial integrity. But, as is often the case, these cases fail to meet the specificity criteria that the Supreme Court has established. . . Though earlier decisions need not be 'directly on point,'. . . a look at the four cases on which Sebesta relies demonstrates that none would have alerted a reasonable official to the possibility that her conduct in the situation she confronted was unlawful. . . .Sebesta needed to show that 'it would have been clear to [Davis, Childs, and Bean] that the alleged conduct "was unlawful in the situation [they] confronted."'. . She has not done so. Brokaw, Doe, and Dupuy II establish only that the state actors needed evidence supporting a reasonable suspicion of abuse or neglect in order to report, investigate, and 'indicate' Sebesta. Nothing in these cases would have put Davis, Childs, or Bean on notice that their suspicions were unreasonable or their actions unlawful. To the contrary, Davis, Childs, and Bean had a significant amount of evidence supporting a reasonable suspicion of future harm to the baby. . . . Because Sebesta presents no cases clearly establishing that Davis, Childs, and Bean knew that they were acting unlawfully by reporting, investigating, and 'indicating' her, we need not consider whether there was any violation of her constitutional right to familial integrity. The individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on her claim under section 1983.")

Howell v. Smith, 853 F.3d 892, 897-900 (7th Cir. 2017) ("We may rest our decision on either prong of the qualified immunity doctrine. . . Here, in the hope that our decision will provide meaningful additional guidance to police officers operating in the field, we address the first prong and determine whether Mr. Howell suffered a deprivation of a federal constitutional right. . . . Although the record is replete with evidence of Mr. Howell's earlier difficulties with his shoulder and of his difficulties after this encounter, we must focus on what Officer Smith knew at the time of the incident. During the arrest, and while placed in handcuffs, Mr. Howell at most told Officer Smith that he recently had surgery that limited the mobility of his arm; he never stated explicitly that he was in pain or actively suffering in any way. . . .The crux of the matter is that, from Officer Smith's perspective, he was dealing with an individual suspected of committing a felony involving the discharge of a firearm on the public way. . . Although '[a] person has the right to be free from an officer's knowing use of handcuffs in a way that would inflict unnecessary pain or injury,' that right is tempered by the attendant 'risk of flight or threat of injury.'. . Here, although Officer Smith had a duty to consider the information that Mr. Howell had given him about his condition, . . . he had very little information to evaluate. That information, moreover, clearly did not outweigh the very concrete information about the crime and the circumstances under which it was allegedly committed. Officer Smith's decision did not violate the Fourth Amendment.")

Werner v. Wall, 836 F.3d 751, 759-66 (7th Cir. 2016) ("In some situations, adherence to the traditional two-step approach is appropriate. . . . Nevertheless, the circumstances of the present case make it advisable to avail ourselves of the latitude now afforded us. . . Indeed, there are several reasons that counsel that we not address definitively the constitutional issue. First, the underlying administrative directive is no longer operable. Secondly, the appropriate analysis for claims of detained individuals not subject to sentences of incarceration is a difficult question, and it is easy for an intermediate appellate tribunal to lose its footing on the shifting sands of present-day case authority. For a long time, we have recognized that the treatment of a detained person not serving a sentence of incarceration is governed by the Due Process Clause, . . . but we often have borrowed Eighth Amendment standards as a rule of decision. . . We also have recognized, of course, that a person serving a sentence of probation or parole has a limited liberty interest in his freedom that cannot be curtailed without the procedural protections of notice and hearing. . . Yet, when confronted with the failure to release a person because of an error in the computation of his sentence, we have relied on the principles of the Eighth Amendment. . . Other circuits have employed a variety of approaches invoking Eighth Amendment and due process protections. . . Recently, however, the Supreme Court held that the treatment of a pretrial prisoner is governed by the substantive standards of the Due Process Clause. See Kingsley v. Hendrickson, 135 S. Ct. 2466, 2473 (2015). . . . Another consideration further convinces us that we should not attempt to reconcile these governing principles here. Mr. Werner has presented the due process argument to us solely as a matter of procedural due process, but we think that Kingsley, McNeil, and Baker suggest that substantive due process principles are implicated here. Rather than resolve definitively that question in a case in which counsel has not squarely raised the issue, we believe the proper course is to focus on the second prong of the qualified immunity inquiry and to determine whether the contours of the right involved were clearly established at the time of the defendants' actions. . . . For the reasons set forth below, we conclude that a reasonable official would not have known that detaining Mr. Werner pursuant to AD 02-10 was legally impermissible. . . . The Wisconsin Supreme Court's reasoning in Riesch confirms that Olson and Allen had not put the precise situation addressed by AD 02-10 'beyond debate' in Wisconsin. . . Riesch marked the first time that a Wisconsin court had focused on the inherent conflict between a sex offender's right to timely release to supervision and the rules and restrictions governing that release. The Wisconsin Supreme Court's treatment of this dilemma demonstrates that 'the right's contours were [not] sufficiently definite that' the defendants in this case would have been on notice that AD 02-10's procedure was unlawful. . . Riesch made clear that the DOC's inability to locate appropriate housing does not afford it a blank check to detain indefinitely an individual set for release from imprisonment. However, the Wisconsin Supreme Court was cognizant of the practical difficulties that can arise when release itself conflicts with the 'substantial discretionary authority' that DOC has 'to develop the rules and conditions for releas[ing]' a person to supervision. . . Rather than prohibit absolutely the DOC from detaining individuals caught in this predicament, Riesch endorsed a narrow exception: 'Where inmates violate these terms immediately and simultaneously with their scheduled mandatory release dates, the DOC should be able to maintain continuous custody.'. . Riesch therefore can be read plausibly as acknowledging that, under Wisconsin law, the DOC may 'maintain continuous custody' in the unique circumstance where release from imprisonment to a lesser level of restraint would violate the terms of release due to an inability to make practical arrangements for the implementation of that lesser restraint. . . Here, although Mr. Werner's probation violation was not, in strict terms, 'immediate [ ] and simultaneous[ ],' it was, as a practical matter, an imminent certainty. . . And although his infraction was not, like Riesch's, the product of his recalcitrance, releasing Mr. Werner to probation equally would have 'elevate[d] form over substance' to require 'a ritual where the DOC releases [noncompliant] inmates just outside the prison walls on their mandatory release dates before subsequently' detaining them. . .

To be sure, the length of deferral of release from imprisonment in this case may well have been a fairly aggressive reading of Riesch. . . However, given the lack of clarity with respect to Riesch's outer limits, 'we cannot say that only someone plainly incompetent or who knowingly violate[s] the law would have ... acted as [the defendants] did.'. . . Because clearly established law at the time would not have notified the defendants in this case that the procedures set forth in AD 02-10 were unlawful, we conclude that they are entitled to qualified immunity on Mr. Werner's claims.")

Werner v. Wall, 836 F.3d 751, 766-70 (7th Cir. 2016) (Hamilton, J., dissenting in part) ("I respectfully dissent from my colleagues' decision to grant qualified immunity to the policy-making defendants, Hamblin, Snyder Spaar, and Symdon. They adopted and enforced Administrative Directive 02-10. That policy was unconstitutional as applied to someone like Werner, who had reached his mandatory release date and who, through no fault of his own, was unable to find housing that satisfied both local laws and state parole officials. Pursuant to that policy, Werner spent 54 weeks in a county jail when that custody was clearly not authorized by state law. Werner was deprived of his liberty without due process of law. . . .For more than a year neither Werner nor anyone helping him could find lawful and suitable housing for him. Werner was kept in custody pursuant to the policy that the defendants adopted and enforced. That policy was unconstitutional and contrary to state law even when it was issued in 2002. To extend qualified immunity to these defendants, though, the majority errs by relying upon a more recent decision by the Wisconsin Supreme Court, State ex rel. Riesch v. Schwarz, 692 N.W.2d 219 (Wis. 2005). As explained below, the state court in Riesch took care to distinguish its decision from cases like Werner's, in which offenders who reach their release dates are cooperative with efforts to supervise them. Plaintiff Werner committed serious crimes and was punished severely for them. As a plaintiff, he is singularly unsympathetic. He earned his designation as a 'Special Bulletin Notification' offender by committing multiple sex offenses against children. Both during and after the period in question here, he has repeatedly violated the law. He is now back in prison after another crime. Nevertheless, the legal issues in his case extend beyond Mr. Werner and his crimes. Under the state law governing his conviction and punishment, when Werner reached his mandatory release date, he was entitled to be released from custody, subject to conditions of parole. As the majority opinion recounts, he was not released but was instead locked up in a county jail. He was kept in jail 148 out of 168 hours each week. The remaining 20 hours he was allowed to leave the jail with a chaperone to accomplish the nearly impossible job of finding housing that would comply with all the local laws applicable to convicted sex offenders and with the state's conditions of parole. More than a year after his initial 'release' to the county jail, he finally found housing that satisfied all the criteria. . . . Werner's continued custody in the county jail—and 'custody' is the only way to describe those 148 hours per week—was not authorized by state law or by a court judgment after due process of law. He was quite simply deprived of his liberty without due process of law. Executive branch officials are not authorized to lock people up indefinitely without prior court authorization. The ability to seek a writ of habeas corpus later does not mean the initial deprivation occurs with due process of law. And even a parolee, whose liberty is conditional and constrained, cannot have his parole revoked and his liberty taken away without due process of law. . . I recognize that the combination of local laws in Brown County and the needs of effective parole supervision placed the defendants at all levels of the Wisconsin parole system in a tough spot. If they had faced Werner's situation without guidance from state law, a defense of qualified immunity would have more merit. But the slate was not clean. Similar problems had arisen before. The state courts had squarely rejected the solution of keeping offenders like Werner in custody past their mandatory release dates. . . .The Wisconsin Court of Appeals held not only that Allen had stated a claim for violation of his constitutional rights but that the violation was so clearly established that defendants were not entitled to qualified immunity: 'We agree with Allen that Woods and Olson clearly established' that Allen was entitled to release on parole on his mandatory release date. . .The Allen court then rejected a further qualified immunity argument that is echoed in this case. The argument is that because some cases found unauthorized continued custody violated the Eighth Amendment while others found it violated the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the controlling law was not 'clearly established.' The Wisconsin Court of Appeals correctly found in Allen that the unlawfulness of the continued custody was clearly established in 2000 despite doctrinal arguments about whether it violated one or both amendments. The application of two basic liberties does not weaken the case. It strengthens it. The Allen court concluded, as we should, 'that no reasonable public official could have believed that such continued detention was constitutionally permissible.'. .The qualified immunity presents an unusual wrinkle here. Qualified immunity doctrine often indulges in the legal fiction of assuming that official defendants are aware of applicable court decisions. Here, there was no fiction at all. The policy-making defendants issued AD 02-10 after both Woods and Olson had been decided. The policy even cited both decisions, yet purported to authorize continued custody in the teeth of those decisions. To avoid reversing the judgment for the policy-making defendants, the majority invokes qualified immunity based on the Wisconsin Supreme Court's 2005 decision in Riesch, 692 N.W.2d 219, or, more precisely, based on what the majority generously calls 'a fairly aggressive reading' of Riesch. A qualified immunity defense is supposed to be based upon objectively reasonable interpretations of existing law. . . Using Riesch as a qualified immunity lifeline for the policy-making defendants is not objectively reasonable. The majority first overlooks the critical distinction drawn by the Riesch court itself and then attributes to the Wisconsin Supreme Court in Riesch an internal contradiction and confusion that simply are not present. In fact, Riesch expressly agreed with Woods and Olson and took care to distinguish Riesch's case on grounds that apply directly here. It is no surprise that neither the district court nor the defendants, in their brief to this court or in letters to plaintiff, relied on Riesch to justify qualified immunity. Like Werner, Riesch was a sex offender who was nearing his mandatory release date. Unlike Werner, though, Riesch did not cooperate with the release and supervision process. He announced that he would not participate in the sex offender treatment program that was required as a condition of parole. He refused to provide medical information or his signature on his fingerprint record. His behavior was such that the assigned parole agent was unwilling to meet with him unless he were shackled, and he refused. Riesch had his parole revoked without ever actually leaving state custody. In his challenge to the revocation, he relied on Woods and Olson to argue that he had never actually been paroled, so that his parole could not be revoked and he should be released. The Wisconsin Supreme Court affirmed the denial of relief, but on narrow grounds that distinguished both Woods and Olson on grounds that apply directly here. The Riesch court explained: 'Woods and Olson are unlike the present case because the inmates in those cases did nothing to warrant their continued detention at the time of their mandatory release date. In contrast, the inmate in the Macemon cases, like Riesch, violated the conditions of his parole immediately and simultaneously with his mandatory release date.' . . At least after Woods, Olson, and Allen, and certainly in light of the distinction drawn in Riesch, reasonable policy-making officials could not have believed that they were authorized to keep offenders like Werner in jail after their mandatory release dates. Instead, they doggedly stuck to the policy, even telling Werner that 'Case law upholds the procedures' of AD 02-10, without identifying the case law. . . The policy-making defendants should have known that AD 02-10 would result in unconstitutional deprivations of liberty in cases like Werner's, where the parolee did not deliberately fail to comply with parole conditions. I would allow the qualified immunity defense for the local parole agents and their supervisors who had been ordered to implement AD 02-10, but we should reverse for trial on the claims against the policy-making defendants.")

> See also Murphy v. Madigan, No. 16 C 11471, 2017 WL 3581175, at *7-8 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 18, 2017) ("Werner acknowledged, but never resolved, the 'difficult question' as to whether the treatment of detained individuals not subject to sentences of incarceration, like the Plaintiffs in this case, is appropriately analyzed under the Eighth Amendment or substantive due process. . . For example, an error in the computation of a sentence implicates the Eighth Amendment while treatment of a pretrial prisoner is governed by substantive standards of Due Process. . . Ultimately, the appellate court found defendants were entitled to qualified immunity and never attempted to reconcile the constitutional tension. Nevertheless, Werner contemplates that the same factual nucleus might raise both Eighth Amendment and substantive due process principles. Certainly at this early stage of litigation, Plaintiffs' claims are not sufficiently developed to determine whether the claims fit more properly under substantive due process or the Eighth Amendment. A plaintiff is allowed to plead duplicative claims or claims in the alternative: '[a] party may set out 2 or more statements of a claim … alternatively or hypothetically, either in a single count … or in separate ones.' Fed. R. Civ. P. 8(d)(2). The argument the claim is duplicative holds no water and Plaintiffs' may proceed on their substantive due process claims. . . .According to the Complaint, Defendants knew that Plaintiffs did not have financial resources to find housing, that there are no halfway houses that take sex-offenders in Illinois, and still rejected proposed host sites leading to indefinite incarceration. Based on these allegations, it is hard to envision an acceptable host site for an indigent prisoner: to find a house in 2017 without a smart phone is in it of itself a near impossible task. Taken together with the wide discretion Defendants have in making their housing determinations, the rejections of host sites which results in Plaintiffs' indefinite incarceration may constitute deliberate indifference. . . These allegations are therefore sufficient to support their Eighth Amendment claim.")

Dibble v. Quinn, 793 F.3d 803, 807, 814 (7th Cir. 2015) ("We have discretion to decide a case under the second step 'without resolving the often more difficult question whether the purported right exists at all.'. . We take that approach here. . . .Here, we have found no case clearly establishing that motive is relevant to determining whether a validly enacted statutory amendment eliminating an employee's property interest complies with procedural due process requirements. While Schulz suggested that such a pretext inquiry might be appropriate for a 'purportedly legislative decision,' it did not grapple with Bogan or cases like it, which tend to bar this type of judicial inquiry because of the special nature of legislative action. The dictum in Schulz falls well short of placing the 'constitutional question beyond debate.'. .None of this is to say, however, that there is no support for a distinction between bona fide legislation and an adjudicative determination dressed up in legislative clothing. Drawing this line can be difficult and can have broad implications. . . .We express no view on whether a plaintiff in other circumstances might be able to make out a constitutional claim. We hold only that plaintiffs have failed to demonstrate a clearly established right that was violated by legislation ending their six-year terms as arbitrators. Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Locke v. Haessig, 788 F.3d 662, 667-73 (7th Cir. 2015) ("Here we take the unusual step of beginning with the second prong because our discussion of the state of the law in 2007 and 2008 provides helpful context for analysis of later developments in the law. . . . If we accept the facts asserted by Locke, Haessig's actions violated clearly established law at time of the violation. In 2007 and 2008, when the events took place, it was well established that sexual harassment by a state actor under color of state law violated the Equal Protection Clause and was actionable under § 1983. Valentine v. City of Chicago, 452 F.3d 670, 682 (7th Cir.2006); Bohen v. City of East Chicago, 799 F.2d 1180, 1185–86 (7th Cir.1986). It was also clear that a supervisor could be held liable for a subordinate's sexual harassment if the plaintiff could show either intentional sex discrimination or a conscious failure to protect the plaintiff from abusive conditions created by subordinates amounting to intentional discrimination. Valentine, 452 F.3d at 683–84; Bohen, 799 F.2d at 1187; see also T.E. v. Grindle, 599 F.3d 583, 588 (7th Cir.2010) . . . .By 2007, we had recognized that males who were sexually harassed could bring equal protection claims if they could show intentional discrimination on the basis of their sex. We reversed a grant of summary judgment where a male plaintiff presented evidence that school officials ignored his complaints of sexual harassment by male classmates but consistently punished the harassers when similar complaints were made by girls. Nabozny v. Podlesny, 92 F.3d 446, 454–56 (7th Cir.1996). It was also well established in 2007 and 2008, however, that a supervisor was not liable under a respondeat superior theory for constitutional torts committed by a subordinate. . . And a merely negligent failure to intervene was not enough to show discrimination that violated the Equal Protection Clause. . . A reasonable official in Haessig's position would have known that her alleged conduct was unconstitutional. . . Accepting Locke's version of the facts, Haessig was more than merely negligent. She failed to intervene or investigate in response to Locke's complaint, and she then threatened to retaliate against him for complaining of harassment. . . . As in Valentine, a jury could infer that Haessig had 'consciously chosen not to protect' Locke from the sexual harassment and on that basis hold Haessig liable for intentional sex discrimination. . . After Valentine, it should have been clear to a reasonable officer that Haessig's alleged conduct was unlawful in this situation. . . Haessig cannot claim the protection of qualified immunity on the ground that she had no notice that her actions were unlawful. . . .Haessig could still be entitled to qualified immunity if the undisputed facts show that her conduct violates no constitutional right under current law. In other words, if developments in constitutional law since 2008 mean that Haessig's conduct did not violate any constitutional right, she would be entitled to summary judgment even if her conduct was unlawful under prevailing law in 2008. Haessig contends that her conduct violated no constitutional right because the facts show that she did not have the intent to discriminate that Ashcroft v. Iqbal, decided in 2009, now requires for supervisory liability for constitutional violations. . . .For discrimination claims like those at issue in Iqbal and here, where the state of mind of purposeful discrimination is an element of the violation, a supervisor is liable only if she had the specific intent to discriminate. . . For these claims, the plaintiff must show 'more than "intent as volition or intent as awareness of consequences."'. . . The supervisor is liable for undertaking a course of action only because of, not merely in spite of, the action's adverse effects upon an identifiable group. . . Although Iqbal involved a claim of invidious discrimination, the Court's discussion shaped the law of supervisory liability for constitutional violations more generally. Before Iqbal, most circuits required that a supervisor act (or fail to act) with the state of mind of deliberate indifference to be liable, no matter the underlying constitutional violation. . . .After Iqbal, we re-examined the state of mind required for supervisory liability for sexual harassment in T.E. v. Grindle, 599 F.3d 583 (7th Cir.2010). . . . Haessig argues that Iqbal and Grindle together mean that there is a constitutional difference between action and inaction—that purposeful discrimination may be inferred from the former but not the latter. She contends the district court erred as a matter of law in holding that a jury could find Haessig liable for an equal protection violation for purposefully ignoring Locke's complaint of harassment. . .We have doubts about this argument. For one, there is little support in these cases for a distinction between action and inaction. Haessig points us to the Supreme Court's statement that purposeful discrimination 'involves a decisionmaker's undertaking a course of action because of ... the action's adverse effects upon an identifiable group.'. . Haessig seizes on one phrase, 'course of action,' as implying that a supervisor who takes no action cannot, as a matter of law, intend discrimination. We reject such an expansive reading of Iqbal. Haessig's argument conflicts with the principle that a supervisor could be liable for ignoring complaints from one identifiable group while acting on similar complaints from those of another group. . . . Short perhaps only of a confession of intentional discrimination, selective inaction can be strong evidence of discriminatory intent. In any event, Locke has provided evidence that tends to show that Haessig's response was more than mere inaction. A reasonable jury could infer that Haessig had the requisite intent to discriminate because she threatened to retaliate against Locke after he complained of sexual harassment. . . . Locke may submit his evidence to a jury and can prevail if he can convince the jury that Haessig treated Locke's complaint differently because he was a man complaining of sexual harassment. Locke does not need to prove that Haessig was motivated solely by his sex in the way that she responded to his complaint, but he must show that she chose her course of action at least in part because of his sex.") Gerhartz v. Richert, 779 F.3d 682, 687-89 & n.10 (7th Cir. 2015) ("Following Schmerber, several courts read the Supreme Court's decision as endorsing a per se exigency rule in blood-alcohol cases—that is, that the natural dissipation of alcohol from the blood constitutes a per se exigency. . . Notably, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin was among those that took this view, declaring in State v. Bohling, 494 N.W.2d 399 (Wis.1993), that the exigency identified in Schmerber 'was caused solely by the fact that the amount of alcohol in a person's blood stream diminishes over time.'. . The Supreme Court rejected this understanding of Schmerber in McNeely. In McNeely, the Court clarified that, 'while the natural dissipation of alcohol in the blood may support a finding of exigency in a specific case, as it did in Schmerber, it does not do so categorically.'. . Thus, the Court explained, '[w]hether a warrantless blood test of a drunk-driving suspect is reasonable must be determined case by case based on the totality of the circumstances.'. . Mr. Gerhartz contends that the district court awarded summary judgment based on the same per se exigency theory rejected in McNeely and that, under McNeely, summary judgment was improper because there existed a genuine dispute as to whether exigent circumstances were present. In response, Deputy Richert and Sergeant Tyson contend, as they did before the district court, that their decision to order a blood draw on Mr. Gerhartz was lawful and that, in any event, they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Here, because of the undeveloped nature of the factual record, we start (and end) our analysis with the clearly-established prong. During the parties' briefing of this case, we decided a similar issue. In Seiser v. City of Chicago, 762 F.3d 647 (7th Cir.2014), we held that, prior to the Supreme Court's decision in McNeely, the law was not clearly established on the issue of whether the natural dissipation of alcohol from the bloodstream constitutes a per se exigency. . . In arriving at this conclusion, we noted that, prior to McNeely, courts were split over this issue and that many jurisdictions—like Illinois, where the search in Seiser took place—had adopted a per se exigency rule in blood-alcohol cases. . . Given these circumstances, the court determined that a reasonable officer in the defendant's position 'would have believed ... that so long as there was probable cause to justify a breathalyzer examination, there was no need to consider seeking a warrant first.'. . Although the intrusiveness of a search is certainly relevant to its reasonableness under the Fourth Amendment, Mr. Gerhartz has not identified any clearly established authority that would have put the defendants on notice that their decision to order a warrantless blood draw (as opposed a breathalyzer test) was unlawful. Nor could he. At the time McNeely was decided, the law regarding exigent circumstances in blood-alcohol cases was just as unclear with regard to blood draws as breathalyzer tests. Indeed, both McNeely and Schmerber concerned warrantless blood draws rather than breathalyzer tests. . . .Rather, we conclude that Seiser is controlling in this case. Here, the search at issue took place in Wisconsin on February 16, 2006. At this time, approximately seven years before McNeely, Wisconsin case law recognized a per se exigency rule in blood-alcohol cases. See Bohling, 494 N.W.2d at 402. . . Thus, Deputy Richert and Sergeant Tyson faced the same lack of clearly established law that confronted the defendants in Seiser. As such, they are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Having decided that Deputy Richert and Sergeant Tyson's conduct did not contravene any clearly established law, we need not decide whether their actions in fact violated Mr. Gerhartz's Fourth Amendment rights. Because the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, the judgment of the district court is affirmed. . . .In highlighting the defendants' reasonable reliance on State v. Bohling, 494 N.W.2d 399 (Wis.1993), we do not mean to suggest that a state supreme court decision always will prove sufficient to demonstrate the absence of clearly established law. Crucially, at the time of the defendants' actions in this case,

Mordi v. Zeigler, 770 F.3d 1161, 1165-67 (7th Cir. 2014) ("There was a time when lower courts were required to follow a prescribed sequence when they considered the two questions pertinent to qualified immunity, always deciding first if the alleged facts described a legal violation, and only if they did, moving on to the question whether the law was clearly established. . . The Court thought better of this requirement in Pearson, however, and it is now permissible to reach the second question first, if that is more efficient. . . The present case, we conclude, is one that benefits from the flexibility afforded in Pearson. We thus move directly to the question whether Officers Zeigler, Chance, and Healey should have realized that, by failing to inform Mordi of his Article 36 rights, they were violating his rights. . . .At a high level of generality, one might think that federal, state, and local officials all should know the laws of the United States, including its treaties, and thus all should be held accountable if they fail to discharge 'known' duties like this one. But the Supreme Court has told us that this is not the correct perspective. Instead, for purposes of the present case, we must ask at least the following more specific questions: (1) does Article 36 impose a duty on an arresting officer like Zeigler to ascertain nationality at the moment of arrest; (2) does it require an arresting officer like Zeigler to notify the arrestee of possible Convention rights before it is necessary to give Miranda warnings, or before he knows whether the arrestee is from a Convention country; (3) does the treaty require an Article 36 notification prior to booking, by any and all officers who have contact with the arrestee; and (4) does the treaty require notification before an interview can take place? A common theme runs through these questions: what does it mean to inform someone 'without delay'? A second general issue relates to personal responsibility. The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that section 1983 'will not support a claim based on a respondeat superior theory of liability.'. . Do Convention responsibilities attach to persons like the Officers here, who simply arrested, transported, and briefly interrogated the suspect? If so, then liability is at least possible; but if not, then these defendants cannot be held vicariously responsible for the failure of another party (perhaps the booking officer or the arraigning magistrate) to convey the required information. Existing opinions do not offer much guidance on the answers to the questions we just posed. It appears, however, that 'without delay' does not mean 'instantly.'. . .It is impossible, in light of all this, to say that the law that Officer Zeigler faced was 'clearly established' such that he should have known that he had a personal duty to ascertain Mordi's citizenship and then to notify Mordi about his right to consular notification under Article 36 of the Convention at the moment of arrest, or at least by the time he delivered Mordi to the police station and left him in the interrogation room. . . .Officers Chance and Healey's role was different, but the bottom line is the same. . . . If Mordi had sued the booking officers, we might need to consider this question in greater detail, but they are no longer in the case. The interpretation and implementation of the Convention touch on the diplomatic relations of the United States, and so we think it prudent to tread carefully here. All we need to say to resolve this case is that the details of how to implement the Article 36 duty to inform the arrestee of his rights without delay have yet to be fixed. There is no clearly established law that the three Officers before us violated, and thus they are entitled to qualified immunity from suit.")

Gibbs v. Lomas, 755 F.3d 529, 539-42 (7th Cir. 2014) ("Subsection 947.01(2) was enacted in 2011 as part of a larger act that expanded concealed carry rights in Wisconsin. . . The Wisconsin courts have not yet answered important questions about this subsection, such as whether the type of conduct at issue here is 'carrying' or 'going armed' or is more properly categorized as unprotected conduct punishable under the disorderly conduct statute. . . . We think it would be imprudent to base our decision on speculation about the appropriate scope of the Wisconsin statute. In our view, the second section of the disorderly conduct statute poses significant interpretative problems that are best answered by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin. Including the conduct at issue here within the scope of subsection 947.01(2) would no doubt have significant ramifications on issues of state and municipal governance in matters of public safety. In this age of 'road rage' and similar motorist misbehavior, an individual's driving around at a high speed while holding an unholstered weapon in plain view of other motorists raises serious issues of public safety. Whether such activity constitutes merely 'carrying[ ] or going armed' should be decided, if at all possible, by a state court far more familiar with the exigencies of state and local governance and far more familiar with the legislative practice of its state. If it were necessary to construe the problematic statutory language in order to resolve this case, we well might consider using the certification privilege accorded to us by the Wisconsin legislature. . . However, such a necessity is not upon us since the second prong of the established qualified immunity analysis affords a solid basis for decision. '[I]t is apparent that the alleged right at issue [was] not clearly established' at the time Officer Lomas acted. . . .We are convinced that Mr. Gibbs did not meet his burden of refuting Officer Lomas's qualified immunity defense either by 'identifying a closely analogous case or by persuading the court that the [officer's] conduct [wa]s so egregious and unreasonable that, notwithstanding the lack of an analogous decision, no reasonable officer could have thought [s]he was acting lawfully.'. . Instead of identifying an analogous case, Mr. Gibbs—like the district court—points to an informal Advisory Memorandum by the Wisconsin Attorney General. . . . The Advisory Memorandum is not, of course, the sort of definitive statement of the law by the courts that would make a constitutional violation 'clearly established.'. . . Nor is this the sort of case where Officer Lomas's conduct was so egregious as to be recognized universally by law enforcement officers as unlawful. Rather, as we have suggested earlier, a reasonable police officer—indeed, a reasonable court—could believe that, under the facts described above, far more than the statutorily exempted activity of 'loading, carrying, or going armed with a firearm' was taking place. Despite Mr. Gibbs's repeated contentions that he was 'just driving,' he obviously was doing more than that. Indeed, his conduct also was sufficient for a reasonable officer to conclude—in the absence of any guidance from the Wisconsin courts—that a criminal or malicious intent was present, thus removing any protection that subsection 947.01(2) would otherwise have given Mr. Gibbs. . . .Based on the facts known to Officer Lomas about Mr. Gibbs's behavior, it would have taken no more than an adjustment of his hand position before the gun was pointed out the window of his vehicle or even at himself. A reasonable officer in Officer Lomas's shoes could have interpreted Mr. Gibbs's conduct as motivated by an intent to harm himself or others. In sum, even if Officer Lomas was mistaken in believing that she had probable cause to arrest Mr. Gibbs, such a mistake was reasonable in light of the facts and circumstances of this case and in light of the undeveloped case law regarding subsection 947.01(2). Consequently, contrary to the conclusion of the district court, Officer Lomas was entitled to qualified immunity for her arrest of Mr. Gibbs.")

White v. Stanley, 745 F.3d 237, 241, 242 (7th Cir. 2014) ("[P]olice who simply smell burning marijuana generally face no exigency and must get a warrant to enter the home. But the lack of an exigency does not end the inquiry in this case, for the deputies still prevail if the right they violated was not clearly established at the time of the violation. . . .The necessary inquiry in this case is whether it was clearly established on March 9, 2010 that the smell of burning marijuana, standing alone, was no exigency. During the court's discussion of whether or not the smell of burning marijuana established an exigency, it noted that 'courts who have addressed [the issue] have answered that question in varied and conflicting ways, and there does not appear to be a universal, or even majority, approach to this question.' The district court was right—federal and state courts have been all over the map on this issue. . . .In light of this fractured case law, we cannot say that 'at the time of the challenged conduct, the contours of [White's] right [were] sufficiently clear' such that 'every reasonable official would have understood' that entering the home after smelling the burning marijuana violated the right. . . It follows that the deputies are entitled to qualified immunity. Future police officers faced with a situation like the one confronting Stanley and Morrison should not feel emboldened to act as the deputies did here. Henceforth, officers who make a warrantless entry under the circumstances found in this case should expect no shelter from liability.")

Findlay v. Lendermon, 722 F.3d 895, 899, 900 (7th Cir. 2013) ("Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 242–43 (2009), encouraged courts to begin with the substantive constitutional violation, but we remain free to consider first whether the right is clearly established if doing so will conserve judicial resources. We find it economical to do so here and thus consider only whether Findlay has shown that the alleged constitutional violation—tackling a suspect under the circumstances presented in this case—was clearly established. . . . Because he has neither identified a sufficiently analogous case nor adequately explained how Lendermon's actions were so plainly excessive that any reasonable officer would know it violated the constitution, he cannot defeat Lendermon's qualified immunity defense. . . .In reaching this conclusion, we do not suggest that no 'plainly excessive' argument could ever be made from the facts as Findlay presents them. But the burden to make this showing rests squarely on Findlay. He has not done so and therefore cannot prevail.")

Thayer v. Chiczewski, 705 F.3d 237, 249-51 (7th Cir. 2012) (granting panel rehearing, amending opinion to recognize assertion of Monell claims, and remanding for further proceedings on Monell claims) ("Lyttle was acquitted of the offense of disorderly conduct, but the question is not whether he violated the ordinance, it's whether an officer at the time could reasonably believe he was committing an offense. To require dispersal under subsection (d), officers had to reasonably believe that three or more persons in the immediate vicinity were causing disorderly conduct likely to cause substantial harm or serious inconvenience, annoyance or alarm. We don't have to decide whether officers had probable cause to arrest, however, because we find that they had arguable probable cause to order dispersal and arrest Lyttle for his failure to comply. See Pearson v.

Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 235–36 (2009) (holding that we do not need to address whether a constitutional right was violated before addressing whether the right in question was sufficiently well established). . . . We further find that although it is questionable whether officers had probable cause to arrest Lyttle, they are nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity. Lyttle denies that he pushed any officer or blocked the sidewalk and at the time he was arrested, there was no indication that other protestors were attempting to follow him; in fact, most of the protestors had started dispersing in the other direction, and the sidewalk was clearing. No city ordinance requires a permit for an individual to walk down the sidewalk with a protest sign. Officer Chiczewski and Officer Killacky even testified that there was nothing illegal about people walking down Michigan Avenue carrying signs and that the protestors could disperse in any direction. Cf. Weiss, 281 N.E.2d at 315 (officers could order defendant to disperse in certain direction when attempting to block a group of 3,000 demonstrators from marching into a densely populated area). The officers, however, did not violate clearly established rights of which a reasonable person would have known. Officers could reasonably (again, even if mistakenly) believe that based on their announcements and conduct in forming a line to advance the crowd west that protestors were prohibited from breaking through the police line. In fact, most protestors at the time obeyed by heading west. Lyttle was part of the group of protestors ordered to disperse and Officer Killackey could reasonably believe that Lyttle heard the dispersal order. Cf. Vodak, 639 F.3d at 746. When Lyttle attempted to cross the police line, he was told he could not continue and he responded that he had the right to proceed. A reasonable officer under this chaotic and fluid situation could have believed that Lyttle was failing to follow their orders. Officers did not have to wait for Lyttle to actually break through the police line. At the time of Lyttle's arrest, the officers were still trying to manage the crowd; forming a police line and ordering dispersal toward the permitted location of the march was the most logical way to accomplish this goal. . . . Under these circumstances, we cannot find that it would have been clear to every reasonable officer that no probable cause existed to arrest Lyttle for disobeying their order. . . . The existence of arguable probable cause to arrest Lyttle is an absolute bar to his § 1983 claim for unlawful arrest and false imprisonment.")

Thayer v. Chiczewski, 705 F.3d 237, 252, 253 (7th Cir. 2012) (granting panel rehearing, amending opinion to recognize assertion of Monell claims, and remanding for further proceedings on Monell claims) ("Thayer does not dispute that Officer Chiczewski had probable cause for his arrest. Probable cause, if not a complete bar to Thayer's First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim, provides strong evidence that he would have been arrested regardless of any illegitimate animus. See Reichle v. Howards, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2095–97 (2012); see also Hernandez v. Cook Cnty. Sheriff's Office, 634 F.3d 906, 915 (7th Cir.2011) ("[E]vidence of probable cause may act as highly valuable circumstantial evidence that the complained-of conduct would have occurred even without a retaliatory motive.") (quotations omitted). The record shows that Thayer's refusal to disperse, not his speech, was the 'but for' cause of his arrest. But even if the record permitted a competing inference in favor of Thayer, Officer Chiczewski is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The case law is unsettled on whether probable cause is a complete bar to First Amendment retaliatory arrest claims. The Supreme Court has said that it is a bar to retaliatory prosecution claims. See Hartman, 547 U.S. at 261. We have not resolved the issue, see Hernandez, 634 F.3d at 915 (citing a 2002 case from this circuit), and other circuits are split, see, e.g., Skoog v. Cnty. of Clackamas, 469 F.3d 1221, 1232 & n. 31 (9th Cir.2006) (setting forth circuit split). . . . Based on the Court's decision in Reichle, Officer Chiczewski is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . A clearly established right is one that is sufficiently clear such that 'every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right.'. . As the Supreme Court held in Reichle, the 'clearly established' standard is not met in this case because neither our circuit nor the Supreme Court has 'recognized a First Amendment right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is supported by probable cause.'. . . Lyttle similarly argues that Officers Killackey and Shields arrested him in retaliation for exercising his free speech rights to march down the sidewalk of Michigan Avenue with an anti-war sign. We found that the officers had arguable probable cause to arrest Lyttle under subsection (d) and we see no reason to distinguish Reichle on that basis. In any event, the record is void of evidence showing that the officers acted with retaliatory animus in arresting him.")

Thayer v. Chiczewski, 705 F.3d 237, 254-56 (7th Cir. 2012) (granting panel rehearing, amending opinion to recognize assertion of Monell claims, and remanding for further proceedings on Monell claims) ("Unfortunately, the class-of-one standard in this circuit is in flux. Thayer must show that he was intentionally treated differently from other similarly situated individuals and that there was no rational basis for this difference in treatment. . . But some of our cases also require a showing of improper motive (sometimes referred to as 'illegitimate animus'). . . Our recent attempt to clarify the standard in Del Marcelle v. Brown Cnty. Corp., 680 F.3d 887 (7th Cir.2012) (en banc) resulted in a tie vote with no controlling opinion. We therefore remain divided over the appropriate standard for a class-of-one equal protection claim against law enforcement personnel. . . .We do not need to decide what standard announced in Del Marcelle is correct because we find that Officer Chiczewski is entitled to qualified immunity. As we have already alluded to, this protection gives officers 'breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments, and protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . We ask whether every reasonable officer would have understood that what he was doing violates that right. . . .Even considering all the facts in favor of Thayer, we cannot conclude that every reasonable officer would have understood that by arresting Thayer, the perceived 'chief" of the group, and not Massey and Jakes that Officer Chiczewski was violating Thayer's right to equal protection. . . Given the uncertainly in the law and the unique factual situation at issue here, the constitutional question was not beyond dispute. . . . Rather, a reasonable officer could have believed that arresting Thayer was the most effective way to gain compliance with the dispersal order.")

Miller v. Harbaugh, 698 F.3d 956, 962, 964 (7th Cir. 2012) ("We are . . . free to decide first whether the right that Miller has alleged was clearly established. In undertaking this analysis, it is critical to find the correct level of specificity. It is not enough, for instance, to say that it is clearly established that those operating detention facilities must not engage in cruel or unusual punishment. The way that the right is translated into the particular setting makes a difference. The plaintiff must show that the contours of the right are 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . .Even if IYC St. Charles's decision to use the metal bunk beds in rooms occupied by mentally disturbed, but not imminently suicidal, residents amounted to deliberate indifference, and thus amounted to a violation of Jamal's constitutional rights, the law in this area was not clearly established enough to defeat the supervisory defendants' claim of qualified immunity.")

Alexander v. McKinney, 692 F.3d 553, 555, 557 & n.2, 558 (7th Cir. 2012) ("[T]he district court found that McKinney was entitled to qualified immunity because Alexander did not allege that he was deprived of a cognizable constitutional right. The only constitutional right that Alexander identified, his 'due process rights to not be deprived of his liberty premised upon manufactured false evidence,' was insufficient to state a claim under our circuit's case law. . . . On appeal, Alexander argues that the district court erred in finding that McKinney was entitled to qualified immunity because his complaint adequately alleged a deprivation of a constitutional right, namely that the manufacturing of false evidence resulting in his arrest and charges being brought against him deprived him of liberty in violation of his substantive due process rights. . . For the following reasons, we disagree. . . .In both Zahrey and Whitlock, the alleged liberty deprivation came not from the initial arrest, but from the time spent in confinement after arrest—the eight months Zahrey spent in jail after having his bail revoked and the numerous years Whitlock and Steidl spent in prison after being wrongfully convicted. . . Zahrey and Whitlock are inapposite because the only liberty deprivation Alexander alleges stems from his initial arrest—he was released on bond that same day. . . . Nor does the burden of appearing in court and attending trial, in and of itself, constitute a deprivation of liberty. [citing cases] It would be anomalous to hold that attending a trial deprives a criminal defendant of liberty without due process of law, when the purpose of the trial is to effectuate due process. . . .The Fourth Amendment, not the due process clause, is the proper basis for challenging the lawfulness of an arrest. . . . Alexander cannot recast his untimely Fourth Amendment claim, thereby circumventing the statute of limitations, by combining it with a state law malicious prosecution claim and simply changing the label of the claim to substantive due process.")

Paine v. Cason, 678 F.3d 500, 509, 510 (7th Cir. 2012), as amended on denial of rehearing and rehearing en banc (May 17, 2012) ("[W]e need not and do not decide whether—and, if so, when—there is a constitutional right to have custody prolonged so that more or better medical care may be provided. This is a qualified-immunity appeal, and the critical question is whether plaintiff's claim rests on a 'clearly established' right. See Messeschmidt v. Millender, 132 S.Ct. 1235, 1244–45 (2012). Paine relies principally on decisions such as Farmer and Ortiz that concern medical care during custody. She has not cited, and we did not find, cases establishing (clearly or otherwise) a right to be kept in custody, beyond the time when release otherwise would occur, so that medical care can be provided. . . . We arrive at Paine's third theory. The police arrested Eilman at Midway Airport, where she was safe, and let her go 7.3 miles away, just before nightfall, in a dangerous neighborhood. Data in the record show that sexual assaults are 15 times more common, per capita, in the precinct where Eilman was released than around Midway Airport. . . . It is clearly established that state actors who, without justification, increase a person's risk of harm violate the Constitution. . . . A detainee does not have a clearly established constitutional right that release be delayed pending mental-health treatment, but it is clearly established that the police may not create a danger, without justification, by arresting someone in a safe place and releasing her in a hazardous one while unable to protect herself, and it is also clearly established that police must arrange for medical treatment of serious conditions while custody continues.")

Gonzalez v. Village of West Milwaukee, 671 F.3d 649, 658-60 (7th Cir. 2012) ("Officers Krafcheck, Donovan, and Young were acting at a time of significant legal uncertainty about how to draw a difficult constitutional line; as such, qualified immunity applies. . . Although Gonzalez vigorously argues to the contrary, the right to openly carry a firearm was hardly well established under the state constitution at the time of his arrests. Until the 2011 amendment to section 947.01, the legal landscape was uncharted. Gonzalez also relies on the Second Amendment, but this argument is not well developed. Invoking District of Columbia v. Heller, 554 U.S. 570, 595 (2008), he argues that the core Second Amendment right to bear arms for self-defense must include the right to openly carry a holstered handgun. But Heller was decided after Gonzalez's arrest in West Milwaukee. And McDonald, 130 S.Ct. at 3050, which applied the Second Amendment to the States, was decided after both arrests. Whatever the Supreme Court's decisions in Heller and McDonald might mean for future questions about open-carry rights, for now this is unsettled territory. . . .The 'clearly established' inquiry in qualified-immunity analysis asks whether the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct would have been apparent to a reasonable officer in light of pre-existing law. . . Here, the most that can be said is that the officers failed to make a sensitive judgment about the effect of the state constitutional right to bear arms on the disorderly conduct statute and failed to predict Heller and McDonald. To the extent that any mistakes about probable cause were made, they were entirely understandable; state law was in flux, and the meaning and application of the Second Amendment was then under consideration by the Supreme Court. . . . Because open-carry rights were not clearly established under the state or federal constitutions at the time of Gonzalez's arrests, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity." footnotes omitted)

Marcavage v. City of Chicago, 659 F.3d 626, 636 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Although the constitutionality of the Policy remains in question, the arresting officer's objectively reasonable reliance on the permit requirement in effect at the time of the arrest is sufficient to shield him from liability under the doctrine of qualified immunity.")

Van den Bosch v. Raemisch, 658 F.3d 778, 786, 787, 789-91 (7th Cir. 2011) ("The Supreme Court has made clear that courts are free 'to exercise their sound discretion in deciding which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first.'. . In this case, we need only reach the question of whether the relevant facts 'make out a constitutional violation at all.'. . We hold they do not." Court went on to hold that (1) officials' decision to bar distribution of newsletter to prisoners did not violate the First Amendment; (2) officials' refusal to deliver copies of article that state prisoner had written to newsletter did not violate prisoner's First Amendment rights; and (3) DOC policy restricting prisoner's access to third-party mail did not violate First Amendment.)

Brooks v. City of Aurora, Ill., 653 F.3d 478, 486, 487 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Courts often have held that it is reasonable to use pepper spray against a suspect who is physically resisting arrest; . . . conversely, when the use of pepper spray is gratuitous or unprovoked, courts often have considered it excessive. . . As we have stated, a reasonable police officer could have believed that Mr. Brooks was resisting arrest. Although, at this stage of the litigation, we must believe Mr. Brooks when he says that he had communicated his willingness to submit to arrest, his actions readily could be construed to belie his words; indeed, Mr. Brooks employed a number of moves designed to thwart Officer Lill's attempts to take him into custody. Additionally, given the unique risks that effecting an in-home arrest warrant poses to the arresting officers, Officer Lill had a recognized interest in taking Mr. Brooks into custody outside his apartment. . . An officer, faced with a suspect fleeing toward his home and ignoring police commands, is not obliged to give that suspect an opportunity to retreat into his home and, perhaps, to fortify himself or to escape before the officer employs reasonable means of incapacitation. . . Mr. Brooks contends, however, that the pepper spray was not applied until he had ceased backtracking and was passively facing the officers, and this description of events at least arguably squares with the video. According to Mr. Brooks, pepper spray therefore was not needed to effect his arrest. We need not decide whether a constitutional violation occurred because we believe that it would not have been obvious to a reasonable police officer in Officer Lill's position that the application of pepper spray was unlawful. To be sure, whether and how much force is reasonable in a given situation can change as the situation develops, and what is appropriate at one point may be unnecessary later on. . . Yet controlling law would not have communicated to a reasonable officer the illegality of applying pepper spray to an arrestee who has ceased active, physical resistance for a couple of seconds but has not submitted to the officer's authority, has not been taken into custody and still arguably could pose a threat of flight or further resistance. Prior cases have charted only clearer waters.")

Hernandez v. Cook County Sheriff's Office, 634 F.3d 906, 915, 916 (7th Cir. 2011) ("We are able to determine as a matter of law, based purely on the undisputed facts presented to the district court, that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as to the plaintiffs' claim of retaliation based on workplace complaints. As noted, the district court reviewed the facts and concluded that based on the undisputed facts, the plaintiffs were acting as public employees when they complained about unsafe conditions at the jail. Specifically, in complaining about overcrowding, the lack of supervision and the need for Plexi-glas, the plaintiffs were acting pursuant to their duties as set forth in the CCSO's General Orders. Therefore, consistent with Spiegla I. . . the district court concluded that the plaintiffs did not enjoy First Amendment protections. The conclusion based on undisputed fact that the plaintiffs acted as public employees in complaining, which the district court found to be dispositive of the merits, is equally dispositive of the qualified immunity question that the district court might have been asking. The district court properly determined that there was no violation of a constitutional right; therefore, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim as a matter of law.")

Atkins v. City of Chicago, 631 F.3d 823, 829 (7th Cir. 2011) ("[T]here is no need to decide in this case whether there might be a constitutional entitlement to a judicial hearing in cases of alleged mistaken identity of parole violators. For even if the question were answered in the plaintiff's favor, it would not warrant any relief. The question is novel, and the defendants therefore protected from liability for damages for possibly answering it incorrectly by the doctrine of qualified immunity.")

Atkins v. City of Chicago, 631 F.3d 823, 832, 833, 837-39 (7th Cir. 2011) (Hamilton, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("I join the majority opinion in affirming the dismissal of Atkins' claims regarding his arrest and the conditions of his detention. I would resolve differently, however, Atkins' due process claim against the individual state officials. In my view, Atkins alleged sufficiently that he was deprived of liberty without due process of law when he was held by the state for more than 48 hours without a hearing before a judge. He was entitled to a hearing in which he could have shown that he was not the same William Atkins sought on the parole violation warrant or, if perhaps he was indeed the William Atkins sought (we cannot tell from the sparse record), that he was no longer on parole at the time of the alleged violation. I agree with my colleagues, however, that the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on that claim because the law was not and still is not sufficiently clear to impose individual liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983. I therefore concur in the judgment to affirm dismissal of the claim. . . . My colleagues ultimately decline to decide the merits of Atkins' due process claims but rely on the defense of qualified immunity to affirm the dismissal. I agree that qualified immunity applies and therefore concur in that portion of the opinion and in the judgment. But I believe that we should address the merits, for both substantive and procedural reasons. The substantive reasons are those I have explained above. My colleagues suggest, however, that we should know more about the relative merits of judicial and administrative decision-making before reaching the conclusion on the merits. After all, perhaps these identification issues are straightforward and suitable for administrative decision-making. Both judges and parole officials can make mistakes. The same argument could have been made in Gerstein and McLaughlin, however. The Supreme Court weighed the relevant constitutional interests in Gerstein and McLaughlin, and it chose judicial decision-making for good reasons. Gerstein and McLaughlin tell us that persons in the United States cannot be held in custody for more than 48 hours without requiring executive branch officials–like police or parole officers–to convince a judicial officer that there is good reason to hold the person. That rule does not disparage the abilities of executive decision-makers. The rule simply insists that executive branch actions to deprive a person of basic liberty must be subject to immediate and independent review. The rule recognizes human and institutional fallibility, as well as the value of review and accountability. . . If my conclusion on the merits of Atkins' claim is not correct, then an innocent, law-abiding person could be sent to prison without ever having a fact-finding hearing before a judge, let alone a jury trial. . . .There are also sound procedural reasons for deciding the merits before deciding qualified immunity here. After Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808 (2009), we are not required to decide the merits before we decide qualified immunity, but the choice is left to our sound discretion. . . . Unless and until this view of the merits is accepted, law-abiding citizens who are not on parole remain vulnerable to lengthy deprivations of liberty without due process of law and without effective remedy. Individual defendants will be protected from damages liability by qualified immunity, while state governments are protected from damages liability by the limits of 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and the Eleventh Amendment. . . . For these reasons, although the district court's dismissal was correct based on qualified immunity, I would also hold that Atkins alleged sufficiently that his right not to be deprived of his liberty without due process of law was violated when he was held for so long without being brought before a judge to determine whether there was probable cause to believe he was in fact on parole and wanted under the parole violation warrant.")

Estate of Escobedo v. Bender (Escobedo I), 600 F.3d 770, 778-80, 783, 786 (7th Cir. 2010) ("Up until the day before this case was argued, Saucier v. Katz maintained a sequential procedure for considering whether an officer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The Supreme Court recently reconsidered Saucier and decided 'that while the sequence set forth [in Saucier] is often appropriate, it should no longer be regarded as mandatory.' [citing Pearson] . . . . Here, the Defendants limit their argument on appeal to the second prong of the Saucier qualified immunity analysis, that is: whether the law was clearly established as of July 19, 2005, that the use of tear gas and flash bang devices in these unique circumstances violates an individual's Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force. . . . They do not contest the district court's finding that taking the facts in the light most favorable to the Estate, a reasonable jury could find that their decision to use tear gas and flash bang devices against Escobedo, a suicidal, armed, barricaded person, was an excessive use of force under the Fourth Amendment. Accordingly, for purpose of the present appeal, we turn to the second prong of the Saucier qualified immunity analysis and assume that a reasonable jury could conclude that the Defendants' conduct violated Escobedo's Fourth Amendment rights. . . . The Defendants claim that they are entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established on July 19, 2005, to place them on notice that the use of tear gas and flash bang devices in these particular circumstances was unconstitutional. The Estate has the burden of establishing that the constitutional right at issue was clearly established. . . .The Estate can demonstrate that the right was clearly established by presenting a closely analogous case that establishes that the Defendants' conduct was unconstitutional or by presenting evidence that the Defendant's conduct was so patently violative of the constitutional right that reasonable officials would know without guidance from a court. . . .Based on controlling precedent from this Circuit and the clear trend in the law from our sister circuits, the clearly established law as of July 19, 2005, established that the use of tear gas is unreasonable when: (1) attempting to subdue individuals as opposed to mass crowds; (2) when the individual does not pose an actual threat; (3) when the individual is not holding hostages; (4) when the individual has not committed a crime and the officers are not in the process of attempting to make an arrest; (5) when the individual is armed but merely suicidal as opposed to homicidal; (6) when the individual is not attempting to evade arrest or flee from the police; and (7) when the individual is incapacitated in some form. . . . Based on the pre-existing case law, it was clearly established as of July 19, 2005, that throwing a flash bang device blindly into an apartment where there are accelerants, without a fire extinguisher, and where the individual attempting to be seized is not an unusually dangerous individual, is not the subject of an arrest, and has not threatened to harm anyone but himself, is an unreasonable use of force. Therefore, taking the facts as presented to us from the district court, the Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity and the issue of the officers' decisions must be presented to a jury.")

Estate of Escobedo v. Bender, 600 F.3d 770, 787 (7th Cir. 2010) (Manion, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Although I question whether the cases cited by the court clearly established that the officers' use of tear gas violated the Fourth Amendment, I do believe that reasonable officials would have known that using twelve times the incapacitating quantity of tear gas to extricate a person at home alone who had only threatened to harm himself and was not suspected of committing a crime 'was unconstitutional without guidance from courts.'. . For that reason, I concur with the court's conclusion that the defendants' use of tear gas was not protected by qualified immunity. I disagree, however, with the court's conclusion that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity for their use of the flash-bang devices. The majority opinion holds that on the date of the incident it was clearly established that the defendants' employment of the flash-bang devices was an excessive use of force. In reaching its conclusion, the court relies upon six cases that involved the use of such devices by law enforcement. But as explained below, those cases neither separately nor collectively clearly established that the defendants' conduct was unconstitutional. And because the defendants' use of the flash-bang devices–unlike their use of the tear gas– was not obviously in violation of the decedent's constitutional rights, they are entitled to qualified immunity on this issue.")

Whitlock v. Brown, 596 F.3d 406, 408 (7th Cir. 2010) ("Under Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808 (2009), we are permitted to skip directly to the second question, and we do so here. Although it is clearly established Fourth Amendment law that an officer may not intentionally or recklessly withhold material information from a warrant application, it is not clear under Indiana law that the information Brown allegedly withheld was material to the probable-cause determination for a charge of criminal conversion. Brown is therefore entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Given the breadth of Indiana's criminal-conversion statute and the apparent absence of an implied-consent defense, the Whitlocks' excuse was irrelevant to the probable-cause determination–or at least of such questionable relevance that Brown is entitled to qualified immunity. At best, Indiana law is undeveloped in this area.").

Hanes v. Zurick, 578 F.3d 491, 496 (7th Cir. 2009) ("But under any view we have taken, arrests motivated by personal animus are unconstitutional. Second, the officers argue that the right announced in Hilton is dicta. Hilton states, 'If the police decided to withdraw all protection from Hilton out of sheer malice, or because they had been bribed by his neighbors, he would state a claim under Olech.' Hilton, 209 F.3d at 1007. Although we described that statement as dicta in a later case, . . . even dicta may clearly establish a right, see Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 640 (1987). When a court holds that certain conduct violates a constitutional right but that the right was not clearly established, the constitutional ruling is arguably dicta, see Pearson, 129 S.Ct. at 818, but it still may clearly establish the law for future conduct, id. at 819. As Judge Calabresi has explained, 'lucid and unambiguous dicta concerning the existence of a constitutional right can without more make that right Aclearly established" for purposes of a qualified immunity analysis.'

Wilkinson v. Russell, 182 F.3d 89, 112 (2d Cir.1999) (Calabresi, J., concurring). Hilton's statement could not be more lucid and unambiguous. Since the conduct alleged here is almost identical to the requirements set out in Hilton, a reasonable officer was on notice that such conduct violates the constitution.").

Chaklos v. Stevens, 560 F.3d 705, 711, 716 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Deciding the constitutional question first is beneficial when courts are able to clarify or elaborate on the law in a manner that promotes its development. . . But where 'the constitutional question is so fact-bound that the decision provides little guidance for future cases,' a forced resolution of the constitutional question is neither necessary nor prudent. Pearson, 129 S.Ct. at 819. This case presents a paradigmatic example of such a case. As discussed further below, the quirky facts of this case complicate the constitutional inquiry. It is far from obvious whether the speech in this case is constitutionally protected and we do not think resolving the First Amendment issue serves any jurisprudential purpose. Because defendants did not violate clearly established law, we do not decide whether the facts established a constitutional violation. . . . Should it have been sufficiently clear to defendants that they could not punish Chaklos and Wist for their letter without violating the Constitution? We think not. It is clear, as plaintiffs maintain, that a public employer may not retaliate against an employee who exercises his First Amendment speech rights. . . But, as this discussion demonstrates, the letter's entitlement to First Amendment protection is not obvious. If the letter's only purpose was to lodge a complaint against the no-bid contract, we would have no difficulty concluding, in this case, that defendants should have known their actiopostns were unconstitutional. But in light of the unusual circumstances of this case, which include the dual nature of the letter at issue, the State's split-the-baby approach toward secondary employment, and defendants' questionable enforcement of the State's policies, we think it unnecessary to determine whether this letter is constitutionally protected, and thus whether defendants' actions were unconstitutional. In so holding, we emphasize that plaintiffs did not need to present a case involving a 'protest/proposal letter.' The question is not whether there is a prior case 'on all fours' with the current claim. . . But plaintiffs' cases regarding the impropriety of First Amendment retaliation in general do not provide fair warning to defendants that their conduct was unconstitutional.")

Akande v. Grounds, 555 F.3d 586, 590 n.3, 592 (7th Cir. 2009) ("The Supreme Court has recently clarified that the Saucier sequence is not an inflexible requirement. See Pearson v. Callahan, __ U.S. __, __ S.Ct. __, 2009 WL 159429, *9 (Jan. 21, 2009). However, courts are still free to follow the Saucier protocol where, as here, it facilitates the expeditious disposition of a case. . . . Because Akande has failed to show that he was subjected to a constitutional deprivation, we need not inquire whether the right he invokes was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation.")

Posey v. Miro, 11 CV 5660, 2014 WL 3843940, *3, *4 (N.D. Ill. Aug. 5, 2014) ("This case may be one of those 'closer calls' where a government actor could violate substantive due process and shock the conscience even though his culpability follows from something less than intentional conduct. Miro was not involved in a high-speed chase, and may have had time to make an unhurried judgment (indeed, he claims he was driving conservatively). Miro testified that when traveling the wrong way on a one-way street, he would normally turn on his lights or siren, and that there is no reason not to do so. . . But he didn't do so here. . . A dispute exists as to how fast he was traveling at the time of impact. . . And a dispute exists as to whether he saw K.M. before impact and had time to stop. . . These facts, like those in Carter v. Simpson, 328 F.3d 948 (7th Cir. 2003), would allow a reasonable jury to find the officer's conduct to have been 'willful and wanton,' meaning that it 'show[ed] an utter indifference to or conscious disregard for the safety of others.'. . I need not decide whether Miro's conduct, if it were unintentional, violated K.M.'s due process rights because (as explained next) no such right was clearly established at the time, and Miro is entitled to qualified immunity. See Pearson, 555 U.S. at 236 (courts may resolve qualified immunity on the second step, without resolving the first step). . . .According to Posey, (dicta in) Lewis clearly establishes that 'deliberate indifference' shocks the conscience in all situations in which deliberation is practical. . . Given the 'close calls' and 'exact analyses' that Lewis prescribed, I disagree. Summary judgment is therefore granted on Count III, on the basis of qualified immunity.")

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Schaffer v. Beringer, 842 F.3d 585, 592 (8th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e need not decide whether the officers had actual probable cause. Rather, following Habiger v. City of Fargo, we need only address whether the officers had arguable probable cause and are thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . Because a determination that the officers had arguable probable cause would end the inquiry, we will assume that Callissa was arrested when she was placed in handcuffs. . .The legal drinking age in South Dakota is twenty-one. . . South Dakota's general DUI statute prohibits anyone from operating a motor vehicle if their BAC is .08 or higher. . . However, South Dakota's minor DUI statute prohibits drivers under the age of twenty-one from operating a motor vehicle with a BAC of .02 or higher. . . Thus, the legal BAC limit for drivers under the age of twenty-one is significantly lower than the permissible level for drivers over twenty-one. Notably, no judicial decisions have addressed what circumstances would provide officers with probable cause to arrest a driver under the age of twenty-one for a violation of the minor DUI statute. In qualified immunity cases, this 'absence of judicial guidance can be significant.'. . .Given the totality of these circumstances, the relatively low .02 BAC limit under the minor DUI statute, and the absence of judicial decisions interpreting that statute, we find that the officers had at least arguable probable cause to believe that Callissa Schaffer had violated SDCL § 32–23–21. Because the officers had arguable probable cause, they are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to this claim. . . .[W]hen officers have 'at least arguable probable cause' to perform an arrest, they cannot be held liable for performing a search incident to that arrest. . . Because we have already determined that the officers had arguable probable cause to arrest Callissa, they are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim as well.")

Shultz v. Buchanan, 829 F.3d 943, 950 (8th Cir. 2016) ("We may assume for the sake of analysis that Shultz has presented a genuine issue of fact concerning whether Buchanan's use of the Taser was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. As of March 2011, however, it was not clearly established that an officer violated the rights of an arrestee by applying force that caused only de minimis injury. LaCross v. City of Duluth, 713 F.3d 1155, 1158 (8th Cir. 2013); Chambers, 641 F.3d at 908. Before our June 2011 decision in Chambers clarified the analytical distinction between de minimis force and de minimis injury, 'a reasonable officer could have believed that as long as he did not cause more than de minimis injury to an arrestee, his actions would not run afoul of the Fourth Amendment.'. . Although a Taser has a 'unique capability to cause high levels of pain without long-term injury, "we have not categorized the Taser as an implement of force whose use establishes, as a matter of law, more than de minimis injury."'. . The evidence presented by Shultz about consequences of the tasing are consistent with effects that we have characterized as de minimis injury. Shultz sustained temporary marks on his arms and legs, but suffered no permanent scarring. He did not miss any work. Shultz argues that he experienced anxiety, nervousness, and distrust of the police as a result of the incident, but acknowledged that he had not seen a doctor or taken any medication for these symptoms. Accordingly, Shultz has not shown that he suffered more than de minimis injury as a result of Buchanan's actions.")

Greenman v. Jessen, 787 F.3d 882, 887-90 (8th Cir. 2015) ("The district court addressed whether it was clearly established at the time of Greenman's arrests that a reasonable police officer would have known that probable cause did not exist to arrest an intoxicated person operating a Segway for DWI. But we choose to address the defendants' alternative argument: that they are entitled to qualified immunity because there was probable cause, or at least arguable probable cause, to arrest and prosecute Greenman on all three occasions for operating his Segway in violation of Minnesota traffic laws other than DWI. . . If the officers had probable cause to arrest, then Greenman has failed to 'make out a violation of a constitutional right' in the first instance. . . .Officer Jessen had probable cause to arrest Greenman both the first and second times Greenman was operating his Segway on a roadway. Accordingly, we conclude all three police officers—Officer Jessen, Sergeant Nelson, and Chief Belland—are entitled to qualified immunity in connection with both the August 17, 2010, and the February 4, 2012, arrests. Regarding the third and final arrest, Greenman contends Sergeant Nelson did not have probable cause to believe that Greenman was operating a Segway without due care because Sergeant Nelson did not actually observe him driving the Segway but instead found him lying on the sidewalk next to his Segway shortly after 8:00 p.m. Greenman asserts the evidence supported his explanation that a 'crater' in the sidewalk, rather than his lack of due care, caused the crash. Even if Greenman is correct that a fault in the sidewalk caused him to crash his Segway, the statute requires, '[e]very person operating an electric personal assistive mobility device on a ... sidewalk ... [to be] responsible for becoming and remaining aware of the actual and potential hazards then existing on the ... sidewalk and [to] use due care in operating the device.'. . That Greenman failed field sobriety tests after being found on the sidewalk only adds to the 'totality of circumstances' that would lead a reasonable person to determine Greenman was not operating his Segway with due care prior to crashing. . . Sergeant Nelson had at least arguable probable cause to arrest Greenman for failing to operate his Segway with due care.")

De Boise v. Taser Int'l, Inc., 760 F.3d 892, 896-98 (8th Cir. 2014) ("Courts have discretion to decide which part of the inquiry to address first. Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 236 (2009). Here, we begin with second inquiry. Though the outcome of this encounter was tragic, and even if the reasonableness of the officers' actions was questionable, Appellants cannot defeat the officers' defense of qualified immunity unless they are able to show that a reasonable officer would have been on notice that the officers' conduct violated a clearly established right. . . . Although we have determined that non-violent, non-fleeing subjects have a clearly established right to be free from the use of tasers, . . . we have yet to determine whether a violent subject, acting aggressively toward officers, has a clearly established right to be free from multiple tasings. . . . And, Appellants point to no previous case that could be said to have clearly established the unconstitutionality of the officers' actions here. Accordingly, the state of the law would not have placed 'an officer on notice that he must limit the use of his taser in certain circumstances, even though the subject continues to struggle and resist.'. . .Although Oliver and the case before us both involve the tasing of an emotionally disturbed individual, the facts of the two cases are not sufficiently aligned. Similar to Oliver, De Boise suffered from a mental illness of which the officers were aware. However, unlike in Oliver, the officers in this case observed De Boise aggressively approaching one of the officers, his continued noncompliance with the officers' instructions to lie on the ground, and his violent and aggressive behavior, which included kicking and swinging his arms at the officers once they approached to subdue him. These important distinctions lead us to conclude that no reasonable officer, observing De Boise's behavior, would have understood the actions taken to be so disproportionate and unnecessary as to amount to a violation of De Boise's rights.")

De Boise v. Taser Int'l, Inc., 760 F.3d 892, 899, 900 (8th Cir. 2014) (Bye, J., dissenting) ("First, construing the facts in the light most favorable to De Boise, I would find a sufficient showing has been made to present to a jury whether the officers violated De Boise's constitutional rights by continuing to tase him until his eventual death. The use of a taser is not unlimited in scope when dealing with a suspect, even one who is actively resisting. De Boise disobeyed officers' orders and made some threatening moves. However, De Boise was not carrying a visible or concealed weapon, did not make advances at the officers, and was naked. A jury could conclude, with six armed officers at the scene, it was an unreasonable use of force to continuously tase De Boise rather than handcuff him during the time period De Boise was debilitated during and after each tase. Particularly because De Boise did not have shod feet or any other weapon, a jury could conclude the officers were unreasonable to not make further effort to handcuff De Boise, even if he were swinging his arms or kicking his legs. Second, I would find the officers were put on notice in 2008 that continuously tasing a suspect until his death was unlawful. . . .In this case, the officers were on notice they should have attempted to handcuff De Boise as a safer alternative to tasing De Boise with fifty seconds of electrical shock in just over two minutes of time. It would be clear to a reasonable officer that failing to seize De Boise with reasonable force was unlawful. Because the officers' actions are not protected by qualified immunity, I would remand this case for trial where a jury can determine whether it was reasonable the officers continued to tase De Boise until his death and seemingly without taking the available opportunities to handcuff and restrain De Boise.")

Gladden v. Richbourg, 759 F.3d 960, 967, 968 (8th Cir. 2014) ("Gladden's level of intoxication is the dispositive issue in this case. If Gladden appeared to the officers to be sober enough to walk to the guard shack and make a rational, informed decision, then the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. But they are not so entitled if Gladden was so intoxicated that Richbourg and Imhoff, in leaving Gladden at the Remington Road exit, acted recklessly in conscious disregard of an obvious risk of harm to Gladden such that their actions evince deliberate indifference to Gladden's constitutional rights. It is not enough under this analysis that Gladden be mildly or even moderately intoxicated; he must have been so intoxicated that it would have been obvious to the officers that he was incapable of walking to the guard shack at the factory or of making decisions for himself. . . .In short, Gladden's mild signs of intoxication were not enough to alert the officers to the possibility that Gladden might not be able to make decisions for himself and might not be able to find his way to a guard shack a short distance away from where Richbourg dropped him off. While it may have been negligent for the officers to leave a mildly intoxicated man at a rural intersection on a cold night, their conduct in doing so was not so reckless that it shocks the conscience of the court. Because of our conclusion that Richbourg and Imhoff did not violate Gladden's constitutional rights, we need not reach the question whether these rights were clearly established at the time of their alleged violation.")

Peterson v. Kopp, 754 F.3d 594, 600, 601 (8th Cir. 2014) ("The defendants argue, and the district court held, that even if pepper spraying Peterson was unreasonable under the circumstances, Kopp is entitled to qualified immunity because Peterson only suffered 'de minimis injury' as a result. . . . [U]ntil our June 2011 decision in Chambers, it was 'an open question in [the Eighth Circuit] whether an excessive force claim require[d] some minimum level of injury.' Chambers, 641 F.3d at 904. Because Peterson's arrest occurred two months before we decided Chambers, Kopp could have reasonably believed his actions were constitutionally permissible as long as they did not cause more than de minimis injury. In short, Kopp would be entitled to qualified immunity if Peterson's injuries were de minimis. Though we agree the use of force here may have been unreasonable, and acknowledge that Peterson described being pepper sprayed as a painful experience, Peterson has not presented sufficient evidence that he suffered more than de minimis injury. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Peterson, he was sprayed directly in the face with pepper spray for just a few seconds, and suffered some pain, discomfort, and peeling under his eyes for several days after the incident. He did not seek medical care and his injuries resolved themselves without medical intervention. We do not make light of the use of pepper spray nor ignore the discomfort and skin irritation Peterson endured; nonetheless, we have not held that the use of pepper spray necessarily causes more than de minimis injury.")

Bishop v. Glazier, 723 F.3d 957, 962 (8th Cir. 2013) ("As of December 2010, when Glazier encountered Bishop, 'a reasonable officer could have believed that as long as he did not cause more than de minimis injury to an arrestee, his actions would not run afoul of the Fourth Amendment.'. . Even if we assume for the sake of analysis that Glazier grabbed Bishop by the throat for 45–60 seconds, and that Bishop's breathing and speaking were restricted during that time, Bishop's only injury was a 'light cut' on his neck that did not bleed and for which he did not seek any treatment. The amount of force that Glazier allegedly used did not cause more than de minimis injury. . . Glazier is thus entitled to qualified immunity, because he did not violate Bishop's then clearly established constitutional rights under the Fourth Amendment.")

LaCross v. City of Duluth, 713 F.3d 1155, 1157-59 (8th Cir. 2013) ("Determining the question of qualified immunity involves a two-part inquiry: whether the facts shown by the plaintiff make out a violation of a constitutional or statutory right, and whether that right was clearly established at the time of the defendant's alleged misconduct. . . We have discretion to decide which part should be addressed first . . . and have decided to address the latter. In Chambers v. Pennycook, we considered whether a plaintiff's showing of 'only de minimis injury necessarily forecloses a claim of excessive force under the Fourth Amendment[,]' and concluded that it did not. . . We determined that '[t]he appropriate inquiry is "whether the force used to effect a particular seizure is 'reasonable.'" So although a de minimis use of force is insufficient to support a claim, a de minimis injury does not necessarily foreclose a claim. . . The distinction between de minimis force and de minimis injury, however, was not clear until Chambers was decided. In September 2006, when Mark deployed his Taser, 'a reasonable officer could have believed that as long as he did not cause more than de minimis injury to an arrestee, his actions would not run afoul of the Fourth Amendment.'. . LaCross has not set forth sufficient evidence to show that Mark's application of the Taser caused more than de minimis injury. Accordingly, Mark is entitled to qualified immunity because he did not violate LaCross's then clearly established constitutional rights. LaCross contends that the Taser is different from other implements of force in that it can cause excruciating pain without lasting physical effects. Because it is different in kind, the argument goes, the Taser should not be judged by the physical injury it causes. LaCross argues that our post- Chambers opinion in Shekleton v. Eichenberger, 677 F.3d 361 (8th Cir.2012), establishes that 'de minimis injury is effectively irrelevant where an officer uses a taser on a nonresistant misdemeanant suspect.'. . In other words, he argues that Chambers does not apply to excessive force claims involving Tasers. We disagree. Shekleton did not consider the extent of the plaintiff's injuries, beyond noting that the plaintiff sustained minor head injuries and was treated at a hospital. . . The decision thus did not address whether the plaintiff suffered only de minimis injury, and if so, whether that injury is viewed differently because it was caused by a Taser. . .While mention has been made of 'the unique nature of this type of weapon[,]' McKenney v. Harrison, 635 F.3d 354, 361 (8th Cir.2011) (Murphy, J., concurring), we have not categorized the Taser as an implement of force whose use establishes, as a matter of law, more than de minimis injury. In Chambers, we said that 'the nature of the force applied cannot be correlated perfectly with the type of injury inflicted.'. . This observation may be of special relevance regarding Taser-inflicted injuries, some of which are only minor in nature, but others sometimes severe and unexpected. . . Though it offers no aid to LaCross, the degree of injury is not dispositive after Chambers, and it is now clearly established that an officer is not entitled to qualified immunity if his use of force is excessive in the circumstances, even if the injury inflicted was minor.")

Livers v. Schenck, 700 F.3d 340, 359, 360 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Our sister circuits disagree over whether pretrial detainees such as Livers and Sampson have a right to disclosure of exculpatory evidence. The Fifth Circuit concluded a police officer's 'deliberate failure to disclose ... undeniably credible and patently exculpatory evidence to the prosecuting attorney's office' violates a clearly established constitutional right, Sanders v. English, 950 F.2d 1152, 1158, 1160–62 (5th Cir.1992). The Fourth Circuit reached the opposite result in Taylor v. Waters, 81 F.3d 429, 435–37 (4th Cir.1996). The Fourth Circuit determined a police officer's failure 'to disclose exculpatory evidence after a determination of probable cause has been made by a neutral detached magistrate' neither violates the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause nor 'render[s] the continuing pretrial seizure of a criminal suspect unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment.'. . Given the split of authority, we cannot say a pretrial right to disclosure of exculpatory evidence, if it exists, was clearly established in 2006. . . Appellants are entitled to qualified immunity on Livers' and Sampson's claims based on any failure to disclose evidence. . . . A law enforcement officer who knows another officer is using excessive force has a duty to intervene. . . We have not recognized a duty to intervene to prevent other constitutional violations. Though other circuits have recognized a duty to intervene outside of the excessive force context, see Randall v. Prince George's Cnty., Md., 302 F.3d 188, 204 (4th Cir.2002); Reid v. Wren, Nos. 94–7122, 94–7123, 94–7124, 1995 WL 339401, at *2 (10th Cir.1995) (unpublished); Yang v. Hardin, 37 F.3d 282, 285 (7th Cir.1994); Anderson v. Branen, 17 F.3d 552, 557 (2d Cir.1994), the Eleventh Circuit refused to find a clearly established duty to intervene to stop other constitutional violations, see Jones v. Cannon, 174 F .3d 1271, 1286 (11th Cir.1999). . . Assuming law enforcement officers have a constitutional duty to intervene outside of the excessive force context, such a duty was not clearly established in 2006. Where, as here, the federal circuits disagree on whether conduct violates the Constitution, and our court has not addressed the question, that conduct does not violate clearly established law because 'it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.' Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 618 (1999). Appellants are entitled to qualified immunity on Livers' failure-to-intervene claim.")

Burke v. Sullivan, 677 F.3d 367, 372 (8th Cir. 2012) ("Because the instant matter concerns a claim of qualified immunity, not a motion to suppress evidence, we need not reach the issue of whether the officers violated the dictates of the Fourth Amendment. . . .Based on the several facts known to the officers, it was reasonable for them to conclude their warrantless entry into Burke's home was lawful under either the emergency aid exception or the community caretaker exception. Jay had become highly intoxicated. Jay refused to leave the neighbor's party. Jay would not cooperate with Burke when she tried to take him home and was verbally abusive to Burke. Jay forcefully pushed Burke against a wall. Jay was involved in a physical altercation with one of the party guests, seriously biting him. Jay kicked and broke a table. Jay was known to use illegal drugs and may have been under the influence of illegal drugs. Jay went into Burke's house across the street immediately before the officers' arrival. There was no response when the officers attempted to contact Burke by knocking on her door, shouting, shining a flashlight inside, and telephoning the residence. Burke, who had been thrown against a wall by Jay, was now in the home alone with a violent suspect. When viewed collectively, these facts could lead a reasonable police officer to conclude there was either a threat of violence or an emergency requiring attention. . . . Contrary to Burke's assertion, Smith v. Kansas City, Mo. Police Department, 586 F.3d 576 (8th Cir.2009) does not dictate a different result. In Smith, we determined a police officer was not entitled to qualified immunity when the officer entered the home of an unarmed domestic violence suspect without a warrant. . . In reaching our decision, we gave significant weight to the fact the officer had no information any victim or potential victim was inside the home. . . In Burke's case, the officers had specific information a potential victim, Burke, was inside the home with Jay, the violent suspect, whose erratic behavior generated the domestic disturbance call. Jay had already been involved in violent encounters with Burke and LaRose. Given these facts, it was reasonable for the officers to conclude their warrantless entry into Burke's home was lawful. . . In addition, our court did not decide Smith until November 2009, over four months after the officers entered Burke's home. As such, Smith was not part of the established law when the officers entered Burke's home.")

Harrington v. City of Council Bluffs, Iowa, 678 F.3d 676, at 679, 680 (8th Cir. 2012) ("If malicious prosecution is a constitutional violation at all, it probably arises under the Fourth Amendment. . . The dispositive issue on appeal is whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the appellees' Fourth Amendment claims based on malicious prosecution. . . . Our sister circuits have taken a variety of approaches on the issue of whether or when malicious prosecution violates the Fourth Amendment. . .We need not enter this debate now. . . Assuming a Fourth Amendment right against malicious prosecution exists, such a right was not clearly established when the appellees were prosecuted in 1977 and 1978.")

Sisney v. Reisch, 674 F.3d 839, 844, 847 (8th Cir. 2012) ("We think it is clear the district court granted qualified immunity because it found Sisney had failed to allege violation of a constitutional right that was clearly established. We therefore find it prudent to begin our qualified immunity analysis at the second prong. . . . [W]e cannot agree that it was apparent the contours of a prison inmate's right to reasonable dietary and meal accommodations extended to the use of a succah. As a result, the SDSP Officials did not have fair notice it was unlawful to deny Sisney's project applications. We therefore conclude the district court did not err in granting these Officials qualified immunity on Sisney's claims for denial of his 2004, 2005, and 2006 project applications.")

Bernini v. City of St. Paul, 665 F.3d 997, 1004-06 (8th Cir. 2012) ("[A] reasonable officer could have concluded that the individuals at the intersection were acting together and that they intended to break through the police line in an attempt to access downtown St. Paul. It was reasonable, therefore, for an officer to believe that the group, as a whole, was committing one or more offenses under state law, including third degree riot and unlawful assembly. . . We thus conclude that the police did not violate the clearly established rights of sixteen plaintiffs who were both present at the intersection and arrested at the park. . . . The walk from Jackson Street to the park caused the group to expand and enveloped people who were not present at the intersection. But unlike the officer in Barham v. Ramsey, 434 F.3d 565 (D.C.Cir.2006), who directed an indiscriminate mass arrest of about 400 persons in a park based on the unlawful acts of a small group of protestors, the police in this case attempted to discern who had been part of the unit at the intersection and released approximately 200 people, including seven of the plaintiffs, at the park. The police did not violate the clearly established rights of the seven plaintiffs who were among those released at the park. These people were detained only while the officers sought to determine who were the members of the group at the intersection. . . . The nine remaining plaintiffs allege that they were arrested and taken into custody even though they were not present at the Shepard–Jackson intersection. They further contend that the group at the intersection numbered no more than thirty to forty people, and that the officers did not have probable cause (or even arguable probable cause) to arrest more than this number. The video footage, however, shows that the group was much larger. Approximately fifty people clustered closely together directly across from the officers. Another fifty or so people can be seen standing on either side of the group, along the sidewalk. Qualified immunity 'protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . In the circumstances of this case, we conclude that the arrest of 160 people in the park (including the nine plaintiffs) was within the range of objectively reasonable police conduct in light of the law that was clearly established and the information available to the officers. It was reasonable for the officers to believe they could arrest those who were acting as a unit with the protestors who attempted to break through the police barrier at the Shepard–Jackson intersection. The videos depict approximately 100 people present at the intersection. The eleven officers were positioned under an overpass, making it difficult for them to see how far the crowd extended to the west. From the officers' vantage point, it appeared as if "people were continuously arriving from the west." The officers, especially without the benefit of the videos, could not have been sure of the precise number. They did release approximately 200 people at the park in an attempt to avoid custodial arrests of innocent bystanders. Given the situation at the intersection, the officers' allegedly mistaken belief at the park that 160 people were part of a unit that had gathered to enter downtown at the Shepard–Jackson intersection was objectively reasonable. We therefore affirm the district court's conclusion that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity for the seizures. . . . We conclude . . . that Henry is entitled to qualified immunity. In our view, the use of force was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. At a minimum, it was not objectively unreasonable for Henry to authorize the force deployed in light of clearly established law. The circumstances led officers reasonably to believe that a growing crowd intended to penetrate a police line and access downtown St. Paul. Henry's use and authorization to use non-lethal munitions to direct the crowd away from the intersection and toward a park where the crowd could be controlled did not violate clearly established rights. The plaintiffs contend that it was unreasonable for the officers to continue to use force as the crowd moved west on Shepard Road, because the crowd was 'complying with the movement of the officers and posed no threat to the officers.' The video footage reveals, however, that some people would not leave the roadway and that some turned east and faced the officers. It was reasonable for the officers to deploy non-lethal munitions to keep all members of the crowd moving west. Some plaintiffs assert that they were directly targeted by officers—one, for example, testified that an officer sprayed a chemical irritant on his face, neck, ears, and back. But there is no evidence that Henry authorized this type of force against a compliant individual. His implicit authorization occurred at the intersection and involved force deployed against a noncompliant crowd. The plaintiffs have not identified any defendant who used gratuitous force. The evidence, therefore, does not support the conclusion that Henry or any other defendant violated clearly established rights under the Fourth Amendment. The district court properly granted summary judgment on this claim.")

Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898, 901, 904-09 (8th Cir. 2011) ("We now conclude that a citizen may prove an unreasonable seizure based on an excessive use of force without necessarily showing more than de minimis injury, but we hold that the officers here are entitled to qualified immunity , because their alleged actions did not violate clearly established law. . . . While we have discretion to decide which question should be addressed first, . . . we think it best in this case to start with the constitutional question. This court has said several times, over the course of more than fifteen years, that '[i]t remains an open question in this circuit whether an excessive force claim requires some minimum level of injury.'. . Continued postponement of that question has resulted in uncertainty about the rights of citizens and the responsibilities of law enforcement officers under the Fourth Amendment. One aspect of the recurring 'open question' is squarely presented in this case: whether a plaintiff must demonstrate greater than de minimis injury to establish a use of excessive force that violates the Fourth Amendment. Resolution of that issue will give guidance to officials about how to comply with legal requirements and will allow an avenue of redress for wronged citizens in appropriate circumstances. The question is unlikely to be resolved in the context of a criminal case or in litigation over municipal liability. . . And none of the factors that typically counsel against a decision on the constitutional question are present here. . . Having thought hard twice about how to exercise our discretion, see Camreta v. Green, No. 09-1454, 2011 WL 2039369, at *9 (U.S. May 26, 2011), and having ordered supplemental briefing and devoted substantial resources to considering the constitutional question in this case, we will proceed to decide it. . . . We are not convinced. . . that evidence of only de minimis injury necessarily forecloses a claim of excessive force under the Fourth Amendment. . . . The dispositive question is whether the officer's conduct was objectively reasonable under the circumstances, as judged from the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene at the time the force was applied. . . . The gratuitous use of force alleged by Chambers was not reasonable under the circumstances. . .The second step in the qualified immunity analysis is to determine whether the right that was violated was 'clearly established' at the time of the defendant's alleged misconduct. . . . It was not clearly established . . . that an officer violated the rights of an arrestee by applying force that caused only de minimis injury. . . . Given the state of the law in August 2005, a reasonable officer could have believed that as long as he did not cause more than de minimis injury to an arrestee, his actions would not run afoul of the Fourth Amendment. . . . We reject in this decision a constitutional rule that turns on the arrestee's degree of injury, but given the law prevailing at the time of the incident, we conclude that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Baribeau v. City of Minneapolis, 596 F. 3d 465, 474, 478-80 (8th Cir. 2010) ("The Supreme Court recently made it clear that we are allowed to exercise our 'sound discretion' to decide which qualified immunity prong we address first, 'in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.' Pearson, 129 S.Ct. at 818. In this case, we find it most beneficial to first address whether the facts, when considered in the plaintiffs' favor, establish a violation of the plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights. . . . [B]ecause the plaintiffs' conduct was expressive conduct and did not amount to fighting words, their conduct clearly did not fall within the narrowed reading of the disorderly conduct statute. Thus, there was no probable cause to believe the plaintiffs' expressive conduct violated the statute. Accordingly, we hold that Merkel and Weber violated the plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights. . . . [A]n objectively reasonable person would not think probable cause exists under the Minnesota disorderly conduct statue to arrest a group of peaceful people for engaging in an artistic protest by playing music, broadcasting statements, dressing as zombies, and walking erratically in downtown Minneapolis during a week-long festival. Merkel and Weber arrested the plaintiffs in 2006–well after the Minnesota Supreme Court's decisions in S.L.J. and Machholz. Thus, the Minnesota Supreme Court's cases in S.L.J. and Machholz provided Merkel and Weber with a fair warning that the arrests were unconstitutional. . . . The Minnesota Supreme Court has not interpreted this [the WMD] statute. . . . We agree with the district court that there was no probable cause to arrest the plaintiffs for displaying simulated WMD. However, we do not agree that arguable probable cause existed to arrest the plaintiffs. . . . [T]he facts in this case did not require officers to parse code language. As a part of their artistic anti-consumerism protest, the plaintiffs carried four bags of sound equipment. The bags contained an iPod, a radio transmitter, an antenna, a wireless phone handset, radio receivers, and speakers. Some of the sound equipment, including wiring and an on/off switch for the music, was visible on the outside of the bags. The plaintiffs were clearly using this equipment to broadcast anti-consumerism statements and music. Though we recognize the seriousness of WMD offenses, we cannot say that displaying and using portable sound equipment for its natural purpose–i.e., to transmit and broadcast sound waves–even remotely satisfies the statute's definition of displaying simulated WMD. Therefore, even if the WMD statute did not require the plaintiffs to display biological, chemical, or radioactive elements, a reasonable person would not have believed probable cause existed to arrest the plaintiffs for displaying simulated WMD. Accordingly, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity because they violated the plaintiffs' clearly established rights when they arrested the plaintiffs without arguable probable cause that the plaintiffs had displayed simulated WMDs.").

Baribeau v. City of Minneapolis, 596 F. 3d 465, 474, 478-80 (8th Cir. 2010) (Colloton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part)("The defendant police officers Timothy Merkel and Roderic Weber had probable cause to arrest the plaintiffs for a violation of the Minnesota disorderly conduct statute, Minn.Stat. ' 609.72, subd. 1. Nonetheless, the majority reverses the district court's grant of qualified immunity to these officers on the plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim, holding that the officers acted contrary to a 'narrowing construction' of the disorderly conduct statute–a construction that has never been adopted by the Supreme Court of Minnesota, and that has been expressly rejected by the Minnesota Court of Appeals. The majority's decision, therefore, is contrary to established principles of qualified immunity, which ensure that public officials are not subjected to suit unless they are on notice, through clearly established law, that their conduct is unlawful. I would affirm the judgment of the district court in its entirety.").

Norman v. Schuetzle, 585 F.3d 1097, 1111 (8th Cir. 2009) ("Existing caselaw in 2005 did not sufficiently put Wrolstad on notice that his actions of showing the kites to other inmates put Norman at a substantial risk of harm from other inmates. Norman fails to cite to cases other than the snitch labeling cases to support his claim that it was clearly established that Wrolstad's actions violated his constitutional rights. As in Pearson, we look to the specific actions of the officer to determine whether it was clearly established that his actions violated the inmate's rights. We conclude that whether or not it violated Norman's right to be protected from harm when Wrolstad showed his grievances to other inmates under the circumstances of this case, it was not clearly established at the time that doing so would have violated Norman's rights.").

Nelson v. Correctional Medical Services, 583 F.3d 522, 528, 531-34 (8th Cir. 2009) (8th Cir. 2009) (en banc) ("We conclude that it is appropriate in this case to start with the question of whether the allegations and evidence, when considered in Nelson's favor, establish any constitutional violation. . . . Having determined that there is sufficient evidence in the record to permit a reasonable factfinder to determine that Turensky's actions violated the Eighth Amendment, the question remains whether such a constitutional right was clearly established in September 2003. . . . A reasonable factfinder could determine from the record in this case that Officer Turensky, like the Hope officials, was not facing an emergency situation but nevertheless 'subjected [Nelson] to a substantial risk of physical harm, to the unnecessary pain caused by the [shackles] and the restricted position of confinement ... [and] created a risk of particular discomfort and humiliation.'. . . The general responsibilities of state officers with regard to an inmate's medical needs were also clearly established before September 2003. In 1976 the Supreme Court had decided Estelle v. Gamble, 429 U.S. 97 (1976), a leading case in the development of Eighth Amendment law. Estelle was a § 1983 action brought against prison officials for providing an inmate inadequate medical care. . . The Court concluded that either interference with care or infliction of 'unnecessary suffering' establishes deliberate indifference in medical care cases in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . . Moreover, the precise issue under consideration here was decided years ago by a federal district court in the District of Columbia. In 1994 that court held that '[w]hile a woman is in labor ... shackling is inhumane' and violates her constitutional rights. Women Prisoners of D.C. Dep't of Corr. v. District of Columbia, 877 F.Supp. 634, 668-69 (D.D.C.1994), modified in part on other grounds, 899 F.Supp. 659 (D.D.C.1995). . . . Since Nelson produced sufficient evidence to demonstrate that Officer Turensky violated her clearly established Eighth Amendment rights by shackling her during labor, 'the basic concept underlying the Eighth Amendment [being] nothing less than the dignity of [wo]man,' Hope, 536 U.S. at 738 (quotation omitted), the judgment of the district court denying Officer Turensky qualified immunity is affirmed.").

Howard v. Kansas City Police Dept., 570 F.3d 984, 988, 991 (8th Cir. 2009) ("In the instant case, we elect to proceed under the traditional framework and decide first whether the facts demonstrate a violation of Howard's constitutional rights before determining whether such rights were clearly established. . . . We have already concluded the Officers used excessive force in seizing Howard because they acted unreasonably in responding to the dangers posed by the hot asphalt. We similarly conclude a reasonable official would understand that such conduct constitutes excessive force.")

Mussa v. Abdulkadir, No. 11–CV–1967 (PJS/JJG), 2013 WL 4780955, *2 (D. Minn. Sept. 5, 2013) ("Abdulkadir argues that, because he inflicted only de minimis injuries on Mussa, he is entitled to qualified immunity on Mussa's excessive-force claim under Chambers v. Pennycook, 641 F.3d 898 (8th Cir.2011). In Chambers, the Eighth Circuit held that a plaintiff need not show more than de minimis injuries in order to prevail on a claim of excessive force. . . But because the Eighth Circuit's previous case law had not been clear on this point, the police officers who had been sued in Chambers—and who had inflicted only de minimis injuries on the plaintiff—were found to be entitled to qualified immunity. . . Abdulkadir argues that, because the incident in this case took place before Chambers was decided, and because he inflicted only de minimis injuries on Mussa, he too is entitled to qualified immunity. The Court agrees. This case is squarely controlled by Chambers. Mussa does not dispute that Abdulkadir had the right to detain him for not having a light on his bicycle. Because Abdulkadir had the right to detain Mussa, he had the right to use some degree of force. . . This sets Mussa's case apart from cases in which, under the plaintiff's version of the facts, the officer did not have the right to make an arrest or otherwise detain the plaintiff. . .Mussa argues that, even though Abdulkadir had the right to detain him, Abdulkadir had no right to use force against him once Mussa was handcuffed and secured in the squad car. The problem with this argument, though, is that the very same situation was present in Chambers. After Chambers was handcuffed and on the floor, an officer kicked him and pressed his foot on Chambers's back. . . Chambers was then placed in a squad car, where another officer choked him and kicked the back of his seat. . . The officers also adjusted Chambers's seat so that Chambers's head was nearly touching the dashboard and then drove erratically so that Chambers was jerked back and forth (presumably causing Chambers's head to hit the dashboard). . . All of this happened after Chambers had been handcuffed and brought under control. Yet the Eighth Circuit nevertheless found that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity. . . In short, the fact that Mussa was handcuffed and in the squad car does not distinguish this case from Chambers. So long as Mussa's injuries were de minimis, Chambers dictates that Abdulkadir is entitled to qualified immunity.")

NINTH CIRCUIT

Whalen v. McMullen, No. 17-35267, 2018 WL 5530736, at *4, *8-9 (9th Cir. Oct. 30, 2018) ("Because of the important questions presented in this case, we address both prongs of the qualified immunity analysis. We first discuss whether McMullen's warrantless entry into Whalen's home under false pretenses was an unreasonable search under the Fourth Amendment, and we then turn to consideration of whether it was clearly established that such an entry was a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . McMullen's purpose was to gather evidence for the fraud investigation, which he did by making observations and video recordings of Whalen and her home. Because he entered the home while using a ruse and not while undercover, it is immaterial that he stayed within Whalen's presence in the home and did not conduct a broader search. He did not have consent to be in the home for the purposes of his visit. . . And he did not have consent—under any terms—to videotape Whalen or her home. By observing and videotaping Whalen inside her home without her consent, McMullen conducted a 'search' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. . . . McMullen searched Whalen's home without a warrant to gather evidence for an investigation of her potentially fraudulent application for benefits. Thus, even if this was an 'administrative' search, it served general law enforcement purposes and not a 'special need.'. . .For the foregoing reasons, we conclude that McMullen's entry into Whalen's home without consent or a warrant in the course of a CDIU civil fraud investigation related to Whalen's benefits claim was an unreasonable search under the Fourth Amendment. . . .

Although we conclude that McMullen's warrantless ruse-entry into Whalen's home was an unreasonable search, we cannot say it was clearly established that his conduct, in the context of a civil or administrative investigation related to a determination of benefits eligibility, was a search or was unreasonable. Whalen does not have to identify a controlling case finding a constitutional violation on the exact facts of her case for her asserted right to be clearly established, but she relies only on Bosse and other criminal ruse entry cases. In light of Wyman and Sanchez, Bosse would not have provided McMullen with notice that his actions—which were common practice for CDIU investigators—violated the Fourth Amendment. McMullen knew he was conducting a civil investigation, not a criminal investigation, and that it was related to Whalen's eligibility for social security benefits. Additionally, McMullen did not initially seek to enter Whalen's home but rather to engage her in front of her house; Whalen limited her constitutional challenge to McMullen's actions once he crossed the threshold. As the district court noted, there was no authority requiring McMullen to retreat from [Whalen's] home' as the conversation moved inside, nor was there authority 'clearly proscribing McMullen's conduct in this situation.' We agree that it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct, in the context of this civil investigation related to a determination of benefits eligibility, was unlawful. The right Whalen asserts was not clearly established, and McMullen is entitled to qualified immunity from this suit.")

Ioane v. Hodges, 903 F.3d 929, 933, 936-38 (9th Cir. 2018) ("While we have discretion to begin our analysis with either part of the test, . . . it is nevertheless beneficial to begin with the first part of the test because it 'promotes the development of constitutional precedent and is especially valuable with respect to questions that do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable.'. . .We begin with the first part of the qualified immunity test. While the Ninth Circuit never has articulated a standard for when an officer's intentional viewing of an individual's naked body is constitutionally permissible under the Fourth Amendment, '[t]he touchstone of the Fourth Amendment is reasonableness.'. . . Weighing the scope, manner, justification, and place of the search, a reasonable jury could conclude that Agent Noll's actions were unreasonable and violated Shelly's Fourth Amendment rights. Agent Noll's general interests in preventing destruction of evidence and promoting officer safety did not justify the scope or manner of the intrusion into Shelly's most basic subject of privacy, her naked body. . . We therefore affirm the district court on this issue. . . . The second part of the qualified immunity test requires us to determine whether, at the time of Agent Noll's actions in June 2006, the law was clearly established. . . . Taken together, the holdings from York, Grummett, Sepulveda, and Ybarra put the unlawfulness of Agent Noll's conduct beyond debate. . . .In sum, a reasonable officer in Agent Noll's position would have known that such a significant intrusion into bodily privacy, in the absence of legitimate government justification, is unlawful. . . We therefore conclude that Agent Noll is not entitled to qualified immunity.") Ioane v. Hodges, 903 F.3d 929, 938-39, 941-42 (9th Cir. 2018) (Bea, J., concurring in judgment) ("I agree with the majority's ultimate conclusion that the district court did not err in denying Agent Noll's motion for summary judgment regarding Shelly Ioane's claim that Agent Noll violated Shelly's clearly established constitutional rights. However, because I disagree with the majority's holding that Agent Noll's actions violated Shelly's clearly established right to bodily privacy, I write separately. . . . Here, the majority concludes that Agent Noll was not entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law, in part because Agent Noll violated Shelly's clearly established Fourth Amendment right to bodily privacy when Agent Noll searched Shelly and viewed her naked body during the course of executing a search warrant at the Ioanes' residence. In order to reach that conclusion, it is necessary for the majority to hold that a female law enforcement officer violates a clearly established right to bodily privacy when she unreasonably views the naked body of a female suspect. The majority cites three of our prior cases regarding bodily privacy to support the existence of such a clearly established right. But the cases cited by the majority are distinguishable from the instant case in significant ways. Most problematically, none of the cases cited by the majority state that there is a constitutional right to bodily privacy that is violated by same-sex observation. . . .Most notably, the majority asserts (in a footnote) that, although every bodily privacy case this circuit has decided involved cross-sex observation, 'gender was not central' to the analysis in any of those cases. . . Thus, the majority concludes, '[the fact t]hat Agent Noll and Shelly both are women does not change that Agent Noll violated Shelly's privacy rights.'. .Gender is not central? It is impossible to square this conclusion with our precedent. Every bodily privacy case cited by the majority involved cross-sex observation and every case noted that the cross-sex nature of the observation was a significant part of the court's analysis. No case cited by the majority discusses whether same-sex observation is subject to the same sort of analysis or scrutiny. In fact, language from York and Sepulveda—and the result from Grummett—strongly suggest that same-sex observations are not subject to the same sort of scrutiny as cross-sex observations. The majority is likely correct that Agent Noll's actions were unreasonable, and Agent Noll may have violated Shelly's constitutional right to bodily privacy during the search. But the existence of a constitutional violation alone is insufficient to deny qualified immunity—we must find that the right at issue was 'clearly established.' Our precedent at the time of the alleged violation in this case did not put the issue of whether same-sex observation violates the right to bodily privacy 'beyond debate.'. . The majority could have used this case to clarify the law regarding the right to bodily privacy and announced that the right applied in both same-sex and cross-sex situations alike. Perhaps that is the correct result. But the majority cannot, in one fell swoop, both announce for the first time that the scope of the bodily privacy right includes same-sex observations and, at the same time, hold that the right was clearly established at the time of the violation. . .Nonetheless, I concur in the majority's ultimate conclusion that the district court did not err in denying Agent Noll's motion for summary judgment. Drawing all factual inferences in favor of Shelly, as we must, Agent Noll's actions violated Shelly's Fourth Amendment rights under the Supreme Court's decision in Ybarra v. Illinois. . . . Agent Noll had no individualized probable cause to search Shelly. Consequently, there was no basis to conduct an evidence search of Shelly's person. Additionally, Agent Noll likely lacked any reasonable belief that Shelly was armed and dangerous. Although Agent Noll knew there were firearms in the house, those firearms did not belong to Shelly and there was no other basis on which to conclude that Shelly was armed and dangerous. Regardless, even if Agent Noll had a reasonable basis to believe Shelly was armed and dangerous, her actions in this case plainly exceeded the limits of the sort of weapons pat-down authorized by the Supreme Court in Terry v. Ohio. . . . As a result, I would hold that Agent Noll's actions violated Shelly's Fourth Amendment rights as clearly established in Ybarra.")

Recchia v. City of Los Angeles Dep't of Animal Servs., 889 F.3d 553, 559-60 (9th Cir. 2018) ("If all the birds maintained by Recchia had been unhealthy or sick in appearance, we think their entire seizure would pose no significant constitutional issue, and clearly would not offend the Fourth Amendment because of the scope of the emergency exception to the warrant requirement and the need to seize the birds to end their suffering and prevent transmission of illness. However, the crux of the problem here is that not all of the birds appeared to be sick, in fact eight birds appeared outwardly healthy. And so we are confronted with a factual issue about whether the exigent circumstances exception applies as to the seizure of the healthy-looking birds kept by Recchia in this case. . . .We hold that there is a genuine factual dispute about whether the healthy-looking birds posed any meaningful risk to other birds or humans at the time they were seized. Therefore, although we affirm the dismissal in part as to the seizure of the birds that appeared sick, we vacate and remand in part as to the seizure of any birds that were wholly healthy in outward appearance. . . .On remand, we instruct the district court to consider in the first instance whether the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity for any potential constitutional violation because it was not 'clearly established' at the time of the seizure that the warrantless seizure of the birds could be a violation of Recchia's constitutional rights.")

Isayeva v. Sacramento Sheriff's Dep't, 872 F.3d 938, 945-53 (9th Cir. 2017) ("In Maropulos v. County of Los Angeles, we encouraged district courts to help us evaluate our jurisdiction by 'articulat[ing] the basis upon which they deny qualified immunity.'. . Here, the district court stated in its order denying summary judgment that genuine disputes of material fact existed regarding whether the tasing and shooting were reasonable uses of force, and that those disputes of fact precluded ruling that Deputy Barry was entitled to qualified immunity. Then, in an order certifying this appeal as frivolous, the district court characterized its summary judgment ruling as resting on the determination that there are genuine issues of material fact, and concluded that Deputy Barry's appeal was frivolous. But the district court misapplied the law on qualified immunity. We must accept the district court's determination that there is a genuine dispute as to the circumstances under which Deputy Barry tased and shot the decedent. But, contrary to the district court's reasoning, the existence of a genuine dispute about the reasonableness of an officer's use of force does not preclude granting qualified immunity or eliminate any basis for an immediate appeal of denial of qualified immunity. See, e.g., Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433, 446 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc). Qualified immunity involves two questions: (1) whether the defendant violated a constitutional right, and (2) whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . Thus, as we recently explained, an officer may be denied qualified immunity at summary judgment in a Section 1983 case 'only if (1) the facts alleged, taken in the light most favorable to the party asserting injury, show that the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right, and (2) the right at issue was clearly established at the time of the incident such that a reasonable officer would have understood [his] conduct to be unlawful in that situation.'. . Either prong can be adjudicated on appeal by taking the facts as most favorable to the plaintiffs and applying the pertinent legal standards to those facts. . . .Deputy Barry contends that his use of both (a) the taser, and (b) deadly force, against Tereschenko did not violate clearly established law. We assume the facts most favorable to the plaintiff, and have jurisdiction to address (1) whether Deputy Barry violated clearly established law when he tased Tereschenko; and (2) whether Deputy Barry violated clearly established law when he fatally shot Tereschenko. . . .Here, Deputy Barry stresses the second prong, whether Tereschenko's rights not to be subject to the tasing and to the shooting were 'clearly established' on February 18, 2013. We address that prong first and, given our conclusion, need not address the other. . . .The dispositive question is 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established.'. . This question must be answered 'not as a broad general proposition,' but with reference to the facts of specific cases. . . . As of February 18, 2013, the date of the incident, three key published cases from the Ninth Circuit established when the use of a taser was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . . [N]either Brooks nor Mattos clearly established on February 18, 2013 that tasing Tereschenko would violate the Fourth Amendment. Nor do the two cases in combination with each other or with Bryan put the constitutionality of Deputy Barry's actions 'beyond debate.'. . Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff Isayeva, we hold that Tereschenko did not have a clearly established right violated by Deputy Barry's use of the taser. Deputy Barry is therefore entitled to qualified immunity for the tasing. We need not and do not reach the first prong of qualified immunity, asking whether Deputy Barry's use of the taser was reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . It is sufficient for purposes of qualified immunity merely to conclude that no clearly established law was violated by Deputy Barry in connection with his use of a taser against the resisting Tereschenko. . . .The standards from Garner and Graham 'are cast at a high level of generality,' so they ordinarily do not clearly establish rights. . . Rather, it is the facts of particular cases that clearly establish what the law is. . . .There is an exception to the rule that the Garner standard does not clearly establish the law governing when the use of deadly force is lawful. In an 'obvious case,' Garner's general test can ' "clearly establish" the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.'. . .Unlike in Hughes, here we conclude that Deputy Barry's use of force was not obviously unlawful. Indeed, construing the facts in Isayeva's favor, there are strong reasons to believe that Tereschenko posed a risk of death or serious injury to the officers or to the family members in the home. . . .Isayeva cites only one case from our circuit where an officer was involved in hand-to-hand combat with an individual, the officer used deadly force, and we held that the force used was excessive. See Hopkins v. Andaya, 958 F.2d 881 (9th Cir. 1992), as amended (Mar. 24, 1992) (per curiam). In Hopkins, when the record was construed in favor of the plaintiff, the fight involved the decedent hitting the officer once or twice to the arm or head, and the officer suffering only a minor cut on his arm and bruises on his elbow, back, and leg. Yet, without warning, the officer shot the decedent. . . We concluded that the officer 'was never in any serious danger' and that the use of deadly force was unreasonable. . . Unlike the present case, the decedent in Hopkins at no point had the upper hand in the fight, and the officer never came close to passing out. The decedent in Hopkins posed a much lesser threat to officer and citizen safety than did Tereschenko. Hopkins, like Garner, does not clearly establish that Deputy Barry's use of deadly force was unlawful. The above discussion shows that not only was it not obvious that Deputy Barry's use of deadly force was excessive, but that there are strong reasons supporting the reasonableness of the shooting. We conclude that under the circumstances of this case, Garner does not clearly establish Tereschenko's right to be free from deadly force by Deputy Barry. Though our analysis discussed factors relevant to whether Deputy Barry's use of deadly force was reasonable, we reach no conclusion on that issue. . . Instead, we rest our holding on the second prong of qualified immunity, that Tereschenko held no clearly established right not to be shot by Deputy Barry. . .We hold that Deputy Sean Barry is entitled to qualified immunity for the tasing and fatal shooting of Paul Tereschenko.")

C. V. by & through Villegas v. City of Anaheim, 823 F.3d 1252, 1256-57 (9th Cir. 2016) ("A reasonable jury could draw the following factual conclusions: (1) the officers, responding to a call about a suspected drug dealer armed with a shotgun and loitering in the visitor parking area of an apartment complex, came upon Villegas already holding a long gun; (2) Villegas was ordered to put his hands up, and as he was complying, the officers ordered him to drop his gun; (3) without providing a warning or sufficient time to comply, or observing Villegas pointing the long gun toward the officers or making any move toward the trigger, Bennallack resorted to deadly force. Viewing the facts in this light, deadly force was not objectively reasonable. Thus, the district court erred in holding that Bennallack's use of deadly force was justified as a matter of law and in granting summary judgment on that basis. Our court has rejected summary judgment in cases involving similar degrees of apparent danger, and we must do the same here. That ruling does not end our inquiry. Under the second prong of the qualified immunity test, we ask whether the alleged violation of Villegas's Fourth Amendment right against excessive force 'was clearly established at the time of the officer's alleged misconduct.'. . . We agree with the district court that it was not clearly established on January 7, 2012, that using deadly force in this situation, even viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, would constitute excessive force under the Fourth Amendment. Bennallack is therefore immune from liability under section 1983 for his use of deadly force, so we affirm the grant of summary judgment on the Fourth Amendment claim." [footnotes omitted])

Thomas v. Dillard, 818 F.3d 864, 871 (9th Cir. 2016) ("We address whether a law enforcement officer has reasonable suspicion to conduct a Terry frisk, searching a suspect for weapons, based solely on the perceived domestic violence nature of the investigation. We hold that, although the domestic violence nature of a police investigation is a relevant consideration in assessing whether there is reason to believe a suspect is armed and dangerous, it is not alone sufficient to establish reasonable suspicion. We therefore hold Dillard violated Thomas' Fourth Amendment rights against unreasonable seizure by detaining him for the purpose of performing a Terry frisk. Because it was not clearly established at the time that the perceived domestic violence nature of an investigation was insufficient to establish reasonable suspicion, however, we hold Dillard is entitled to qualified immunity. We further hold Dillard used excessive force when he tased Thomas in order to force him to submit to the Terry frisk against his consent. Given the frisk was unlawful and unnecessary, Dillard used unreasonable force. Nonetheless, given the unsettled state of the law regarding the use of Tasers at the time, we again hold Dillard is entitled to qualified immunity. Given the Supreme Court's instructions that we may not define clearly established law at too high a level of generality, it was not clearly established at the time of Dillard's actions that an officer who mistakenly but reasonably believed he had the right to conduct a Terry frisk could not deploy a Taser in dart mode to overcome a suspect's resistance to the frisk. Accordingly, without in any way endorsing Dillard's actions or overlooking the indignities those actions caused Thomas to suffer, we reverse the order of the district court and hold Dillard is entitled to summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity.")

Thomas v. Dillard, 818 F.3d 864, 900-01(9th Cir. 2016) (Bea, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("In my view, the nature of a domestic violence call justifies an officer's formulation of a reasonable suspicion that a suspect may be armed (in the absence of mitigating circumstances). Indeed, a law enforcement officer should feel a moral duty to protect victims of domestic violence. And while an officer of course cannot shadow an abuser forever to ensure no future violence befalls the victim, he can at least make sure that the 'scene is secure' from possible violence with weapons before he leaves the victim with an abuser. Given that domestic violence assaults account for nearly two-thirds of all fatal shootings of female victims in the United States, see Violence Pol'y Ctr. Report, supra, I would find that the relatively small incursion on bodily dignity of permitting a Terry frisk based on the domestic violence nature of a police call is far outweighed by the strong law enforcement interest—indeed, the broader societal interest—in saving the lives of domestic violence victims. We achieve this interest by assuring that abusers are not armed before the police officer leaves the scene of a domestic violence encounter. Yet the majority today requires a law enforcement officer to face potential liability unless he leaves a domestic violence scene without any assurance that the abuser is not armed and will not again inflict violence on the victim—only next time, with a gun. I cannot endorse a legal rule that places law enforcement officers in such a stressful dilemma. Thus, while I agree with the result reached by the majority today, I cannot join my colleagues to the extent they deny law enforcement officers a tool—the Terry frisk—vital for ensuring their own safety, as well as the safety of the domestic violence victims they have a duty to protect.")

Mitchell v. Washington, 818 F.3d 436, 446-47 (9th Cir. 2016) ('Because we hold that strict scrutiny applies, Dr. Bell is required to demonstrate that the use of race in his medical decision was narrowly tailored to achieve a compelling government interest. . . It is not difficult to imagine the existence of a compelling justification in the context of medical treatment. . . Because, however, Dr. Bell failed to offer any compelling justification for the racial classification, let alone a justification that was narrowly tailored; instead, arguing only that Mitchell's equal protection claim fails because race was not the 'primary' consideration in denying treatment, Dr. Bell failed to meet his burden under the strict scrutiny standard. Thus, the district court erred in concluding that no constitutional violation occurred. . . .Despite the fact that we hold that the violation of a constitutional right occurred, Dr. Bell is entitled to qualified immunity if it was not 'clearly established' that his actions would violate Mitchell's constitutional rights. . . .Mitchell 'has not brought to our attention, and our independent research does not reveal, case law involving the particular circumstances presented by this case.'. . Here, the 'particular circumstances' are the use of race-related success-of-treatment data as a factor in making a medical treatment decision. As a result, it was not clearly established that a reasonable official would understand that the use of race-related success-of-treatment data as a factor in a medical treatment decision would be unconstitutional. Dr. Bell is therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

Mitchell v. Washington, 818 F.3d 436, 447, 454 (9th Cir. 2016) (Clifton, J., concurring in part and concurring in the judgment) ("This court has never addressed whether the Constitution forbids a doctor from considering credible scientific evidence that individuals of a certain race respond poorly to a particular treatment. Nor have we addressed what standard of scrutiny would be used to evaluate such a claim. We do not need to address those questions in order to resolve this case, and I would not do so. . . .I concur in the judgment affirming the district court's summary judgment in favor of Defendants. I agree with the specific conclusions of the majority opinion that the Eleventh Amendment does not bar Mitchell's claim for damages against the Defendants in their individual capacities, that his claims for injunctive and declaratory relief are moot, that the summary judgment dismissing his claims for damages against Kelly Cunningham was appropriate, and that Dr. Bell is entitled to qualified immunity on the claim for damages against him. I would not take up the question of whether Mitchell's constitutional rights were violated, but if required to do so, conclude that they were not. I thus concur in part with the majority opinion and concur in full with its judgment.")

Sjurset v. Button, 810 F.3d 609, 615, 618-19 (9th Cir. 2015) ("We . . . have discretion to apply the second prong of the Saucier test at the outset in order to determine whether the law governing the Stayton officers' conduct was clearly established. If indeed the Stayton officers did not violate clearly established law, then we can determine that qualified immunity is appropriate and may thus dispose of the case without undertaking an analysis of whether a constitutional violation occurred in the first instance. In sum, we will heed the Supreme Court's admonition against prematurely attempting to define the particular constitutional violation in question in this case. . . . Wallis falls short of clearly establishing that reasonable officers in the Stayton officers' situation would have understood that they had a constitutional responsibility to second-guess DHS's protective-custody determination. Such second-guessing would have required the officers either to disrupt or to refuse to take part in the entry and removal of Sjurset's children. To be sure, if the Stayton officers had participated in the decision to take protective custody of Sjurset's children, then our precedent in Wallis and similar cases would clearly establish that the officers could not do so without a reasonable basis for believing that the children were in imminent danger. . . .But here the police officers did not participate in such a decision; they instead relied on DHS's determination. Sjurset further contends that the Stayton officers' role as 'integral participants' in the entry and removal is enough to trigger their liability for any violations of Sjurset's constitutional rights. To support this theory, Sjurset relies on Boyd v. Benton County, 374 F.3d 773 (9th Cir.2004). . . . But Sjurset's reliance on Boyd is misplaced both factually and legally. As a factual matter, the officers in Boyd acted as a collective team and were carrying out a preplanned search operation. . . . In contrast, no facts in this case suggest that the Stayton officers were privy to any discussions, briefings, or collective decisions made by DHS in its protective-custody determination. . . . Boyd . . . involved a collective decisionmaking process among the officers, with the result that all of them could be considered 'integral participants' in the execution of the plan. . . It does not squarely address the case at hand, wherein an entirely separate agency—DHS—made a protective-custody determination over which the Stayton officers had no input. . . . In sum, neither Wallis nor Boyd clearly establishes that the Stayton officers violated Sjurset's constitutional rights when they acted in reliance on DHS's protective-custody determination. We must therefore look elsewhere to decide whether the officers were on notice that their conduct violated clearly established law. Neither statute nor precedent, however, squarely addresses the circumstances of this particular case.")

Shinault v. Hawks, 782 F.3d 1053, 1058-60 & n.6 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Given Shinault's substantial interest, the risk of erroneous deprivation, and the ability to provide a hearing without compromising a significant government interest, we hold that a state must provide a hearing prior to freezing a significant sum in the inmate's account. . .Thus, we conclude that Shinault received insufficient due process as the result of Oregon's actions. . . . Given the absence of precedent establishing a state's obligation to provide a pre-deprivation hearing in these circumstances, the right was not clearly established at the time of the conduct. Quick is distinguishable enough from this matter, and several decisions from our sister circuits have held that post-deprivation process suffices, even for final withdrawals of assets. . . . The most recent appellate court decision on point required a pre-deprivation hearing, but that case was decided long after ODOC officials froze Shinault's assets. Montanez v. Sec'y Pa. Dep't of Corr., 2014 WL 5155040, at *7–8 (3d Cir. Aug. 15, 2014).")

Powell v. Slemp, 585 F. App'x 427, 427-28 (9th Cir. 2014) ("Here, the district court defined the clearly established right at issue too broadly, without reference to Sgt. Slemp's particular actions in this case. Unless existing law would have made it 'sufficiently clear' to a reasonable officer in Sgt. Slemp's position that attempting to restrain Powell with his gun drawn violated her Fourth Amendment rights, Sgt. Slemp was entitled to qualified immunity. See Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 639–40 (1987). Because no such case law exists, and because the illegality of his actions was not otherwise 'beyond debate,' al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2083, Sgt. Slemp must prevail on his motion for summary judgment. Exercising our discretion under Pearson v. Callahan, we decline to reach the question whether Sgt. Slemp's actions violated Powell's Fourth Amendment rights.")

Brown v. Oregon Dept. of Corrections, 751 F.3d 983, 989-90 (9th Cir. 2014) ("Although we conclude that a [twenty-seven month confinement in the IMU] without meaningful review may constitute atypical and significant hardship, our case law has not previously so held, and we cannot hold defendants liable for the violation of a right that was not clearly established at the time the violation occurred.")

Demers v. Austin, 746 F.3d 402, 406, 411, 412, 417 (9th Cir. 2014) (denying pet. for reh'g and reh'g en banc) ("We hold that Garcetti does not apply to "speech related to scholarship or teaching." Rather, such speech is governed by Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968). In Demers's case, we conclude that the short pamphlet was related to scholarship or teaching, and that it addressed a matter of public concern under Pickering. We conclude, further, that there is insufficient evidence in the record to show that the in-progress book triggered retaliation against Demers. Finally, we conclude that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, given the uncertain state of the law in the wake of Garcetti. . . .Demers presents the kind of case that worried Justice Souter. Under Garcetti, statements made by public employees 'pursuant to their official duties' are not protected by the First Amendment. . . But teaching and academic writing are at the core of the official duties of teachers and professors. Such teaching and writing are 'a special concern of the First Amendment.'. . We conclude that if applied to teaching and academic writing, Garcetti would directly conflict with the important First Amendment values previously articulated by the Supreme Court. One of our sister circuits agrees. See Adams v. Trs. of the Univ. of N.C.-Wilmington, 640 F.3d 550, 562 (4th Cir.2011) ("We are ... persuaded that Garcetti would not apply in the academic context of a public university as represented by the facts of this case."). . . .We conclude that Garcetti does not—indeed, consistent with the First Amendment, cannot—apply to teaching and academic writing that are performed 'pursuant to the official duties' of a teacher and professor. We hold that academic employee speech not covered by Garcetti is protected under the First Amendment, using the analysis established in Pickering. . . .Until the decision in this case, our circuit has not addressed the application of Garcetti to teaching and academic writing. . . .[B]ecause there is no Ninth Circuit law on point to inform defendants about whether or how Garcetti might apply to a professor's academic speech, we cannot say that the contours of the right in this circuit were 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood' that this conduct violated that right. . . We therefore hold that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.")

> Compare Brown v. Chicago Bd. of Educ., 824 F.3d 713, 714-16 (7th Cir. 2016) ("The Chicago Board of Education has a written policy that forbids teachers from using racial epithets in front of students, no matter what the purpose. Lincoln Brown, a sixth grade teacher at Murray Language Academy, a Chicago Public School, caught his students passing a note in class. The note contained, among other things, music lyrics with the offensive word 'nigger.' Brown used this episode as an opportunity to conduct what appears to have been a well–intentioned but poorly executed discussion of why such words are hurtful and must not be used. The school principal, Gregory Mason, happened to observe the lesson. Brown was soon suspended and brought this suit under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against the Board and various school personnel. . . . In the case before us, Brown himself has emphasized that he was speaking as a teacher—that is to say, as an employee—not as a citizen. . . . The question remains whether the Garcetti rule applies in the same way to 'a case involving speech related to scholarship or teaching.'. . The Supreme Court had no need to address that issue, and so left it for another day. This is not our first opportunity, however, in which to confront that question. See Mayer v. Monroe Cnty. Cmty. Sch. Corp., 474 F.3d 477 (7th Cir. 2007). In Mayer, we concluded that a teacher's in–classroom speech is not the speech of a 'citizen' for First Amendment purposes. . . The core of the teacher's job is to speak in the classroom on the subjects she is expected to teach. This meant, we thought, that in–classroom instruction necessarily constitutes 'statements pursuant to [the teacher's] official duties.'. . Here, Brown gave his impromptu lesson on racial epithets in the course of his regular grammar lesson to a sixth grade class. His speech was therefore pursuant to his official duties. That he deviated from the official curriculum does not change this fact. . . .Brown argues that we should ignore Mayer and instead follow the Ninth Circuit by understanding the Supreme Court's reservation as a hint that Garcetti should not apply 'in the same manner to a case involving speech related to scholarship or teaching.' Garcetti, 547 U.S. at 425; see Demers v. Austin, 746 F.3d 402, 411 (9th Cir. 2014). But Demers addressed speech in a university setting, not a primary or secondary school. It relied on the long–standing recognition that academic freedom in a university is 'a special concern of the First Amendment' because of the university's unique role in participating in and fostering a marketplace of ideas. . . In fact, in the primary and secondary school context, the Ninth Circuit follows Mayer's approach. See Johnson v. Poway Unified Sch. Dist., 658 F.3d 954, 962–63 (9th Cir. 2011) (holding in–classroom instruction is pursuant to teacher's official duties and unprotected employee speech). So do the Third and Sixth Circuits. Evans–Marshall v. Bd. of Educ. of Tipp City Exempted Vill. Sch. Dist., 624 F.3d 332 (6th Cir. 2010); Edwards v. Cal. Univ. of Pa., 156 F.3d 488, 491 (3d Cir. 1998) (Alito, J.) (pre–Garcetti). Only the Fourth Circuit has adopted the position that Brown advocates, and it did so without analysis. Lee v. York Cnty. Sch. Div., 484 F.3d 687, 694 n.11 (4th Cir. 2007). We see no reason to depart here from our decision in Mayer. Brown made his comments as a teacher, not a citizen, and so his suspension does not implicate his First Amendment rights.")

Acosta v. City of Costa Mesa, 718 F.3d 800, 824-26 & n.14 (9th Cir. 2013) ("Acosta presents two arguments that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity for seizing or arresting him: (1) he was arrested in retaliation for questioning the officers about why his time to speak was cut short and why he was asked to leave the council meeting; and (2) the officers lacked the requisite level of suspicion to seize or arrest him. Resolution of both contentions turns on whether probable cause existed to seize Acosta. Assuming Acosta's contention accurately reflects why he was arrested, Acosta's claim still fails under prong two of Saucier. . . In Reichle, the Supreme Court held that it had never recognized, nor was there a clearly established First Amendment right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause. . . Furthermore, at the time of the Council meeting, our precedent had previously upheld restrictions on speech at city council meetings where the speech was actually disruptive and this remains the law. . . Thus, if Acosta's seizure and arrest were supported by probable cause, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .[W]e find that probable cause existed to arrest Acosta for a violation of § 2–61 and summary judgment was properly granted in favor of the officers on this claim. . . Thus, even assuming that Acosta was arrested in retaliation for his remarks, because probable cause existed for a violation of § 2–61, the officers are still entitled to qualified immunity, not only for the removal of Acosta from the chambers, but also for his subsequent arrest. Summary judgment was properly granted in favor of the officers. . . . We note that if we were to find that no probable cause existed, the officers would still be entitled to qualified immunity. An officer is entitled to immunity where a reasonable officer would believe that probable cause existed, even if that determination was a mistake. . . Here, given the Mayor's repeated directives to cease speaking, the fact that the council meeting was now in recess, and the undisputed fact that Acosta remained at the podium addressing both the audience and the council, a reasonable officer would have believed that probable cause existed to arrest Acosta for a violation of § 2–61.")

Mueller v. Auker, 700 F.3d 1180, 1188 (9th Cir. 2012) ("Idaho law permits a police officer to place a child in shelter care without a court order when necessary to prevent serious physical injury. I.C. § 16–1612(since renumbered as I.C. § 16–1608). The Muellers' late assertion in their reply brief that this law is 'obviously unconstitutional' is of no help to them on this issue, because at the time the disputed decisions were made, no clearly established law existed to that effect. Moreover, the existence of a state statute authorizing an official's disputed conduct weighs in that official's favor, so long as the statute itself does not offend the Constitution, and I.C. § 16–1612 does not.")

Padilla v. Yoo, 678 F.3d 748, 750, 755, 757-68 & n.16 (9th Cir. 2012) ("Under recent Supreme Court law . . . we are compelled to conclude that, regardless of the legality of Padilla's detention and the wisdom of Yoo's judgments, at the time he acted the law was not 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he [wa]s doing violate[d]' the plaintiffs' rights. . . We therefore hold that Yoo must be granted qualified immunity, and accordingly reverse the decision of the district court. . . . [W]e reach this conclusion for two reasons. First, although during Yoo's tenure at OLC the constitutional rights of convicted prisoners and persons subject to ordinary criminal process were, in many respects, clearly established, it was not 'beyond debate' at that time that Padilla—who was not a convicted prisoner or criminal defendant, but a suspected terrorist designated an enemy combatant and confined to military detention by order of the President—was entitled to the same constitutional protections as an ordinary convicted prisoner or accused criminal. . . Second, although it has been clearly established for decades that torture of an American citizen violates the Constitution, and we assume without deciding that Padilla's alleged treatment rose to the level of torture, that such treatment was torture was not clearly established in 2001–03. . . . The crux of the district court's decision for purposes of this appeal is its assumption that any reasonable official would have understood in 2001–03 that United States citizen enemy combatants in military detention must be afforded at least the constitutional and statutory rights afforded to ordinary prison inmates. . . . The outcome of this appeal is governed by the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. 2074 (2011), decided subsequent to the district court's ruling against Yoo. . . . Significant here, under the second prong, a 'Government official's conduct violates clearly established law when, at the time of the challenged conduct, "[t]he contours of [a] right[are] sufficiently clear" that every "reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right."'. . . Padilla and Lebron acknowledge that at the time Yoo served as Deputy Assistant Attorney General at OLC, there did not exist a 'single judicial opinion,'. . . holding that a United States citizen held in military detention as an enemy combatant possessed rights against the kind of treatment to which Padilla was subjected. They argue, however, that it was clearly established that Padilla possessed such rights because any reasonable official would have understood during 2001 to 2003 that a citizen detained as an enemy combatant had to be afforded at least the constitutional protections to which convicted prisoners and ordinary criminal suspects were entitled. That argument is foreclosed by al-Kidd, which compels us 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . . Here, of course, the Supreme Court had not, at the time of Yoo's tenure at OLC, declared that American citizens detained as enemy combatants had to be treated at least as well, or afforded at least the same constitutional and statutory protections, as convicted prisoners. On the contrary, the Supreme Court had suggested in Ex parte Quirin, 317 U.S. 1 (1942), the most germane precedent in existence at the time of Yoo's tenure at OLC, that a citizen detained as an unlawful combatant could be afforded lesser rights than ordinary prisoners or individuals in ordinary criminal proceedings. . . . Hamdi . . . was not decided until 2004, so it could not have placed Yoo on clear notice of Padilla's constitutional rights in 2001–03 when Yoo was at the Department of Justice. Even after Hamdi, moreover, it remains murky whether an enemy combatant detainee may be subjected to conditions of confinement and methods of interrogation that would be unconstitutional if applied in the ordinary prison and criminal settings. Although Hamdi recognized that citizens detained as enemy combatants retain constitutional rights to due process, the Court suggested that those rights may not be coextensive with those enjoyed by other kinds of detainees. . . . In sum, the plaintiffs did not, through their reliance on either Hamdi or cases involving ordinary prison and criminal settings, allege violations of constitutional and statutory rights that were clearly established in 2001–03. During that relevant time frame, the constitutional rights of convicted prisoners and persons subject to ordinary criminal process were, in many respects, clearly established. But Padilla was not a convicted prisoner or criminal defendant; he was a suspected terrorist designated an enemy combatant and confined to military detention by order of the President. . . . In light of Padilla's status as a designated enemy combatant, . . . we cannot agree with the plaintiffs that he was just another detainee—or that it would necessarily have been 'apparent' to someone in Yoo's position that Padilla was entitled to the same constitutional protections as an ordinary convicted prisoner or accused criminal. . . . The same is true of Padilla's RFRA claim. As the Fourth Circuit held, the application of RFRA to enemy combatants in military detention was not clearly established in 2001–03. . . . The absence of a decision defining the constitutional and statutory rights of citizens detained as enemy combatants need not be fatal to the plaintiffs' claims. The Supreme Court has long held that 'officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.' . . . The plaintiffs invoke this principle here. They argue that, even if there is no specific judicial decision holding that the Fifth Amendment's prohibition on government conduct that 'shocks the conscience' is violated when the government tortures a United States citizen designated as an enemy combatant, torture of a United States citizen is the kind of egregious constitutional violation for which a decision 'directly on point' is not required. Al– Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2083.[footnote omitted] We agree with the plaintiffs that the unconstitutionality of torturing a United States citizen was 'beyond debate' by 2001. . . . Yoo is entitled to qualified immunity, however, because it was not clearly established in 2001–03 that the treatment to which Padilla says he was subjected amounted to torture. In 2001–03, there was general agreement that torture meant the intentional infliction of severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental. [footnote omitted] The meaning of 'severe pain or suffering,' however, was less clear in 2001–03. . . . Here, Padilla alleged that he was subjected to prolonged isolation; deprivation of light; exposure to prolonged periods of light and darkness, including being 'periodically subjected to absolute light or darkness for periods in excess of twenty-four hours'; extreme variations in temperature; sleep adjustment; threats of severe physical abuse; death threats; administration of psychotropic drugs; shackling and manacling for hours at a time; use of 'stress' positions; noxious fumes that caused pain to eyes and nose; loud noises; withholding of any mattress, pillow, sheet or blanket; forced grooming; suspensions of showers; removal of religious items; constant surveillance; incommunicado detention, including denial of all contact with family and legal counsel for a 21–month period; interference with religious observance; and denial of medical care for 'serious and potentially life-threatening ailments, including chest pain and difficulty breathing, as well as for treatment of the chronic, extreme pain caused by being forced to endure stress positions.'. . The complaint also alleged, albeit in conclusory fashion, that Padilla 'suffered and continues to suffer severe mental and physical harm as a result of the forty-four months of unlawful military detention and interrogation.'. . It also alleged that Padilla suffered 'severe physical pain' and 'profound disruption of his senses and personality.'. .We assume without deciding that Padilla's alleged treatment rose to the level of torture. [footnote omitted] That it was torture was not, however, 'beyond debate' in 2001–03. There was at that time considerable debate, both in and out of government, over the definition of torture as applied to specific interrogation techniques. In light of that debate, as well as the judicial decisions discussed above, we cannot say that any reasonable official in 2001–03 would have known that the specific interrogation techniques allegedly employed against Padilla, however appalling, necessarily amounted to torture. Thus, although we hold that the unconstitutionality of torturing an American citizen was beyond debate in 2001–03, it was not clearly established at that time that the treatment Padilla alleges he was subjected to amounted to torture. . . . For these reasons, we hold that Yoo is entitled to qualified immunity on the plaintiffs' claims. . . . We have discretion to decide which of the two prongs of qualified immunity analysis to address first. . . Here, we consider only the second prong. . . . Because we reverse on that basis, we do not address Yoo's alternative arguments that the complaint does not adequately allege his personal responsibility for Padilla's treatment and that a Bivens remedy is unavailable.")

Hunt v. County of Orange, 672 F.3d 606, 616 (9th Cir. 2012) ("We conclude, like the district court, that Carona could have reasonably but mistakenly believed that Hunt's demotion was not unconstitutional, given the unique nature of his job as Chief of Police Services for the City of San Clemente. Although Hunt's position had no department-wide policy-making responsibility, influence, or control, as the jury found, Hunt exercised discretion over the implementation of OCSD policy within San Clemente, influenced OCSD policy as it affected San Clemente, and formulated plans to implement OCSD policy in San Clemente. While Hunt had to secure authority before speaking with the public, when he did so, it was on behalf of the OCSD. We have carefully analyzed the development of the policymaker exception, its underlying purpose, the high burden on the government to prove that political fidelity was a necessary requirement of Hunt's job, and balanced the nine-factor Fazio analysis that requires a fact-dependent inquiry. Even if Carona engaged in the appropriate analysis and wrongly concluded that Hunt was a policy-maker such that demoting him was constitutional, we cannot say that he acted objectively unreasonably in concluding he could demote Hunt without violating his constitutional rights.")

Hunt v. County of Orange, 672 F.3d 606, 617 (9th Cir. 2012) (Leavy, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Pursuant to the Supreme Court's decision in Pearson v. Callahan. . . we need not decide whether a constitutional violation exists before we reach the question of qualified immunity. Because the majority has chosen to reach the issue whether Carona's conduct violated Hunt's constitutional rights, I am compelled to concur in only Sections II. D., III and IV of the opinion. I dissent from the majority's holding that Hunt was not a 'policymaker.'")

Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433, 440, 443-48 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc) ("Here, we follow the Saucier order as recited above, because this 'two-step procedure promotes the development of constitutional precedent' in an area where this court's guidance is sorely needed. . . .We begin by considering the nature and quality of the force used against Brooks: a taser in drive-stun mode. . . . Here, the record is not sufficient for us to determine what level of force is used when a taser is deployed in drivestun mode. We follow the Supreme Court's guidance in Scott, however, and need not decide this issue in order to assess the reasonableness of the tasing. . . Instead, we proceed to determine whether Jones's use of the taser against Brooks in this case was reasonable, keeping in mind the magnitude of the electric shock at issue and the extreme pain that Brooks experienced. . . . In sum, Brooks's alleged offenses were minor. She did not pose an immediate threat to the safety of the officers or others. She actively resisted arrest insofar as she refused to get out of her car when instructed to do so and stiffened her body and clutched her steering wheel to frustrate the officers' efforts to remove her from her car. Brooks did not evade arrest by flight, and no other exigent circumstances existed at the time. She was seven months pregnant, which the officers knew, and they tased her three times within less than one minute, inflicting extreme pain on Brooks. A reasonable fact-finder could conclude, taking the evidence in the light most favorable to Brooks, that the officers' use of force was unreasonable and therefore constitutionally excessive.

. . . In sum, when the defendant officers tased Brooks, there were three circuit courts of appeals cases rejecting claims that the use of a taser constituted excessive force; there were no circuit taser cases finding a Fourth Amendment violation. Russo, Hinton, and Draper are factually distinguishable from Brooks. Indeed we have concluded that–unlike the plaintiffs in those cases–Brooks has alleged a Fourth Amendment violation. We cannot conclude, however, in light of these existing precedents, that 'every "reasonable official would have understood" ... beyond debate' that tasing Brooks in these circumstances constituted excessive force. . . Moreover, the violation was not so obvious that we can 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality,' finding that Graham alone renders the unconstitutionality of Brooks's tasing clearly established. . .We therefore follow the example of our court's three-judge panel in Bryan v. MacPherson, 630 F.3d 805 (9th Cir.2010). In Bryan, we held that the use of a taser constituted excessive force, but we concluded that the defendant officer was entitled to qualified immunity. The tasing in Bryan took place in 2005, and we observed that in that year 'there was no Supreme Court decision or decision of our court addressing' the use of a taser in dart mode. . . As a result, we concluded that 'a reasonable officer in Officer MacPherson's position could have made a reasonable mistake of law regarding the constitutionality of the taser use in the circumstances' confronted. . . Thus, we conclude that, although Brooks has alleged an excessive force claim, the law was not sufficiently clear at the time of the incident to render the alleged violation clearly established. Accordingly, the defendant officers are entitled to the defense of qualified immunity against Brooks's § 1983 excessive force claim.")

Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433, 451, 452 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc) ("To summarize, Aikala used the intermediate force of a taser in dart-mode on Jayzel after he and the other officers arrived to ensure her safety. Her offense was minimal at most. She posed no threat to the officers. She minimally resisted Troy's arrest while attempting to protect her own body and to comply with Agarano's request that she speak to him outside, and she begged everyone not to wake her sleeping children. She bears minimal culpability for the escalation of the situation. The officers were faced with a potentially dangerous domestic dispute situation in which they reasonably felt that Troy could physically harm them if he chose to, but there was no indication that Troy intended to harm the officers or that he was armed. When Aikala encountered slight difficulty in arresting Troy because Jayzel was between the two men, Aikala tased her without warning. Considering the totality of these circumstances, we fail to see any reasonableness in the use of a taser in dart-mode against Jayzel. When all the material factual disputes are resolved in Jayzel's favor and the evidence is viewed in the light most favorable to her, we conclude that she has alleged a Fourth Amendment violation. That is, a reasonable fact finder could conclude that the officers' use of force against Jayzel, as alleged, was constitutionally excessive in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . .Even though the facts in Mattos are readily distinguishable from the facts in Russo, Hinton, and Draper, the violation was not so obvious that we can rely on the Graham factors and define the contours of clearly established law at a high level of generality. . . Accordingly, we conclude that the officers here are entitled to qualified immunity for tasing Jayzel.") Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433, 453 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (Schroeder, J., concurring) ("[T]he Supreme Court's opinion in al-Kidd appears to require us to hold that because there was no established case law recognizing taser use as excessive in similar circumstances, immunity is required.")

Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433, 453, 454 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc) Kozinski, C.J., joined by Bea, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("By asking police to serve and protect us, we citizens agree to comply with their instructions and cooperate with their investigations. Unfortunately, not all of us hold up our end of the bargain. . . . Brooks and Mattos breached the covenant of cooperation by refusing to comply with police orders. When citizens do that, police must bring the situation under control, and they have a number of tools at their disposal.")

Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433, 460 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (Silverman, J., joined by Clifton, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("Ashcroft v. al-Kidd instructs courts 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,' 131 S.Ct. 2074, 2084 (2011); however, al-Kidd should not be read to require a DNA-match between our precedent and the cases before us. . . Precedent already on the books in August 2006 provided officers and courts with enough guidance to know that a taser in dart mode is not a toy and presents a level of force on par with other implements 'used to subdue violent or aggressive persons.'. . Because the district court correctly found that the circumstances facing Officer Aikala are disputed, summary judgment was properly denied. I would affirm the district court and, therefore, respectfully dissent.")

C.F. ex rel. Farnan v. Capistrano Unified School Dist., 654 F.3d 975, 978, 986 (9th Cir. 2011) ("In this case, a former public high school student alleges that his history teacher violated his rights under the Establishment Clause by making comments during class that were hostile to religion in general, and to Christianity in particular. Mindful that there has never been any prior reported case holding that a teacher violated the Constitution under comparable circumstances, we affirm the district court's conclusion that the teacher is entitled to qualified immunity. Because it is readily apparent that the law was not clearly established at the time of the events in question, and because we may resolve the appeal on that basis alone, we decline to pass upon the constitutionality of the teacher's challenged statements. . . . We have little trouble concluding that the law was not clearly established at the time of the events in question there has never been any reported case holding that a teacher violated the Establishment Clause by making statements in the classroom that were allegedly hostile to religion. Because the district court's judgment must be affirmed on that basis, we decline to consider the constitutionality of Corbett's statements, and we vacate the district court's decision to the extent it decided the constitutionality of any of Corbett's statements.")

Association for Los Angeles Deputy Sheriffs v. County of Los Angeles, 648 F.3d 986, 997 (9th Cir. 2011) ("Under the facts alleged, plaintiffs Wilkinson and Sherr have made out a constitutional violation. They had a right to a post-suspension hearing which Defendants denied them. The district court held that this right was not clearly established, however. The court stated that after the California Court of Appeal's decision in Zuniga, a reasonable official would have believed that denying jurisdiction over the appeals of retired deputies was lawful. We agree with the district court as to the individually named Civil Service Commissioners, who after Zuniga had no authority to hear Wilkinson's and Sherr's appeals. . . But Zuniga does not protect the County Supervisors and the Sheriff. Zuniga interpreted the County Charter and Civil Service Rules as denying the Commission jurisdiction. . . Given the holdings of Loudermill, Mallen, and Gilbert, a reasonable official in the position of the Sheriff and the Supervisors should have concluded that, because the Commission was stripped by the state appellate court of its ability to adjudicate the suspensions of retired employees, those suspensions would be constitutionally suspect. The onus would be on County officials to address this constitutional defect, for example by providing an alternative hearing for the retired employees. Zuniga merely points out a jurisdictional flaw in the County's civil service procedures; Zuniga does not excuse the unconstitutionality of that flaw. Thus, as to the claims brought by Wilkinson and Sherr, we hold that the district court erred in granting qualified immunity to the Sheriff and the Board of Supervisors, but did not err in granting qualified immunity to the Civil Service Commissioners.")

Association for Los Angeles Deputy Sheriffs v. County of Los Angeles, 648 F.3d 986, 998 (9th Cir. 2011) ("Under the facts alleged, the hearings Defendants provided for Debs and O'Donoghue may have been unconstitutional. We hold, however, that to the extent Debs and O'Donoghue were entitled to a more substantial hearing, this right was not clearly established at the time of the violation. As the Second Circuit recently noted, it is an unresolved question whether due process is satisfied by a post-suspension hearing that sustains a suspension based solely on the fact of a pending criminal proceeding. See Nnebe v. Daus, __ F.3d __, No. 09-4305, 2011 WL 2149924, at *12 (2d Cir. May 31, 2011). Although Gilbert and Mallen make clear that post-suspension procedures are constitutionally required when employees are suspended after being charged with felonies, those cases do not specifically define what must be included in those procedures. A reasonable official would not necessarily infer from existing case law that a post-suspension hearing limited to the question of whether a felony charge has been filed is unconstitutional. Thus, all individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from Debs's and O'Donoghue's claims.")

Noble v. Adams, 646 F.3d 1138, 1142, 1143, 1148 (9th Cir. 2011) ("We conclude pursuant to what is now known as prong 2 of the Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S.194 (2001) test . . . that it was not clearly established in 2002–nor is it established yet–precisely how, according to the Constitution, or when a prison facility housing problem inmates must return to normal operations, including outside exercise, during and after a state of emergency called in response to a major riot, here one in which inmates attempted to murder staff. According to Norwood, we defer to prison officials' judgment so long as that judgment does not manifest either deliberate indifference or an intent to inflict harm. . . . In summary, in 2002 it would not have been clear to a reasonable officer that his or her conduct vis à vis the declaration of an emergency, the lockdown, or the curtailment of use of the exercise yard was unlawful in the situation he or she confronted.")

Smith v. Almada, 640 F.3d 931, 941-45 (9th Cir. 2011) (Gwin, District Judge, specially concurring) ("With the motion for rehearing, Judge Gould has withdrawn his concurrence in the holding that a Brady claim cannot be made where there has not been a conviction. Some wisdom supports avoiding constitutional questions where cases can be decided on other grounds. . . Until recently, however, we would have been required to address the constitutional issue before addressing any Section 1983 immunity issue. . . And, deciding the materiality issue somewhat begs the question: material to what constitutional right? . . . Because Plaintiff Smith must show both a violation of a constitutional right and that the failure to disclose was material, I believe we should have addressed whether a constitutional right was impaired before moving to whether any violation was material. In addition to finding that the non-disclosed evidence was insufficiently important to undermine confidence in the outcome of Smith's trial, I would also find that Smith cannot make a Brady claim where there has been no conviction. . . . Three of our sister circuits have found that a defendant who is ultimately acquitted cannot maintain a Brady claim. . . . Moreover, although the Seventh Circuit has not completely foreclosed Brady-based § 1983 claims without a conviction, it requires the plaintiff to show that no trial would have occurred if police had disclosed the exculpatory or impeachment evidence. . . . Recognizing Brady as a post-conviction right does not foreclose all constitutional remedies where a defendant has been tried but not convicted. Where a criminal defendant believes that withheld exculpatory evidence has caused charges to be brought and maintained against him, but no conviction has resulted, his remedy would flow from a false arrest or malicious prosecution claim, and not from Brady. . . . In sum, allowing Brady-based § 1983 claims without a conviction is not compelled by our circuit's case law, conflicts with other circuits' case law and the central purpose of Brady, would render Brady's materiality standard significantly less workable, and lacks a limiting principle. I would therefore not allow § 1983 claims for alleged Brady violations by a defendant who is ultimately acquitted.")

Bardzik v. County Of Orange, 635 F.3d 1138, 1144, 1145 & n.6, 1149 (9th Cir. 2011) ("Resolving all factual disputes in Bardzik's favor, we determine whether Carona is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law. . . . Under our de novo standard of review and resolving disputes of material fact in Bardzik's favor, Bardzik was a policymaker as Reserve Division Commander. Thus, under Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 201 (2001), and Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808, 815-16, 818 (2009), there was no constitutional violation and Carona is entitled to qualified immunity for his allegedly retaliatory demotion of Bardzik. . . . We have the option to address only the clearly-established step of the qualified immunity analysis. . . However, we elect to address whether there was a constitutional violation because the policymaker analysis is fact intensive and unsettled . . . .In these circumstances, it is proper to address Saucier's first step first. . . . Because Bardzik was a 'policymaker,' Carona did not violate the Constitution by demoting Bardzik and transferring him to Court Operations, and Carona is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Bryan v. MacPherson, 630 F.3d 805, 825-33 (9th Cir. 2010) (superseding opinon and denial of reh'g en banc) ("We, along with our sister circuits, have held that tasers and stun guns fall into the category of non-lethal force. . . Non-lethal, however, is not synonymous with non-excessive; all force–lethal and non-lethal–must be justified by the need for the specific level of force employed. . . Nor is 'non-lethal' a monolithic category of force. A blast of pepper spray and blows from a baton are not necessarily constitutionally equivalent levels of force simply because both are classified as non-lethal. Rather than relying on broad characterizations, we must evaluate the nature of the specific force employed in a specific factual situation. . . . .We recognize the important role controlled electric devices like the Taser X26 can play in law enforcement. The ability to defuse a dangerous situation from a distance can obviate the need for more severe, or even deadly, force and thus can help protect police officers, bystanders, and suspects alike. We hold only that the X26 and similar devices when used in dart-mode constitute an intermediate, significant level of force that must be justified by the governmental interest involved. . . . Officer MacPherson relies heavily on the Eleventh Circuit opinion in Draper v. Reynolds, 369 F.3d 1270 (11th Cir.2004), which addressed the use of a taser during the arrest of an aggressive, argumentative individual. Although we do not adopt Draper as the law of this circuit, the present case is clearly distinguishable from the one before the Eleventh Circuit. . . . [T]he officer in Draper was confronting a belligerent, argumentative individual who was angrily pacing within feet of his position. Officer MacPherson, by contrast, was confronted with a half naked, unarmed, stationary, apparently disturbed individual shouting gibberish at a distance of approximately twenty feet. The only similarity to the factual circumstances in Draper is that both Draper and Bryan were stopped for a traffic violation, were loud, and were tasered by the police. . . . [T]here was no substantial government interest in using significant force to effect Bryan's arrest for these misdemeanor violations that even the State of California has determined are minor. . . . Officer MacPherson now argues that use of the taser was justified because he believed Bryan may have been mentally ill and thus subject to detention. To the contrary: if Officer MacPherson believed Bryan was mentally disturbed he should have made greater effort to take control of the situation through less intrusive means. . . . Thus, whether Officer MacPherson believed that Bryan had committed a variety of nonviolent misdemeanors or that Bryan was mentally ill, this Graham factor does not support the deployment of an intermediate level of force. . . . [W]e have held that police are 'required to consider A[w]hat other tactics if any were available" to effect the arrest.' Headwaters, 240 F.3d at 1204 (quoting Chew, 27 F.3d at 1443). . . . We do not challenge the settled principle that police officers need not employ the 'least intrusive' degree of force possible. . . . We merely recognize the equally settled principle that officers must consider less intrusive methods of effecting the arrest and that the presence of feasible alternatives is a factor to include in our analysis. . . . [W]hile by no means dispositive, that Officer MacPherson did not provide a warning before deploying the X26 and apparently did not consider less intrusive means of effecting Bryan's arrest factor significantly into our Graham analysis. . . . We thus conclude that the intermediate level of force employed by Officer MacPherson against Bryan was excessive in light of the governmental interests at stake. Bryan never attempted to flee. He was clearly unarmed and was standing, without advancing in any direction, next to his vehicle. Officer MacPherson was standing approximately twenty feet away observing Bryan's stationary, bizarre tantrum with his X26 drawn and charged. Consequently, the objective facts reveal a tense, but static, situation with Officer MacPherson ready to respond to any developments while awaiting back-up. Bryan was neither a flight risk, a dangerous felon, nor an immediate threat. Therefore, there was simply 'no immediate need to subdue [Bryan]' before Officer MacPherson's fellow officers arrived or less-invasive means were attempted. . . Officer MacPherson's desire to quickly and decisively end an unusual and tense situation is understandable. His chosen method for doing so violated Bryan's constitutional right to be free from excessive force. . . .All of the factors articulated in Graham–along with our recent applications of Graham in Deorle and Headwaters–placed Officer MacPherson on fair notice that an intermediate level of force was unjustified. . . . However, as of July 24, 2005, there was no Supreme Court decision or decision of our court addressing whether the use of a taser, such as the Taser X26, in dart mode constituted an intermediate level of force. Indeed, before that date, the only statement we had made regarding tasers in a published opinion was that they were among the 'variety of non-lethal "pain compliance" weapons used by police forces.'. . And, as the Eighth Circuit has noted, '[t]he Taser is a relatively new implement of force, and case law related to the Taser is developing.' Brown v. City of Golden Valley, 574 F.3d 491, 498 n. 5 (8th Cir.2009). Two other panels have recently, in cases involving different circumstances, concluded that the law regarding tasers is not sufficiently clearly established to warrant denying officers qualified immunity. Mattos v. Agarano, 590 F.3d 1082, 1089-90 (9th Cir.2010); Brooks v. City of Seattle, 599 F.3d 1018, 1031 n.18 (9th Cir.2010). Based on these recent statements regarding the use of tasers, and the dearth of prior authority, we must conclude that a reasonable officer in Officer MacPherson's position could have made a reasonable mistake of law regarding the constitutionality of the taser use in the circumstances Officer MacPherson confronted in July 2005. Accordingly, Officer MacPherson is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Bryan v. MacPherson, 630 F.3d 805, 809, 810 (9th Cir. 2010) (9th Cir. 2010) (Wardlaw, J., joined by Judges Pregerson, Reinhardt, and W. Fletcher, concurring in the denial of rehearing en banc) ("Although the panel's original opinion affirmed the district court's denial of qualified immunity, Officer MacPherson and amici curiae League of California Cities and California State Association of Counties suggested we reconsider given that two other taser cases arising from incidents that occurred about the same time as Bryan's tasing were pending in our circuit. We did so, and, although we did not alter our holding that Officer MacPherson used excessive force on Bryan, we concluded that, based on 'recent statements [in other circuit opinions] regarding the use of tasers, and the dearth of prior authority,' a 'reasonable officer in Officer MacPherson's position could have made a reasonable mistake of law regarding the constitutionality of the taser use in the circumstances Officer MacPherson confronted in July 2005.'. . After the panel filed its amended opinion, only Bryan petitioned for panel rehearing or rehearing en banc. Officer MacPherson opposed Bryan's petition, arguing that the panel had correctly applied the law of qualified immunity. In other words, our current decision is a denial of Bryan's–and not Officer MacPherson's–petition for rehearing en banc. After mischaracterizing the record, misstating our holding, and attacking our opinion for language it does not in fact contain, Judge Tallman ultimately bases his dissent to our decision against rehearing en banc upon the largely unsupported and nonsensical belief that use of a device designed to fire a dart up to one-half inch into bare skin and deliver a 1200 volt charge somehow does not constitute an intermediate use of force. He cites no intra-circuit conflict created by our decision, but instead asserts that we erred by quoting binding circuit precedent. He cites no inter-circuit conflict created by our decision, but instead faults us for joining the growing national judicial consensus that tasers in dart mode constitute an intermediate level of force. More strikingly, he fails to tell the public that our court has simultaneously chosen to rehear the two other taser cases en banc–not because those opinions disagreed with the intermediate-level-of-force conclusion in Bryan, for they did not–but instead to reconsider how best to balance 'the nature and quality of the intrusion on the individual's Fourth Amendment interests' against 'the countervailing governmental interests at stake' as required by Graham, 490 U.S. at 396. See Brooks v. City of Seattle, 599 F.3d 1018 (9th Cir.2010), rehr'g en banc granted by 623 F.3d 911, 2010 WL 3896202 (9th Cir. Sep 30, 2010); Mattos v. Agarano, 590 F.3d 1082 (9th Cir.2010), rehr'g en banc granted by __ F.3d __, 2010 WL 3931122(9th Cir. Oct 04, 2010).")

Bryan v. MacPherson, 630 F.3d 805, 817, 819 (9th Cir. 2010) (Tallman, J., with whom Judges Callahan and N.R. Smith join, dissenting from the denial of rehearing en banc) ("The panel's revised opinion correctly determines that the law on whether an officer's use of a taser to control an aggressive and noncompliant subject violated the subject's Fourth Amendment rights was not clearly established, and thus holds that Officer MacPherson is entitled to qualified immunity. Having reached that conclusion, the panel's work should have been done. Instead, the panel goes on to examine whether use of the taser constitutes unconstitutional excessive force. In concluding that it does, the Bryan panel mischaracterizes the facts, relies on bad law, and uses contested facts to set future use-of-force policy for all law enforcement officers in the Ninth Circuit. . . . In apparent recognition of the fact that the Deorle standard is faulty, the panel has again amended its opinion–a single sentence of its opinion–this time to delete the above-quoted language ["[T]he degree of force used by [law enforcement] is permissible only when a strong governmental interest compels the employment of such force." 272 F.3d at 1280.] and to state instead that tasers 'constitute an intermediate, significant level of force that must be justified by the governmental interest involved.' . . The panel's amendment does not go far enough. The mere deletion of a single reference to Deorle does not overrule it; we must go en banc to do so. Moreover, the panel's repeated citations to Deorle throughout the rest of the opinion suggest that it considers Deorle to present a more preferable standard than the one the Supreme Court has chosen. Indeed, by amending its opinion to more accurately reflect the correct standard without actually applying it, the panel attempts to disguise the fact that it has applied Deorle yet again. In so doing, it has ensured that the judgment of the officer on the street, who is not afforded the luxury of time, will nearly always be supplanted by the more ponderous judgment of this Court.")

Costanich v. Department of Social and Health Services, 627 F.3d 1101, 1108, 1109 n.12, 1113-16 (9th Cir. 2010) ("We conclude that deliberately fabricating evidence in civil child abuse proceedings violates the Due Process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment when a liberty or property interest is at stake, . . . and that genuine issues of material fact exist on the question of deliberate fabrication. We further conclude, however, that, because it was not clear at the time these events took place that this right applied in the context of proceedings adjudicating a foster care license and termination of guardianship, Duron did not deprive Costanich of a constitutional right that was 'clearly established.' Accordingly, Duron is entitled to qualified immunity for the alleged evidence fabrication and declaration in support of the guardianship termination proceedings. . . . We proceed to apply the Saucier two steps in sequence because we have discretion to do so, and because we find such application to be beneficial. . . . We . . . conclude that Costanich had a Fourteenth Amendment due process right to be free from deliberately fabricated evidence in a civil child abuse proceeding, and that, because genuine issues of material fact exist as to whether Duron deliberately fabricated evidence, which led to the termination proceedings and license revocation, the district court erroneously concluded that 'Plaintiff has not provided evidence showing that Defendants deliberately made false statements and fabricated evidence to make a false finding of abuse.'. . . We agree with the district court's conclusion that Duron did not violate Costanich's 'clearly established' rights. Although we conclude that, going forward, officials who deliberately fabricate evidence in civil child abuse proceedings which result in the deprivation of a protected liberty or property interest are not entitled to qualified immunity, this right had not previously been clearly established in the civil context. . . . Under Devereaux, charging an individual with criminal child abuse based on false information violates the Constitution. . . Although Devereaux does not specifically address civil child abuse proceedings, the right not to be accused based upon deliberately fabricated evidence is sufficiently obvious, and Devereaux is sufficiently analogous to the facts here, that government officials are on notice that deliberately falsifying information during civil investigations which result in the deprivation of protected liberty or property interests may subject them to § 1983 liability. . . . Further, because social workers, like prosecutors, are entitled to absolute immunity for instituting child removal proceedings, social workers, like prosecutors, must refrain from deliberately falsifying evidence during investigations and in sworn testimony or declarations to the court. . . Thus, going forward, reasonable government officials are on notice that deliberately falsifying evidence in a child abuse investigation and including false evidentiary statements in a supporting declaration violates constitutional rights where it results in the deprivation of liberty or property interests, be it in a criminal or civil proceeding. However, given the distinctions between criminal prosecutions and civil foster care proceedings, we cannot say that this right was clearly established as of 2001, when the conduct at issue in this case occurred. The special duties of prosecutors and the unique interests at stake in a criminal action do not parallel the duties and interests at stake in a civil child custody proceeding. Washington's 'paramount concern' for safeguarding and protecting the health and safety of foster children, for example, places a special duty on DSHS officials to vigorously investigate allegations of child abuse. . . Furthermore, it is clear that Washington foster care licensees' and custodial guardians' interests do not rise to the level of a criminal defendant's interests, which are clear and long-established. While these factors do not excuse deliberate fabrication of evidence, there are sufficient distinctions between criminal prosecutions and civil foster care proceedings that the right had not yet been clearly established in the civil context. Because we conclude that the right not to be accused based on deliberately falsified evidence during civil investigations which could result in the deprivation of protected liberty or property interests was not clearly established when the conduct at issue in this case occurred, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.")

James v. Rowlands, 606 F.3d 646, 652-56 (9th Cir. 2010) ("First, James contends that the defendants' failure to notify him of the molestation investigation violated his constitutional rights. In support of this claim, James points to no authority establishing that any parent-even a parent with full legal and physical custody-has a constitutional right to be informed when officials investigate allegations that his or her child has been molested. . . Exercising our discretion under

Pearson, we decline to decide here whether parents have such a right, and whether officials have a correlative constitutional duty to notify a minor's parent when they investigate allegations that the minor has been molested. . . Instead, we affirm the grant of summary judgment for the defendants on the ground that such a right, if it exists, was not clearly established at the time of the events in question. . . . Second, James contends that the defendants violated his rights by failing to notify him of the investigation into Blair's alleged attempts to coerce C.J. to change her testimony. Again, James points to no authority suggesting that state actors such as the defendants here have a constitutional duty to inform a minor's parent of such allegations, or more generally of allegations that someone is mistreating the child. We decline to decide here whether or under what circumstances parents have a right to such information. Instead, we affirm the grant of qualified immunity to the defendants on this claim because such a right, if it exists, was not clearly established. . . . [A] reasonable jury could find that the CPS officials violated James's rights by taking C.J. into protective custody and placing her with her grandmother without notifying him or giving him the opportunity to take C.J. into his care. . . . On the factual record, a jury could conclude that the CPS officials' failure to notify James that they were taking C.J. into protective custody was not 'reasonably necessary' to avert any danger to C.J. and that the CPS officials therefore violated James's rights. . . . Thus, James's allegations, taken as true, establish that the CPS officials violated his constitutional rights. Nonetheless, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. Burke extended for the first time Wallis's rule to protect parents without physical custody. . . Burke recognized that, before it addressed the issue, it was not clearly established that detaining a child without notifying a parent who had only shared legal custody would violate that parent's constitutional rights. . . Because James's rights were therefore not clearly established in 2003, the time of the relevant events here, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . . We therefore hold that the Fourteenth Amendment's protection of parents' rights requires officials to notify a parent with shared legal custody of a transfer in a minor's physical custody when the officials have encouraged and facilitated that transfer. . . . Following Wallis's example, we hold that public officials may encourage and facilitate a transfer of a minor's physical custody without notifying a parent with shared legal custody only if they have reasonable cause to believe that such notification would put the child in imminent danger of serious bodily injury. . . . The defendants are nonetheless entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. As discussed above, Burke, decided in 2009, was the first case in this circuit to establish that interfering with a child's physical custody can violate the rights of a parent who does not have physical custody. . . Failing to contact James about the voluntary agreement was therefore not clearly unlawful at the time, and the CPS defendants are entitled to summary judgment on this claim.").

Ewing v. City of Stockton, 588 F.3d 1218, 1231 (9th Cir. 2009) ("[W]e need not determine whether the officers had probable cause to arrest Heather for murder because the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. See Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808, 818 (2009) (authorizing courts to determine whether right at issue was clearly established before deciding whether it was violated). The Ewings do not establish that the unlawfulness of charging Heather with murder on the facts in question was clearly established.") .

Phillips v. Hust, 588 F.3d 652, 654-58 (9th Cir. 2009) (on remand from Supreme Court) ("We are confronted with two questions in this remanded case. First, did Hust's actions violate the Constitution? Second, assuming a constitutional violation, is Hust nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity because the relevant constitutional right was not 'clearly established' at the time she acted? Until this year, the Supreme Court required us to resolve those issues in a rigid two-step 'order of battle.' That is, we were required, first, to determine whether the defendant's actions violated a constitutional right and second, whether that right was clearly established. . . The so-called 'Saucier two-step' was designed to promote the Constitution's 'elaboration from case to case' and to prevent 'constitutional stagnation,' but generated considerable criticism from academics and judges. . . . Keeping Pearson in mind, we turn to the case now before us. This case is about the First Amendment right of access to the courts. . . . Therefore, for Phillips to prevail, he must show that use of the comb-binding machine was necessary to allow him 'meaningful access' to the courts. . . . Before answering that question, however, we pause to discuss Pearson's impact on this case. Because the qualified immunity issue is straightforward, this is an appropriate case to bypass the more difficult question of whether Hust violated Phillips's constitutional rights. . . Moreover, this is a case 'in which the constitutional question is so fact-bound that the decision [would] provide [ ] little guidance for future cases.'. . Thus, gladly exercising our newfound authority, we do not decide whether Hust's actions violated Phillips's constitutional rights. Rather, we proceed directly to ask whether Hust is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]he precise question before us is whether a reasonable prison official would believe that denying access to the comb-binding machine would violate an inmate's right of meaningful access to the Supreme Court of the United States. . . .In light of the Supreme Court's flexible rules for pro se filings, which do not require and perhaps do not even permit comb-binding, we have no difficulty concluding that Hust is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Burke v. County of Alameda, 586 F.3d 725, 733, 734 (9th Cir. 2009) ("The intrusion on Farina's right of familial association presents us with a question of first impression because B.F. did not reside with Farina. In Brittain v. Hansen, this circuit recognized that non-custodial parents have a reduced liberty interest in the companionship, care, custody, and management of their children. . . . Although Melissa and Farina shared joint legal custody of B. F., the record indicates that Melissa had sole physical custody. However, even if Farina's interest in B.F.'s companionship was somehow reduced, he was not without any interest in the custody and management of B.F. We therefore extend the holding in Wallis to parents with legal custody, regardless of whether they also possess physical custody of their children. . . . We now expressly extend our holding in Wallis, 202 F.3d at 1138, to parents with only legal custody. . . . Against this legal backdrop, we cannot say that failing to contact Farina, who did not have physical custody of B.F., was clearly unlawful. Accordingly, Foster is entitled to immunity, and we affirm the grant of summary judgment in his favor.").

Stoot v. City of Everett, 582 F.3d 910, 918 n.8, 919, 920 (9th Cir. 2009) (amended opinion) ("Before the Supreme Court's recent decision in Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808, 818 (2009), courts addressing an official's claim of qualified immunity were required to follow the two-step sequential inquiry established in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 202 (2001), asking first whether the plaintiff alleged a violation of a constitutional right and, second, whether that right was clearly established at the time of the conduct at issue. Pearson relieved courts of their obligation always to follow this sequence. . . . Although rigid adherence to the Saucier protocol is no longer required, the Court was careful to note that Saucier's two-step procedure is 'often beneficial,' as it 'promotes the development of constitutional precedent.'. . Such is the case here, where we have not previously addressed whether a police officer may rely solely on the statements of a very young victim of alleged sexual abuse to establish probable cause to seize a potential suspect. . . . We hold that Jensen could not rely solely on the uncorroborated, inconsistent statements of this very young child to establish probable cause to arrest Paul. Given A.B.'s age at the time of the purported events and at the time she reported them, as well as the inconsistencies noted above, A.B.'s statements, standing alone, were insufficient to establish probable cause to seize Paul. . . . Although we disagree with his assessment of A.B.'s credibility and read the applicable case law as consistent with our conclusion, none of the cases cited by the Stoots put him directly on notice that his decision to rely on A.B.'s statements, without any corroboration, was unlawful. We therefore affirm the district court's judgment that he is entitled to qualified immunity on the Stoots' Fourth Amendment claim.").

Mueller v. Auker, 576 F.3d 979, 994, 995, 1000 (9th Cir. 2009) ("With all respect to the district court's conclusion to the contrary, this kaleidoscopic set of facts and circumstances creates without doubt a classic genuine issue of material fact on the central issue of whether Rogers reasonably perceived imminent danger to Taige. . . . Thus, if a factfinder were to decide that Rogers was indeed confronted with exigent circumstances, his failure to contact Eric would not have violated Eric's rights. On the other hand, a factual decision to the contrary would produce an opposite constitutional result. This case, therefore, presents the type of situation as contemplated by the Supreme Court where a constitutional decision is inappropriate and unwise. . . . Thus we proceed to the next prong. . . . [V]iewing here the facts in the light most favorable to the Muellers, and assuming without deciding that Eric Mueller in the circumstances presented, had constitutional rights to both pre- and post-deprivation notice which were not honored, we determine whether those rights were clearly established. Specifically, was it clearly established that Detective Rogers had to give pre-deprivation notice not only to the parent in the hospital present with and exercising judgment with respect to her child's medical situation, but also to a parent absent from the scene of his decision? Further, was it clearly established that Eric Mueller had a constitutional right to post-deprivation notice, which Detective Rogers had the responsibility to deliver? . . . . Detective Rogers has successfully shown he is entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that he violated Eric Mueller's constitutional right to pre-deprivation notice. It was not clearly established at the time that he removed Taige from her parents' custody that he was required to give Eric Mueller notice of his decision. Thus, we reverse both the district court's denial of summary judgment on Rogers's claim and the district court's grant of summary judgment to Eric Mueller on the underlying issue. In addition, Detective Rogers has successfully shown he is entitled to qualified immunity on the claim that he violated Eric Mueller's constitutional right to post-deprivation notice. Accordingly, we remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Mueller v. Auker, 576 F.3d 979, 1006, 1007 (9th Cir. 2009) (Wallace, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I disagree with the majority's decision to exercise appellate jurisdiction over the district court's partial summary judgment in favor of Eric on his procedural due process claims. I would instead refrain from hearing the appeal at this interlocutory stage of the proceedings. . . I turn next to Detective Rogers' appeal from the district court's denial of his qualified immunity claim. This appeal is undoubtedly subject to immediate review under Mitchell, and I agree that the district court should be reversed. However, I am concerned with how the majority reaches that conclusion. As the majority recounts, the Supreme Court in Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808, 818 (2009) held that courts now have discretion to determine 'which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis [prescribed in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001)] should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.' In this case, the majority reasons, '[b]ecause we have concluded after reviewing the factual evidence on this issue in the light most favorable to Rogers–or for that matter to Eric Mueller–that there was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Rogers was confronted with imminent danger to Taige at the time in question, we see no useful purpose in pursuing[the first step of Saucier].' The majority's reasoning is deficient in the context of qualified immunity. The first step of Saucier asks whether, viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the allegedly injured party, the record establishes a constitutional violation. 533 U.S. at 201. Nothing about this inquiry requires this court to resolve factual disputes in the record. In fact, the Supreme Court has clarified that the first step of the Saucier inquiry in no way requires courts to assume a fact-finding capacity; rather, a court generally just adopts the version of the facts set forth by the party challenging immunity. . . .Thus, contrary to the majority's reasoning, the existence of a factual dispute as to the 'imminent danger' does not justify skipping the first step of Saucier. . . . At this stage in the dispute, we are required only to view the evidence in the light most favorable to the injured party–no factual findings are required. The majority's reference to this factual dispute as reason to skip step one of Saucier is therefore misplaced. . . . Unlike the majority, I would hold that this is a case where the court can 'rather quickly and easily decide that there was no violation of clearly established law,' while the question at step one of Saucier is more difficult. . . . Indeed, the first step inquiry asks us to determine whether due process requires a state official to give an absent parent notice of his decision to assume custody of a child for emergency medical purposes. We need not resolve this complicated constitutional issue, however, because both the majority and the dissent agree that even if such rights existed, they were not clearly established at the time of the relevant conduct. Thus, this case presents a prime example of a case where skipping the first step of Saucier is advisable because 'it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.'").

Tibbetts v. Kulongoski, 567 F.3d 529, 535, 536, 539, 540 (9th Cir. 2009) ("Under the circumstances of this case, we adopt Pearson's more flexible approach and proceed directly to an analysis of Saucier's second prong, to determine whether the right asserted in this case was 'clearly established' when the alleged stigmatizing statements were made. . . . As permitted by Pearson and required by Saucier, we analyze the merits of the Governor's qualified immunity claim by addressing whether the parameters of Plaintiffs' right to a name clearing hearing were clearly established at the time of the Releases. . . . Although cases need not be 'fundamentally similar' in order to put an official on notice that his conduct violates established law, Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002), if the parameters of the right are not clearly established by case law, the official is entitled to qualified immunity. . .Here, it cannot be said that a reasonable person in Governor Kulongoski's position would have known that he was violating Plaintiffs' Fourteenth Amendment due process rights under the circumstances of this case. Even if we assume, arguendo that the statements in the Releases were stigmatizing to Plaintiffs, it was not then established whether the stigmatizing statements satisfied the 'temporal nexus' requirement of Campanelli, nor that the Governor could be found to have 'caused' Plaintiffs' terminations. Accordingly, we reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment to Governor Kulongoski.").

Ramirez v. City of Buena Park, 560 F.3d 1012, 1022-24 (9th Cir. 2009) ("Because Montez could not have reasonably suspected Ramirez had a weapon, we hold his pat-down of Ramirez violated the Fourth Amendment. Having determined the existence of a constitutional violation, we consider whether the right violated was clearly established at the time of its occurrence. . .At the time of Ramirez's pat-down, it was clearly established that every pat-down is unreasonable unless it is supported by the officer's reasonable suspicion that the person to be frisked is armed and dangerous. . . .Bypassing the constitutional question in the qualified immunity analysis, we exercise our discretion in reaching Saucier's second prong first, see Pearson, 129 S.Ct. at 818, as it will 'satisfactorily resolve' the arrest issue without having 'unnecessarily to decide difficult constitutional questions.'. . . [W] e conclude that a reasonable officer in Montez's position would not have clearly known that his conduct was unlawful under these circumstances. . . Although we do not decide whether the facts allege a constitutional violation, we do find that Montez's actions were reasonable in light of the qualified immunity analysis. Thus, Montez is entitled to summary judgment on this issue.").

Rodis v. City, County of San Francisco, 558 F.3d 964, 968-70 (9th Cir. 2009) ("In Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 200 (2001), the Supreme Court mandated a two step sequence for resolving qualified immunity claims. First, a court must decide whether the alleged facts make out a violation of a constitutional right. . . If the plaintiff satisfies the first step, the court must then decide whether the right at issue was 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged misconduct. . .More recently, however, the Supreme Court revisited Saucier and concluded that 'while the sequence set forth there is often appropriate, it should no longer be regarded as mandatory.'. . Accordingly, we first turn to the question of whether the right asserted in this case was 'clearly established.' . . .In evaluating the totality of the circumstances in this case, however, we embark on unchartered waters. Defendants assert that they had probable cause as to Rodis's intent based solely on the evidence suggesting that the bill might have been fake. Rodis contends that without specific evidence of his intent to defraud, above and beyond the tender of a potentially counterfeit bill, the arrest was unlawful. This circuit has never addressed this issue. . .All of the other circuits to have answered this question, however, have found that '[t]he passing of a counterfeit note coupled with an identification of the person who passed the note furnishes probable cause to arrest the individual identified as passing the note.'. .In Pearson, the Supreme Court noted that 'where the divergence of views on ... [the constitutionality of the alleged misconduct] [i]s created by the decision of the Court of Appeals in th[e] case, it is improper to subject petitioners to money damages for their conduct.'. . Thus, regardless of whether we determine that evidence beyond the tender of a counterfeit bill was required, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. Were we to decide that there was a violation, we would create a circuit split and Defendants would not have been on notice that their conduct was unlawful. Were we to decide that this evidence was not required, Rodis's claim would fail in the first instance. Because it is unnecessary to disposition of this case, we decline to decide this question.").

Reid v. City of Beverly Hills, No. 07-56059, 2009 WL 367397, at *1 (9th Cir. Feb. 13, 2009) ("We do not decide whether probable cause was lacking, see Pearson v. Callahan . . . , for, even assuming the officers were mistaken, there is no law that would have made it clear to a reasonable police officer in these officers' position that their assessment of probable cause violated Reid's constitutional rights. Accordingly, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity based on their objectively reasonable, albeit mistaken, belief that there was probable cause.").

Barnard v. Las Vegas Metropolitan Police Dept., 310 F. App'x 990, 2009 WL 277044, at 1-3 (9th Cir. Feb. 4, 2009) ("Under Pearson, the decisional sequence required by Saucier is no longer mandatory. . . .We thus proceed in our analysis under the Supreme Court's new guidance. . . .The district court correctly granted summary judgment as to Charles' mistaken arrest claim. For the purposes of our analysis we assume, without deciding, that the mistaken arrest constituted a violation of his constitutional rights. . .Even assuming a constitutional violation, however, we conclude that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because the right was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . .The district court erred in granting summary judgment as to Charles' excessive force claim as against the officers. Under Saucier, we first analyze whether Charles has alleged a viable claim that his constitutional rights were violated. . . . We now turn to whether a reasonable officer would have known that the use of force here was unlawful, that is, whether the right to be free of excessive force was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . [A]t the time of the incident at issue here, a reasonable officer would have known that it violated clearly established law to use a choke hold on a non-resisting arrestee who had surrendered, pepper-spray him, and apply such knee pressure on his neck and back that it would cause the collapse of five vertebrae in his cervical spine. Thus, construing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, as we must at this stage, we conclude that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Nichols v. Brown, 945 F.Supp.2d 1079, 1098-1101 (C.D. Cal. 2013) ("The Court exercises its discretion to address the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, namely, whether the right Plaintiff asserts to openly carry a firearm, whether loaded or unloaded, in a public park was 'clearly established' under the Second Amendment as of May 21, 2012, when Plaintiff was stopped by Officer Heywood and Officer Doe. Even assuming, without deciding, for the limited purpose of the qualified immunity analysis only, that a constitutional violation occurred in the warrantless inspection and confiscation of Plaintiff's long gun, the Court concludes that the right to openly carry a firearm in a public park was not 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation and that the individually-named Redondo Beach defendants are therefore entitled to qualified immunity from Plaintiff's claim for money damages. . . . In light of the continued uncertainty as to the scope of the rights accorded by the Second Amendment following the Supreme Court's recent decisions in Heller and McDonald, the Court concludes that the right to openly carry a firearm in a public park was not 'beyond debate' at the time of the alleged violation such that a reasonable official would understand that enforcing a city ordinance that prohibits carrying a firearm in specified public areas was unconstitutional.")

Mann v. County of San Diego, No. 3:11–cv–0708–GPC–BGS, 2013 WL 4046642, *10 (S.D. Cal. Aug. 8, 2013) ("Plaintiff's assert that, notwithstanding the Supreme Court's vacatur of the Fourth Amendment portion of the Ninth Circuit's decision in Greene, Cisneros' interview of N.G.P.M. was unconstitutional. While the interview of N.G.P.M. may have been unconstitutional, the Court first addresses whether a right to be free from such interviews was clearly established at the time of the interview. In that regard, Plaintiffs provide no additional authority demonstrating that, at the time of the interview, it was clearly established that a social worker's brief, voluntary interview of a suspected child-abuse victim at school (with the option of having a school official present) violates the Constitution. Thus, the Court finds Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as to the interview of N.G.P.M. at school.")

Skurdal v. Federal Detention Center, No. C12–706 RSM, 2013 WL 3897772, *1, *2 (W.D. Wash. July 29, 2013) ("[T]he Court declines to adopt Part III(D)(3)(a) of the Report and Recommendation. The Ninth Circuit has not expressly held that a plaintiff can bring a Bivens claim for alleged Free Exercise Clause violations. In Resnick v. Adams, the Ninth Circuit considered a Free Exercise challenge brought as a Bivens claim, but ultimately dismissed it for failure to state a constitutional violation, without holding that Bivens was the proper vehicle to bring such a claim if it were valid. . . Therefore, whether or not the Bivens claim was proper was immaterial to the decision. . . Although the unpublished decision in Panagacos v. Towery allowed a free-speech claim to proceed under Bivens, 501 Fed. App'x 620, 623 (9th Cir.2012), this does not mean that Bivens also encompasses Free Exercise claims since the Supreme Court considers each type of First Amendment claim on its own merits, rather than the Amendment as a whole when determining whether a Bivens action can be brought. . . At least three other circuits have also explicitly reserved this question, assuming without deciding that such a claim can be brought. [citing cases] While the Ninth Circuit may find that such a claim can be brought, the Court finds it more prudent at this time, in the absence of an explicit Ninth Circuit holding, to assume without deciding the issue because it may be unnecessary to answer should the Court grant the individual-capacity defendants' properly supported motion for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Mendez v. City of Scottsdale, Ariz., No. CV–12–285–PHX–GMS, 2012 WL 3870364, *6 (D. Ariz. Sept. 6, 2012) ("Plaintiff alleges that he was arrested in retaliation for questioning Officer Bolin regarding Bolin's demand that Plaintiff show identification, in violation of his speech rights. As Plaintiff concedes in his Response, however, at the time Officer Bolin took action based on Plaintiff's speech, he already had probable cause to arrest Plaintiff for failure to obey his orders. . . . Plaintiff contends, citing Houston v. Hill, that the First Amendment 'protects the rights of citizens to criticize and even challenge the police.'. . Hill, however, was a case in which the Court reversed the conviction of a defendant who was arrested and convicted solely for verbally challenging police under a statute which the Court deemed unconstitutional. . . In this case, Officer Bolin had probable cause to arrest Plaintiff on independent grounds. And the Supreme Court recently implied that an arrest made in retaliation for one's exercise of protected speech is not unlawful so long as the officer has probable cause for the arrest on other grounds. [citing Reichle v. Howards] The Court will dismiss Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment wrongful arrest/imprisonment claim and First Amendment freedom of speech claim.")

Guzman-Martinez v. Corrections Corp. of America, No. CV 11–02390–PHX–NVW, 2012 WL 2873835, *8, *9 (D. Ariz. July 13, 2012) ("Without considering any limitation of Plaintiff's rights under the Fourteenth Amendment because she is a detained alien, housing transgender women inmates among male inmates monitored by male detention officers would violate the Fourteenth Amendment if the practice imposes some harm to the transgender women inmates that significantly exceeds the inherent discomforts of confinement and is not reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective, such as maintaining security and order and operating the detention facility in a manageable fashion. To determine whether Kane, Scalet, Campbell, and Leal are shielded by qualified immunity, it is not necessary to decide the first prong of the qualified immunity standard, i.e., whether the practice violates the Fourteenth Amendment, because the constitutional standard is not clearly established, which satisfies the second prong for establishing qualified immunity. . . . Plaintiff primarily alleges that Defendants should have known that transgender women inmates are vulnerable to victimization and that housing them with male inmates monitored by male detention officers would subject them to serious risk of substantial harm. Plaintiff also alleges inadequate training and supervision of detention officers and supervision of inmates, but does not allege, even generally, the training and supervision needed to prevent serious risk of substantial harm to transgender women. . . . Plaintiff has not identified any legal authority holding that a transgender woman, who is biologically male, has a constitutional right to be housed in an immigration detention facility for females and to only have contact with female detention officers. . . .Therefore, Plaintiff does not have a clearly established constitutional right to be housed in a women's detention facility or in a single-occupancy cell in a men's detention facility or to be released from detention based solely on her status as a transgender woman.")

J.C. ex rel. R.C. v. Beverly Hills Unified School Dist., 711 F.Supp.2d 1094, 1124-26 (C.D. Cal. 2010) ("Here, although the Court has found that a violation of J.C.'s First Amendment rights has occurred, the second Saucier step unequivocally resolves the issue of qualified immunity in Defendants' favor. . . . Here, there is no binding Supreme Court precedent that governs J.C.'s conduct. The Supreme Court has yet to address whether off-campus speech posted on the Internet, which subsequently makes its way to campus either by the speaker or by any other means, may be regulated by school officials. . . . Additionally, while numerous recent cases have applied the Supreme Court's student speech precedents to cases involving student speech over the Internet, see Beussink, Emmett, Killion, O.Z., Wisniewski, Doninger, and Bethlehem, none have done so in a factually analogous setting. The Court has yet to find a student-speech case addressing hurtful and embarrassing speech directed at a student's classmate, which emanated outside the school grounds. . . . Certainly, the contours of a student's First Amendment right to make a potentially defamatory and degrading video about a classmate, which is almost immediately thereafter brought to the School's attention, are not clearly established.")

TENTH CIRCUIT

Bishop v. Szuba, No. 17-6136, 2018 WL 3409907, at *2-4 (10th Cir. July 12, 2018) (not reported) ("Here, the district court found that Szuba's conduct satisfied the first prong of the qualified-immunity test. . .We have some doubts about that conclusion. Specifically, we question whether there exists an affirmative link between Bishop's injuries and Szuba's conduct. . . . Nevertheless, we assume without deciding that Szuba indeed violated Bishop's constitutional right 'to be kept reasonably safe from harm.'. . We pursue this route because we conclude, for the reasons discussed below, that Bishop fails to satisfy the second prong of the qualified-immunity test. That is, he fails to show the law was clearly established. Accordingly, we need not resolve the constitutional question. . . .Here, the district court did exactly what the Supreme Court has said not to do: it (1) 'define[d] clearly established law at a high level of generality,'. . . and (2) failed to discuss the '"particularized" ... facts of th[is] case[.]'. . Specifically, it stated that foster children have a clearly established right to 'be kept reasonably safe from harm' while in foster care and that this general right 'has been clearly established since at least 1985.'. . The district court did cite two cases to support this conclusion. But it neither discussed the facts of those cases nor explained whether or how those facts are sufficiently similar to the ones before us to place the constitutional question here 'beyond debate.'. . And our independent review of those two cases convinces us that neither one clearly established the contours of the right at issue. In Yvonne L. ex rel. Lewis v. New Mexico Department of Human Services, 959 F.2d 883 (10th Cir. 1992), we held that, as a general matter, foster children indeed have a right 'to protection while in foster care.'. . And we also set forth the standard for determining whether a defendant has violated that right. . . But we didn't apply that standard to the defendants' conduct. . . Instead, we remanded to the district court to determine, in the first instance, whether a constitutional violation occurred. . . Thus, because we didn't find a constitutional violation in Yvonne L., it doesn't clearly establish the contours of the constitutional right at issue here. . . Neither does Schwartz, which we decided more than 13 years after Szuba's investigation. . . In short, even if we assume that Szuba violated Bishop's Fourteenth Amendment rights, neither Schwartz nor Yvonne L.—the only two cases the district court cited below—clearly establishes as much. And Bishop doesn't identify on appeal any additional authorities that might. . . Accordingly, Szuba is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Lincoln v. Maketa, 880 F.3d 533, 537-39, 541-44 (10th Cir. 2018) ("We have discretion to resolve an issue of qualified immunity on either of the two prongs, and we need not decide whether a violation occurred if we conclude that the right was not 'clearly established.'. . Here, we choose to address the second prong, concluding that none of the underlying rights were clearly established at the time of the alleged retaliation. . . . The law was not clearly established on whether Lt. Peck's duties included her discussion with the media. As head of Internal Affairs, Lt. Peck spoke to the media about an Internal Affairs matter at the explicit direction of her supervisor. The speech therefore seems to have been '"commissioned"' by her employer. . . .Lt. Peck contends that her speech was not made in the course of her official duties because

• her job duties did not require her to speak to the media and
• she disobeyed Sheriff Maketa's instructions on what to say.

We reject both contentions.

First, Lt. Peck notes that speaking to the media was not part of her job duties. But an employee's formal job duties are not dispositive; speech can be considered 'official' even when it 'concerns an unusual aspect of an employee's job that is not part of his everyday functions.'. . Second, Lt. Peck spoke to the media because of a directive, but she disobeyed the order to lie. In some circuits, Lt. Peck's disobedience might affect whether she was speaking as part of her official duties. See Dahlia v. Rodriguez, 735 F.3d 1060, 1075 (9th Cir. 2013) ("[W]hen a public employee speaks in direct contravention to his supervisor's orders, that speech may often fall outside of the speaker's professional duties."); Jackler v. Byrne, 658 F.3d 225, 241–42 (2d Cir. 2011) (holding that an employee spoke as a citizen when he disobeyed his superiors' orders to retract a truthful report and substitute a false one). But this approach is not universal. See Nixon v. City of Houston, 511 F.3d 494, 498–99 (5th Cir. 2007) (holding that a uniformed officer's media statement constituted official speech regardless of whether it was 'in contravention of the wishes of his superiors'). The Tenth Circuit has not spoken on this issue. In the absence of applicable precedent, Sheriff Maketa lacked clear guidance on whether Lt. Peck was speaking as part of her official duties. See Mocek v. City of Albuquerque, 813 F.3d 912, 929 n.9 (10th Cir. 2015) ("A circuit split will not satisfy the clearly established prong of qualified immunity."). As a result, the alleged retaliation would not have violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . .Sgt. Stone and the district court relied only on general standards, noting that an adverse employment action is one that would deter reasonable persons from exercising their First Amendment rights. But the analysis of qualified immunity is based on specific facts, not abstract principles. White v. Pauly, —— U.S. ——, 137 S.Ct. 548, 552, 196 L.Ed.2d 463 (2017) (per curiam). Sgt. Stone does not direct us to any on-point cases from this court, the Supreme Court, or other courts; and he has not demonstrated that the criminal investigation would 'obviously' constitute an adverse employment action. . . Thus, Sheriff Maketa is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim. . . . In short, neither we nor other circuits have established any clear guidance on where to draw the line between adverse and non-adverse paid administrative leave. . .Without any guidance, we do not regard placement on paid administrative leave as a clearly established adverse employment action. . .Thus, Sheriff Maketa and Undersheriff Presley were entitled to dismissal of this claim. . . . .Third, general principles are insufficient for a clearly established right. Instead, the Commanders must point to precedent establishing that the particular conduct at issue here is unlawful. . . . And as noted, the Commanders do not identify any such precedents, relying only on Annett's general standard. Thus, the Commanders have not demonstrated that their alleged humiliation would clearly constitute an adverse employment action. . . .The assertion of qualified immunity imposes a heavy burden on the plaintiffs, requiring them to point to existing precedent or the clear weight of authority establishing the existence of a constitutional violation. None of the plaintiffs has met that burden. Lt. Peck has not demonstrated that her statement to the media was clearly made as a private citizen rather than as a public employee. Nor has Sgt. Stone or the Commanders shown that the defendants' alleged conduct would clearly constitute adverse employment actions. Accordingly, Sheriff Maketa and Undersheriff Presley were entitled to qualified immunity on all of the claims.")

Pyle v. Woods, 874 F.3d 1257, 1263-64 (10th Cir. 2017) ("The matters before this court involve a situation 'in which it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.'. . Accordingly, under the circumstances, we will . . . address only the second prong of the qualified immunity test. . . .Here, Plaintiffs allege Detective Woods violated their Fourth Amendment rights by searching the Database for their prescription drug information without a warrant. Plaintiffs concede that this court has never directly addressed whether a warrantless search by law enforcement of a patient's prescription records in a state database violates the Fourth Amendment but they are correct that 'a case directly on point' is not required. . . Plaintiffs must only identify existing precedent that 'place[s] the ... constitutional question beyond debate.'. . They assert two legal propositions, taken together, provided a clear answer to the Fourth Amendment question at the time Woods conducted the warrantless search of the Database, namely: (1) individuals have a constitutionally protected privacy right in their prescription drug records and (2) warrantless searches violate the Fourth Amendment absent an exception. This argument is unavailing. . . .Because, as we have held, the right to privacy in prescription drug records is not absolute, Plaintiffs' two-part paradigm does not provide an answer to the constitutional question. Instead, resolution of the issue will involve a determination of the scope of the constitutionally protected privacy right. At the time Detective Woods accessed the Database to search Plaintiffs' records, no court had conducted the necessary analysis and no judicial opinion held that a warrantless search of a prescription drug database by state law enforcement officials is unconstitutional. . .Our precedent makes clear that any right to privacy in prescription drug records is not absolute under the circumstances present here. Neither Plaintiffs' two-part paradigm nor existing precedent places the Fourth Amendment question beyond debate. Accordingly, Plaintiffs cannot show Detective Woods acted contrary to clearly established law and Woods is entitled to qualified immunity on the claim he violated Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment rights by accessing the Database without a warrant.")

Scott v. City of Albuquerque, 711 F. App'x 871, 877 n.6, 879, 882 n.9 (10th Cir. 2017) ("In A.M., where an officer arrested a student under section 30-20-13(D) for 'repeatedly fake-burping, laughing, and (later) leaning into the classroom,' 830 F.3d at 1148, we held in analyzing the clearly-established-law question that there were 'no Supreme Court or published Tenth Circuit decisions' that squarely addressed 30-20-13(D)'s probable-cause requirements in 2011[.] . . The same necessarily must be true for Officer Hensley's violation, which occurred almost two years before the challenged conduct in A.M. . . . In short, Scott has not identified any clearly-established law that would have given Officer Hensley 'fair notice that his conduct would be unlawful in the circumstances he confronted.'. . Accordingly, Scott cannot satisfy the second prong of the qualified-immunity standard; his Fourth Amendment unlawful-arrest claim necessarily fails. . . .And, second, our conclusion that Officer Hensley could not claim a reasonable mistake of law does not mean that he cannot demonstrate that he satisfies the qualified-immunity standard on the clearly-established-law element, and indeed we conclude infra that he has. In this regard, Heien stressed that 'qualified immunity ... depends on an inquiry distinct from whether an officer has committed a constitutional violation' and that 'the [constitutional-violation] inquiry is not as forgiving as the one employed in the distinct context of deciding whether an officer is entitled to qualified immunity for a constitutional or statutory violation.'. . Therefore, under the less stringent qualified-immunity inquiry, we may conclude (as we do) that Officer Hensley is entitled to qualified immunity because his 'conclusions rest[ed] on an objectively reasonable, even if mistaken, belief that probable cause exist [ed].'. . . We are not blind to the obvious facts: At the time of the arrest, Scott was thirteen years old. The psychological effects of an arrest on somebody that young are bound to be more severe than they would be for an adult. . . However, we have held that there is ' "no case law ... applying a different standard when the victim of the alleged excessive force is a minor."' . . And we are bound to apply the law of excessive force as it is—not as we might wish it to be—even when, as here, the results might seem troubling.")

Dahn v. Amedei, 867 F.3d 1178, 1186-91 & n.12 (10th Cir. 2017) ("The question here is whether a foster child in the custody of one state can, after being placed by a private adoption agency with a foster father in a different state, establish a special custodial relationship with that second state when the second state takes on the duties to investigate evidence suggesting abuse. . . . We decide here only whether Dahn can show that his special relationship with Amedei and Cramer was clearly established under existing law. . . . We do not resolve whether Dahn established a special relationship with Amedei and Cramer; we address only whether that relationship was clearly established under existing precedent. Even if Dahn had a special custodial relationship with Amedei and Cramer—employees of Colorado—Schwartz doesn't clearly establish this relationship based on our facts. Here, Dahn was in Oklahoma's custody up until his adoption. The district court extended Schwartz in finding that Dahn sufficiently alleged a special relationship with Amedei and Cramer.[8] [Fn 8 Because we conclude under the facts of this case that clearly established law did not create a special relationship between Dahn and the caseworkers, we need not and do not address the remaining factors of his claim. For this reason, we do not comment on whether Amedei and Cramer violated Dahn's constitutional rights under the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause by failing to exercise their professional judgment.] Whether or not he was correct to do so, the law up to that point did not clearly establish the requisite special relationship. In Schwartz, a young foster child, Chandler, died at the hands of his abusive foster family. . . Chandler's biological parents alleged under § 1983 that employees of the Denver County Department of Human Services (DCDHS) violated, among other laws, Chandler's Fourteenth Amendment substantive-due-process rights. . . The employees claimed that they had no special relationship with Chandler because a different county had placed him in foster care. . . We concluded that the special-relationship doctrine extends beyond the employees in the county that initially placed a child in foster care and reaches county employees actually exercising custody over the child. . . .We also noted that even though the Jefferson County Department of Human Services (JCDHS) initially placed Chandler into foster care, its doing so made him dependent on the state for his basic human needs, not just that one department. . . .Here, Dahn asks us to affirm the district court's extension of Schwartz to his claim and hold that even though Oklahoma placed him in foster care and Adoption Alliance monitored his placement, Colorado exercised custody over him because he lived there and because Colorado employees investigated his school's suspected-abuse reports. . . . [T]he second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis determines the outcome of this case. Schwartz is the closest case to ours, but no court has extended it so far. In certain circumstances, it would be reasonable and even logical to extend the special-relationship doctrine across state lines as well as county lines, as in Schwartz, but our case law doesn't clearly establish this extension. . . . Here, Oklahoma and Colorado are two separate sovereigns. So, Amedei and Cramer argue, it is not enough that Dahn was a ward of a state. To overcome qualified immunity and survive their motion to dismiss, Dahn had to allege sufficient facts to show that he had a special relationship with the state whose employees he alleged knew of the danger to him or failed to exercise professional judgment. We can't deem it clearly established under Schwartz that a state employee's investigating reports of abuse of a child is enough to create a special custodial relationship with that child. . . .Though DeShaney is factually distinct from Dahn's case, it illustrates that the Supreme Court is wary of finding a special relationship whenever a social worker responds to child-abuse reports. So DeShaney supports the conclusion that the law doesn't clearly permit extending the special-relationship doctrine to Dahn's circumstances—at least not yet. In sum, the special-relationship doctrine extends beyond just those actors who placed Dahn in Lovato's custody; it includes all state officials in the state with whom he had a special relationship. But, for now, the law doesn't clearly extend constitutional liability under the special-relationship doctrine to employees of a state that didn't deprive Dahn of his liberty or supply his basic needs, even though they were social workers in the county where he resided. . . We note, however, that Amedei and Cramer owed some duty to Dahn, and this duty might very well expose them to tort liability. . . .Schwartz would not notify Amedei and Cramer that their failure to protect Dahn under the factual circumstances of this case would violate Dahn's Fourteenth Amendment substantive-due-process rights under the special-relationship doctrine. Thus, even accepting all of Dahn's factual allegations as true, Dahn presents no clearly established law creating a special, custodial relationship between him and Colorado or its employees, and therefore the district court should have awarded Amedei and Cramer qualified immunity on Dahn's special-relationship claims against them.[12] [fn12: Because we conclude, based on this case's facts, that Dahn has failed to show clearly established law creating a special relationship between him, Amedei and Cramer, we decline to address whether the special-relationship doctrine could ever cross state borders. We also decline to address the other element of such claims, which is whether Amedei and Cramer acted in an unprofessional and conscience-shocking manner.]")

Estate of Lockett v. Fallin, 841 F.3d 1098, 1107, 1113-15 (10th Cir. 2016) ("When determining whether qualified immunity applies, we may choose 'which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first.'. . Although Lockett's Estate urges us to decide each of the constitutional-violation questions first, we decline to do so. . . .[W]e see no cases announcing clearly established law that the Eighth Amendment commands, in these circumstances, that Appellees hasten Lockett's death more quickly than the 30 minutes it took. Again, as did the district court, we choose to affirm the dismissal of this claim on the clearly-established-law prong. . . .Although we accept that Lockett's execution was 'unnecessarily prolonged and horribly painful,' . . . the problems during Lockett's execution fit under Baze's 'isolated mishap' exception for events that, 'while regrettable, do[ ] not suggest cruelty, or that the procedure at issue gives rise to a substantial risk of serious harm.'. . Thus, Appellees violated no clearly established law despite Lockett suffering pain during his execution. The IV infiltration was an 'isolated mishap,' not something designed to cause additional pain. Because Oklahoma has changed its execution protocol to incorporate several procedures Baze spoke favorably about,. . . we likely will never confront another Oklahoma execution presenting the same circumstances as Lockett's execution. . . .Lockett's Estate claims that 'a reasonable officer would have been on notice that the failure to promulgate basic policies to protect against painful, barbaric, and torturous executions violate[s] the Eighth Amendment.'. . But this provides nothing beyond the 'high level of generality' that the Supreme Court has concluded will not suffice to show clearly established law. . . As in al-Kidd, where the plaintiff tried to rely on the 'broad history and purposes of the Fourth Amendment' as clearly established law, Lockett's Estate's general pronouncement is too broad to show clearly established law.")

Estate of Lockett v. Fallin, 841 F.3d 1098, 1118, 1120-21 (10th Cir. 2016) (Moritz, J., concurring) ("[W]hile I agree with the majority's professed intent to resolve the qualified immunity issues on the clearly-established prong, I do not agree with those portions of the opinion that conflict with that professed intent. . . .Because the Estate cites no authority that would have put defendants on notice that their particular conduct violated the Eighth Amendment's prohibition on torture, the Estate fails to satisfy the clearly-established prong of the qualified-immunity analysis. Accordingly, I would affirm the district court's conclusion that defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the Estate's torture claim on that basis alone, without addressing whether defendants violated Lockett's Eighth Amendment right to be free from torture. I therefore do not join the portion of the majority opinion addressing the Estate's torture claim.")

Estate of Reat v. Rodriguez, 824 F.3d 960, 964-67 (10th Cir. 2016) (amending and superceding opinion on den'l of reh'g en banc) ("Because there are cases where we can more readily decide the law was not clearly established before reaching the more difficult question of whether there has been a constitutional violation, we may exercise discretion in deciding which prong to address first. . . This is such a case. . . .At the most general level, the parties agree that the state-created danger doctrine is clearly established in this circuit. . . .Though the elements of the state-created danger test are clearly established, it also must be clear to which fact scenarios and government actors we apply the test, and what types of conduct are 'conscience shocking' under the sixth factor. . . .Here, Reat's Estate alleges Rodriguez violated the Fourteenth Amendment by knowingly sending the victims, who had called 911 to report an assault, back into the path of their armed attackers. It contends Rodriguez knew the attackers last had been seen speeding northward on Sheridan Boulevard only minutes earlier, yet he instructed Pal to stop on that road. He then told Pal to pull over and activate his hazard lights at a location nineteen blocks north of the place of the assault. Even after Rodriguez knew the attackers had brandished a gun, he did not suggest that Pal relocate to a less conspicuous place, nor did he send police protection. The district court held 'these factual allegations, accepted as true, are sufficiently shocking to the conscience to state a plausible claim for violation of plaintiffs' substantive due process rights under the state-created danger theory.'. . For a number of reasons, we conclude Rodriguez's conduct does not violate the clearly defined contours of the state-created danger doctrine. First, Reat's Estate cannot point to a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case involving misconduct by 911 operators. . . . In all of [the] cases where we found it appropriate to apply the doctrine of state-created danger, the victims were unable to care for themselves or had had limitations imposed on their freedom by state actors. . . .Rodriguez is unlike any of the defendants in our state-created danger cases. Rodriguez was not a police officer, firefighter, or other similar first responder. . . As a 911 operator, he was not present at the scene of the attack, nor could he take physical action in response to the unfolding event. He did not impose any limitation on Reat's freedom to act. Rodriguez merely informed the victims, however incompetently, that to get help from the police, they would have to return to Denver. It cannot be said that any of Rodriguez's actions, as foolish as they were, 'limited in some way the liberty of a citizen to act on his own behalf.' . . Furthermore, Reat is unlike the victims in other state-created danger cases. He was not in the custody of the state in the way that prisoners are, and thus was not deprived in that manner of his freedom to act. Unlike children in school or under the care of social workers, Reat and his companions were not incapable of acting in their own interest at the time of the shooting. Though the state-created danger doctrine itself may be clearly established, it is far from clear that it applies to Rodriguez's conduct in this particular situation. In sum, all cases cited by Reat's Estate 'are simply too factually distinct to speak clearly to the specific circumstances here.' Mullenix, 136 S. Ct. at 312. No reasonable 911 operator could have known that these actions would have resulted in liability under the Fourteenth Amendment."), cert. denied, 137 S. Ct. 1434 (2017).

A.M. v. Holmes, 830 F.3d 1123, 1139-43, 1149 (10th Cir. 2016) ("[I]n the qualified-immunity context, Officer Acosta's commission vel non of a constitutional violation need not be the focus of our inquiry. This is because A.M. 'must demonstrate on the facts alleged both that [Officer Acosta] violated [F.M.'s] constitutional ... rights, and that the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged unlawful activity.'. . We elect to center our analysis on the clearly-established-law question. . . .We conclude that A.M. has not demonstrated that, under extant clearly established law, a reasonable officer in Officer Acosta's position would have had fair warning that he lacked probable cause to arrest F.M. for interfering with the educational process in violation of N.M. Stat. Ann. § 30–20–13(D). Put another way, in our view, such an officer could have reasonably believed—even if mistakenly—that the officer possessed probable cause under section 30–20–13(D) to arrest F.M. . . . .At the outset, we note that there are no Supreme Court or published Tenth Circuit decisions addressing the contours of probable cause to arrest under New Mexico's interference-with-educational-process statute. . . .A.M. insists that Officer Acosta's arrest of F.M.

for his burping and other horseplay in Ms. Mines–Hornbeck's classroom violated clearly established law because F.M.'s conduct patently did not rise to the level of seriousness envisioned by N.M. Stat. Ann. § 30–20–13(D) and 'no case [was] necessary to alert him [i.e., Officer Acosta] to this fact.'. . .As germane here, in assessing whether Officer Acosta had fair notice that his conduct would be unlawful in the circumstances he confronted (i.e., when he was deciding whether to arrest F.M.), we are guided, first, by the text of N.M. Stat. Ann. § 30–20–13(D) and, then, by any relevant state and federal decisions interpreting its import. . . . We believe the text of N.M. Stat. Ann. § 30–20–13(D) manifests the New Mexico legislature's intent to prohibit a wide swath of conduct that interferes with the educational process. . . .The ordinary meaning of these statutory terms would seemingly encompass F.M.'s conduct because F.M.'s burping, laughing, and leaning into the classroom stopped the flow of student educational activities, thereby injecting disorder into the learning environment, which worked at cross-purposes with Ms. Mines–Hornbeck's planned teaching tasks. More to the point, we cannot conclude that the plain terms of subsection (D) would have given a reasonable law-enforcement officer in Officer Acosta's shoes fair warning that if he arrested F.M. for engaging in his classroom misconduct he (i.e., the officer) would be violating F.M.'s Fourth Amendment right to be free from an arrest lacking in probable cause. . . .The body of relevant caselaw is very limited. . . In making its clearly-established-law argument, A.M. principally relies on a decision of the New Mexico Court of Appeals, State v. Silva, 86 N.M. 543, 525 P.2d 903 (N.M. Ct. App. 1974). We conclude, however, that Silva does not get A.M. over her clearly-established-law hurdle. . . . In sum, if a reasonable officer in Officer Acosta's shoes had sought guidance from Silva, we do not believe that it would have given the officer fair warning that, if he elected to arrest F.M., he would be doing so without probable cause in violation of F.M.'s Fourth Amendment rights. Put another way, even if Silva was the controlling touchstone, Officer Acosta's belief that he had probable cause to arrest F.M. under section 30–20–13(D) was objectively reasonable—even if mistaken. Therefore, we conclude that A.M. cannot satisfy her clearly-established-law burden by relying on Silva.

A.M. v. Holmes, 830 F.3d 1123, 1151-56 (10th Cir. 2016) ("Although we agree with the district court's ultimate disposition regarding the excessive-force claim—viz., we conclude that the court properly awarded qualified immunity to Officer Acosta—we expressly ground our decision on the second prong of the qualified-immunity rubric. Specifically, we conclude that the clearly established law in existence in May 2011 would not have apprised a reasonable police officer similarly situated to Officer Acosta that he could be held liable under § 1983 for a Fourth Amendment violation based on handcuffing a minor pursuant to a lawful arrest. . . . Graham, though certainly an excessive-force lodestar, provides no guidance concerning whether an officer, when effecting an arrest supported by probable cause, must refrain from using handcuffs because the arrestee is a minor (lest he open himself up to potential § 1983 liability). . . .In light of these post-Atwater decisions, we confidently conclude here that a reasonable officer in Officer Acosta's position would have understood Atwater's general acceptance of handcuffing incident to a lawful arrest to indicate that, in the ordinary course, handcuffing any arrestee—absent some injury specifically caused by the application of the cuffs—is lawful. . . .Of course, we recognize that neither Atwater nor Fisher involved the distinguishable, critical factor of minor-child status.

However, it appears that no subsequent published Tenth Circuit decision has taken that variable into consideration in the excessive-force calculus. . . .Along these same lines, we have not uncovered any cases extant at the time of F.M.'s arrest that describe the state of the law and the right at issue as A.M. does. In fact, our study of the relevant caselaw cuts against any reasonable conclusion that a minor's purported right to avoid handcuffing during a lawful arrest was clearly established in May 2011. . . . In short, we hold that the then-extant clearly established law would not have apprised a reasonable officer in Officer Acosta's position that F.M.'s minor-child status should have negated his time-honored right to use handcuffs in effecting F.M.'s arrest. For these reasons, we conclude that the district court correctly awarded qualified immunity to Officer Acosta on this Fourth Amendment claim.")

A.M. v. Holmes, 830 F.3d 1123, 1157-61 (10th Cir. 2016) ("A.M. first contends with respect to Ms. Holmes that 'the district court erred in finding that F.M.'s Fourth Amendment rights were not clearly established' under extant caselaw as of November 8, 2011 (the date of the in-school search). . . Although the district court did base this aspect of its ruling on its determination that any constitutional right would not have been clearly established, in the exercise of our discretion, . . . we elect to resolve the issue on the first prong of the qualified-immunity standard. . . We conclude that the court correctly granted qualified immunity to Ms. Holmes on the unreasonable-search claim because, on A.M.'s version of the facts (insofar as they are borne out by the record), the search of F.M. was supported by reasonable suspicion. Thus, we rest our affirmance regarding this claim on our specific conclusion that A.M. has failed to carry her burden of demonstrating that Ms. Holmes committed a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . Though for purposes of qualified immunity we ordinarily do accept the facts that a plaintiff like A.M. alleges, we do so only insofar as those facts have a basis in the record—as relevant here, only insofar as A.M.'s account of the search does not patently conflict with the record's video footage. . . The video demonstrates that F.M. was first asked to remove his shoes and his jeans, leaving him in a short-sleeved shirt, a long-sleeved shirt, two pairs of athletic shorts, and boxer-shorts underwear. He then flipped down the waistband of his outer pair of athletic shorts, but he left undisturbed the waistbands of his other pair of athletic shorts and his boxer shorts. Finally, he removed his outer pair of athletic shorts and his outer (short-sleeved) shirt so that when the search concluded, he was still wearing a long-sleeved shirt, a pair of athletic shorts, and underwear. Soon afterward, he got dressed as he had been prior to the search. Based on this sequence of events, we believe A.M. stretches the term 'strip search' beyond recognition in her attempt to apply it here. . . The video unequivocally shows that F.M. was only prompted to remove outer clothing and that he was wearing additional layers of non-intimate street clothing underneath the removed items. Thus, because the scope of the search at all times remained reasonable, the search satisfied the strictures of the Fourth Amendment.")

A.M. v. Holmes, 830 F.3d 1123, 1169-70 (10th Cir. 2016) (Gorsuch, J., dissenting) ("If a seventh grader starts trading fake burps for laughs in gym class, what's a teacher to do? Order extra laps? Detention? A trip to the principal's office? Maybe. But then again, maybe that's too old school. Maybe today you call a police officer. And maybe today the officer decides that, instead of just escorting the now compliant thirteen year old to the principal's office, an arrest would be a better idea. So out come the handcuffs and off goes the child to juvenile detention. My colleagues suggest the law permits exactly this option and they offer ninety-four pages explaining why they think that's so. Respectfully, I remain unpersuaded. The simple fact is the New Mexico Court of Appeals long ago alerted law enforcement that the statutory language on which the officer relied for the arrest in this case does not criminalize 'noise[s] or diversion[s]' that merely 'disturb the peace or good order' of individual classes. State v. Silva, 86 N.M. 543, 525 P.2d 903, 907 (N.M. Ct. App. 1974). Instead, the court explained, the law requires 'a more substantial, more physical invasion' of the school's operations—proof that the student more 'substantially interfered' with the 'actual functioning' of the school. . . What's more, other state courts have interpreted similar statutes similarly. They've sustained criminal convictions for students who created substantial disorders across an entire school. [citing cases] But they've also refused to hold students criminally liable for classroom antics that 'momentarily divert[ed] attention from the planned classroom activity' and 'require[d] some intervention by a school official.'. . .Respectfully, I would have thought this authority sufficient to alert any reasonable officer in this case that arresting a now compliant class clown for burping was going a step too far. In response, my colleagues suggest that Silva is distinguishable because it interpreted not the state statute addressing misconduct in public schools on which the officer here relied, see N.M. Stat. Ann § 30–20–13(D), but another statute dealing with protests at colleges, see N.M. Stat. Ann. § 40A–20–10(C) (1972). And that much is true enough. But the unobscurable fact remains that the relevant language of the two statutes is identical—requiring the government to prove that the defendant 'commit[ed] any act which would disrupt, impair, interfere with or obstruct the lawful mission, processes, procedures or functions' of a school. Silva expressly held that this language does not criminalize conduct that disturbs 'merely the peace of the school session' but instead requires proof that the defendant more substantially or materially 'interfere[d] with the actual functioning' of the school. . . Neither do my colleagues offer any reason why a reasonable officer could have thought this same language carried an entirely different meaning when applied to public school burps rather than college sit-ins—and the parties supply none. . . My colleagues likewise dismiss the authority from other states interpreting similar statutes similarly. . . But again it's hard to see why. After all, these cases draw the same distinction suggested by Silva—between childish pranks and more seriously disruptive behaviors—and hold that only the latter are prohibited by statutes like the one before us today. . . .Often enough the law can be 'a ass—a idiot,' Charles Dickens, Oliver Twist 520 (Dodd, Mead & Co. 1941) (1838)—and there is little we judges can do about it, for it is (or should be) emphatically our job to apply, not rewrite, the law enacted by the people's representatives. Indeed, a judge who likes every result he reaches is very likely a bad judge, reaching for results he prefers rather than those the law compels. So it is I admire my colleagues today, for no doubt they reach a result they dislike but believe the law demands—and in that I see the best of our profession and much to admire. It's only that, in this particular case, I don't believe the law happens to be quite as much of a ass as they do. I respectfully dissent.")

Cox v. Glanz, 800 F.3d 1231, 1247 (10th Cir. 2015) ("Like Sheriff Glanz does in his arguments before us, we elect to focus on the second prong—wherein we inquire whether, under Ms. Cox's version of the facts, then-extant clearly established law would have given Sheriff Glanz fair warning that he could be held liable for his conduct under a supervisory-liability theory for violating Mr. Jernegan's Eighth Amendment rights. . . We conclude that the right that Ms. Cox's claim implicates—i.e., generally, an inmate's right to proper prison suicide screening procedures during booking—was not clearly established in July 2009. . . . Significantly, Ms. Cox has not directed our attention to any Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision (published or otherwise) that would indicate that this right was clearly established in 2009. . . and the district court likewise did not rely on any such law. Nor, for that matter, has Ms. Cox attempted to shoulder her burden by showing that 'the clearly established weight of authority from other courts ... ha[s] found the law to be as [she] maintains.'. . On this basis alone, we could hold that Ms. Cox has not properly laid the groundwork to defeat Sheriff Glanz's assertion of qualified immunity. In the interest of thoroughness, however, we have surveyed the then-extant caselaw that would have guided the Sheriff's endeavors to conform his supervisory conduct to constitutional norms. The results of our survey are detailed infra. Viewing the clearly-established-law question in this survey's light, we confidently conclude that the extant clearly established law in July 2009 would not have put a reasonable official in Sheriff Glanz's position on notice that his supervisory conduct would effect an Eighth Amendment violation.")

Moral v. Hagen, 553 F. App'x 839, No. 13–3129, 2014 WL 341440, *1, *2 (10th Cir. Jan. 31, 2014) ("Only recently the Supreme Court explained that it remains unsettled under current law whether an officer violates the Fourth Amendment by initiating an arrest for retaliatory reasons when the arrest itself happens to be supported, as an objective matter, by probable cause. See Reichle v. Howards, 132 S.Ct. 2088 (2012). Because this scenario (retaliatory animus but objective probable cause) does not offend clearly established law, the Supreme Court granted qualified immunity to the officers in Reichle. Id. We see no lawful way the district court could have reached a different result in this case. . . .Ms. Moral complains that the district court did not resolve the first question in the qualified immunity sequence (whether an arrest objectively supported by probable cause but allegedly made with a retaliatory motive violates the Constitution) before proceeding to the second question in that sequence (whether any such violation was clearly established at the time of Agent Hagen's actions) and resolving it against her. But district courts are generally free to proceed directly to the second step of the qualified immunity analysis where, as here, it is sufficient to dispose of the case.")

Becker v. Bateman, 709 F.3d 1019, 1022-25 (10th Cir. 2013) ("In reviewing the grant of summary judgment to Officer Bateman, we decline to consider whether the district court erred in concluding no constitutional violation occurred and instead opt to address whether the rights at issue were clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . .In Novitsky v. City of Aurora, 491 F.3d 1244, 1255–56 (10th Cir.2007), this court considered whether an officer's application of a 'twist lock' maneuver to a potentially intoxicated individual found in the backseat of a vehicle constituted a violation of clearly established law. The court concluded a reasonable jury could have concluded the officer's use of the twist lock was unreasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . The court nonetheless concluded the officer was entitled to qualified immunity, however, because 'the risks presented by potentially intoxicated individuals are inherently fact-dependent and the extent to which an officer may use force in such situations has not been definitively answered by this circuit.'. . The court reached this conclusion notwithstanding authority in other circuits discussing at greater length 'the extent to which law enforcement officers may use forceful techniques to protect themselves from the risks presented by potentially intoxicated individuals.'. . Novitsky thus indicates there was no clearly established law as of 2007 regarding the appropriate level of force which may be used to arrest a potentially intoxicated person during a stop. Accordingly, because the conduct in Becker's complaint took place in 2005, Becker cannot carry his burden under the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. . . . The only case published before the incident here involving analogous facts is Santos v. Gates, 287 F.3d 846, 853–54 (9th Cir.2002). In Santos, the Ninth Circuit concluded there existed a disputed issue of material fact whether the police used excessive force in taking an intoxicated plaintiff to the ground and thereby breaking his back. . . This single published decision from another circuit, however, falls short of demonstrating 'the clearly established weight of authority from other courts [has] found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.'. . Moreover, the summary judgment record does not establish Officer Bateman's conduct was so obviously egregious as to diminish the specificity needed from prior case law to clearly establish the violation. . . Because Becker has thus failed to carry his burden to show the law was clearly established at the time of the incident, the district court properly concluded Officer Bateman was entitled to qualified immunity for Becker's excessive force claim.")

Becker v. Bateman, 709 F.3d 1019, 1025-27 (10th Cir. 2013) ("The district court disposed of Becker's claim against both Officer Bateman and the City based on its conclusion that Officer Bateman did not violate Becker's constitutional rights. While it was unnecessary to review that conclusion in reviewing the district court's grant of summary judgment to Officer Bateman, it is necessary to review that conclusion with respect to the City. . . Citing Mecham v. Frazier, 500 F.3d 1200, 1203 (10th Cir.2007), the district court concluded there were no disputed issues of material fact because the events giving rise to his claim were recorded on Officer Bateman's dash cam. It therefore undertook to consider whether Officer Bateman's actions were objectively reasonable, considering the severity of the underlying offense, whether Becker posed an immediate threat to the safety of Officer Bateman or others, and whether Becker was actively resisting arrest. . . The district court resolved the first two of these factors in Becker's favor, noting that "'t]he underlying offense—a cracked windshield—was not severe' and 'nothing in the video suggests that [Becker] was going to act violently or intended to flee.'. . The court also concluded, however, that the video made clear Becker was resisting arrest, and Becker's size, obstinance, and intoxication all created a situation 'permeated with unknowns.'. . It therefore concluded Officer Bateman's actions were objectively reasonable and did not violate Becker's constitutional rights. . . .Here, however, notwithstanding the dash cam video, the relevant facts are controverted, and the evidence construed in the light most favorable to Becker would establish a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights. That is, reasonable jurors could conclude Becker was not resisting arrest at the time he was taken to the ground by Officer Bateman. . . To be sure, reasonable jurors could agree with the district court's assessment of the video. That is, reasonable jurors could agree that Becker's language and actions after Officer Bateman told him he was under arrest. . . 'indicate a clear resistence of arrest' which made the amount of force used objectively reasonable. . . . Because there exist disputed issues of material fact which, when construed in the light most favorable to Becker, establish Officer Bateman used excessive force, the district court erred in concluding as a matter of law Officer Bateman's actions did not violate Becker's Fourth Amendment rights.")

Allstate Sweeping, LLC v. Black, 706 F.3d 1261, 1268(10th Cir. 2013) ("As stated previously, we will assume, without deciding, that hostile-work-environment claims are proper under both § 1981 and the Equal Protection Clause. But Allstate cites to no cases, nor can we find any, holding that the harassment endured by the principals of an artificial entity can give rise to a racial- or gender-discrimination claim on behalf of the entity itself, absent independent injury to the entity. Indeed, it is not clear to us that an artificial entity could ever prevail on a hostile-work-environment claim. Such a claim has a subjective, as well as an objective, component; there must be proof that 'the plaintiff was offended by the work environment.'. . Being offended presupposes feelings or thoughts that an artificial entity (as opposed to its employees or owners) cannot experience. Perhaps Allstate had a right not to be injured because of hostility directed at its owners or employees—for example, by losing money because its employees had lower morale or quit. . . But Allstate has made no such claim. Black was therefore entitled to summary judgment on Allstate's hostile-work-environment claim.")

Lynch v. Barrett, 703 F.3d 1153, 1159-63 (10th Cir. 2013) ("The problem with Defendant Officers argument is that at this stage of the litigation we have no jurisdiction to resolve 'fact-related disputes about the pretrial record, namely, whether ... the evidence in the pretrial record was sufficient to show a genuine issue of fact for trial.'. . Yet this is precisely what Defendant Officers propose we resolve. . . . We choose to belabor this matter no further. Instead we now simply assume (1) a police cover-up designed to hinder pursuit of a legal claim may violate an individual's constitutional right to court access and (2) the facts set forth in the district court's order are sufficient to warrant a finding that Defendant Officers violated Plaintiff's right in this case. This allows us to broach the more manageable question of whether Plaintiff's right to court access was clearly established in the specific context of this case. . . .To overcome Defendant Officers' claim of qualified immunity, Plaintiff must show the scope of his right to court access was sufficiently clear such that a reasonable officer would have understood Defendant Officers' refusal to name those responsible for exercising excessive force against him was not merely ill-advised, but violated that right. . . . [S]imply to say the Constitution recognizes a right to court access casts too high a level of generality over our inquiry. To show his alleged right to court access was clearly established in the proper sense, Plaintiff should identify 'cases of controlling authority ... at the time of the incident ... [or] a consensus of cases of persuasive authority' clearly establishing the scope of the right encompasses the facts presented, 'such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were [consistent with that right].'. . In 2002, the Supreme Court in Harbury 'was careful not to endorse the validity of ... backwards looking [right to access] claims.'. . Henceforth, the Supreme Court has never defined the right of court access to include a backwards looking claim based on a 'conspiracy of silence' aimed at interfering with an individual's ability to procure evidence of official misconduct. Nor have we ever endorsed such constitutional claim. . . . At least in the Tenth Circuit, the question of whether an evidentiary cover-up by police officials may violate an individual's constitutional right to court access was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. A reasonable officer might not have understood what Defendant Officers did (or refused to do) violated that right. . . . In other words, whether the scope of the right to access extended as far as Plaintiff claims was 'far from obvious.'. . What is obvious is that such right as defined by Plaintiff was not clearly established.")

Estate of Bleck ex rel. Churchill v. City of Alamosa, Colo., 540 F. App'x 866 (10th Cir. 2013) ("We ultimately conclude that, even assuming that Officer Martinez's conduct amounted to a seizure of Mr. Bleck under the Fourth Amendment (based on the current state of the law), that legal outcome would not have been forecasted by clearly established law at the time. Consequently, Officer Martinez is entitled to qualified immunity. And, on this basis, we uphold the district court's judgment as to him. . . . Brower, and in particular, its gun hypothetical, could not have provided adequate notice to Officer Martinez of the assumed unlawfulness of his conduct. . . . Furthermore, Mr. Bleck has cited no cases—nor have we been able to locate any—where a court, in ruling on a fact pattern like the one at issue here, has found a Fourth Amendment violation. In sum, viewed objectively, we do not believe that it would have been clear and beyond debate to Officer Martinez that, when he elected to keep his gun in his hand as a show of authority, he could be found to have intentionally effected a Fourth Amendment seizure of Mr. Bleck when the gun accidentally discharged. Accordingly, we conclude that Officer Martinez cannot be found to have violated clearly established law and is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Elwell v. Byers, 699 F.3d 1208, 1213, 1217-19 (10th Cir. 2012) ("The concurrence would not have us address the constitutional question. We conclude that the question is appropriately considered for two reasons. First, the district court's legal ruling was that a protected liberty interest exists, and that is the issue before us on appeal. We can affirm a lower court's ruling on any grounds adequately supported by the record, even grounds not relied upon by the district court. . . The statutory basis of the district court's conclusion does not foreclose our review of the constitutional question. Second, . . . both the Supreme Court in Smith v. Organization of Foster Families for Equality & Reform, 431 U.S. 816 (1977) (hereinafter 'OFFER'), and we in Spielman v. Hildebrand, 873 F.2d 1377 (10th Cir.1989), dodged the constitutional issue presented in this case. As the Court recently reaffirmed, addressing the constitutional issue is often 'advantageous' under such circumstances. . . . By passing over the constitutional issue on multiple occasions, courts have failed to clarify the law with the result that these tragedies continue to occur without legal recourse to the victims. Accordingly, we proceed to the constitutional question. . . .We recognize that the typical foster care arrangement generally does not create a liberty interest in familial association. . . But the Elwells, who had cared for T.S. nearly his entire life and were on the verge of adopting him, fall closer to the status of adoptive parents than in the ordinary, temporary foster arrangement. Thus, we do not need to define precisely where the liberty interest threshold falls on this spectrum, but conclude that the Elwells fall on the protected side of that line under the facts of this case. . . . The Elwells claim entitlement to the bare minimum of process—notice. We have no difficulty concluding that the Elwells' interest entitled them to this 'elementary and fundamental requirement.'. . Accordingly, we affirm the district court's conclusion that the Elwells' constitutional rights were violated when T.S. was removed from their home without any advanced notice. . . . Spielman is the only Tenth Circuit decision on point, and given its assumed-but-not-decided conclusion as to whether preadoptive parents possess a liberty interest, . . . it surely cannot have rendered a violation clearly established. The effect of that decision was just the opposite: Spielman left the law unclear. The Elwells claim that a single case decided by the Eastern District of Pennsylvania clearly established that certain foster parents possess a liberty interest in maintaining their family structure. . . Although the precise quantum of case law sufficient to clearly establish a violation is a matter of some dispute, we think it quite evident that a single case from an out-of-circuit district court cannot clearly establish the law in the Tenth Circuit. Moreover, McLaughlin's holding was grounded in state law, making it inapplicable in light of our conclusion that Kansas law did not give rise to the Elwells' protected interest. The district court concluded that the Kansas statute itself clearly established the constitutional violation. But as explained in § II.B.1, supra, we conclude that the statute did not create a constitutionally cognizable liberty interest, let alone clearly establish one. Although Kan. Stat. Ann. § 38–2258 (2007) might have apprised the defendants that their conduct was contrary to state law, it could not have established that removal of T.S. without notice was unconstitutional for qualified immunity purposes. . . A violation of state law does not necessarily violate the constitution. And on the constitutional question, no court had answered whether preadoptive parents in the Elwells' position possessed a liberty interest in familial association. The Elwells suffered a devastating violation of their Fourteenth Amendment rights, and we are not insensitive to their plight. But given the state of the case law, we must reverse the district court's qualified immunity determination.") Toevs v. Reid, 685 F.3d 903, 910, 914-16 (10th Cir. 2012) ("This is one of those cases in which it is appropriate for the court to exercise its discretion to avoid avoidance. As shown by Mr. Toevs's seven-year placement in the QLLP [Quality of Life Level Program], prison officials' actions here are of a longstanding nature. . . .We are neither mandating the implementation of a stratified behavior- modification program nor imposing any particular structure on any such program. We simply hold that, if a prison system wishes to encourage better behavior by implementing a stratified incentive program that involves an atypical and significant hardship, it must provide meaningful individualized reviews to prisoners to help them progress through the program. . . . In these circumstances (and given that the defendants have waived any argument about the existence of a liberty interest), we have no hesitation in concluding that the failure to give Mr. Toevs any reviews at Levels 4, 5, and 6 violated his right to due process. . . . Even though Mr. Toevs did not receive meaningful periodic reviews, we conclude that defendants are entitled to judgment based on qualified immunity because it was not clearly established in 2005 through 2009 that the review process was inadequate. . . .Since Hewitt, it has been clearly established that prisoners cannot be placed indefinitely in administrative segregation without receiving meaningful periodic reviews. . . This court, however, has not previously interpreted 'meaningful' to require officials to inform prisoners placed in a stratified behavior-modification program of the reasons for their continued placement, so as to provide a guide for future behavior. Moreover, this court has never considered the due-process implications of the QLLP. Accordingly, we cannot conclude that the state of the law from 2005 to 2009 gave defendants fair warning that the QLLP review process was not meaningful, or that the lack of reviews at QLLP Levels 4 through 6 was a due-process violation. Because the law was not clearly established, defendants are entitled to judgment based on qualified immunity.")

Kerns v. Bader, 663 F.3d 1173,1180-82 (10th Cir. 2011) ("[T]he Supreme Court has recently instructed that courts should proceed directly to, 'should address only,' and should deny relief exclusively based on the second element, Camreta v. Greene, 131 S.Ct. 2020, 2032 (2011), in seven particular circumstances outlined in [Pearson]. . . . With respect to the last consideration, constitutional avoidance, the Supreme Court has told us that courts may 'avoid avoidance'–and so answer the first qualified immunity question before proceeding to the second–in cases involving a recurring fact pattern where guidance on the constitutionality of the challenged conduct is required and the conduct is only likely to be challenged within the qualified immunity regime. . . But the Court has also told us that this should be the exception, not the rule–that as a general matter, constitutional avoidance considerations trump and 'courts should think hard, and then think hard again, before turning small cases into large ones.'. . .[T]he district court's opinion addressed only the first part of the two part test for qualified immunity. What to do when the district court fails to address the second, clearly established law, element? If it were clear that no constitutional violation took place, as the defendants urge, we might simply reverse the district court and grant qualified immunity. But the answer to that question isn't so clear in this case. Faced with that problem we usually do well–as Pearson and Camreta remind us–to proceed directly to the clearly established law question when we're sure it yields immunity anyway. But there again the answer isn't so obvious in this case. So it is that we are left in a situation without obvious answers to either qualified immunity question and risk confronting difficult constitutional questions without the benefit of a full analysis from the district court. In these circumstances, there remains, however, another course available to us–remanding the matter back to the district court to finish the work of answering the second qualified immunity question. . . That course bears the advantage of allowing the adversarial process to work through the problem and culminate in a considered district court decision, a decision that will minimize the risk of an improvident governing appellate decision from this court. And that course is especially prudent where, as here, the issue is close and the briefing on appeal less than entirely satisfactory. Indeed, many of the same considerations that Pearson and Camreta identify as counseling in favor of proceeding directly to the second qualified immunity element–the possibility of avoiding a needless constitutional question, the quality of briefing, and the desire to avoid the risk of a poor decision–also counsel in favor of remanding to ensure the district court addresses the second element before we begin to tangle with a case on appeal. And it is for these very reasons that we reserve decision on both aspects of the qualified immunity question in this case until after the district court, on remand, has finished its work on the clearly established law prong.")

Kerns v. Bader, 663 F.3d 1173, 1183-87 (10th Cir. 2011) ("Mr. Kerns submitted only that, whoever owned the records and whatever other laws may say about how and when they might be shared with law enforcement, he had a constitutionally protected expectation that the hospital would keep its records shielded from the Sheriff absent a warrant. The district court analyzed both aspects of the qualified immunity test before agreeing. On appeal, the Sheriff disputes whether he violated Mr. Kerns's constitutional rights by asking a hospital to share its records voluntarily–and, if he did, whether those rights were clearly established at the time. Because we agree with Sheriff White on the latter (clearly established law) question, we reverse without addressing the former (constitutional violation) question. And we pursue this course because doing so allows us to avoid rendering a decision on important and contentious questions of constitutional law with the attendant needless (entirely avoidable) risk of reaching an improvident decision on these vital questions. . . . Given this court's express recognition of the uncertain state of the law in 2005 regarding the very circumstances we now face, we are hardly in a position to say that the proper resolution of the issue was simultaneously beyond doubt. . . .To be sure, Mr. Kerns cites two cases in which this court held that government officials violated plaintiffs' substantive due process privacy rights by accessing their records without public disclosure. But both of those cases involved another element not present here: the government officials involved accessed the plaintiffs' confidential information as part of an unlawful campaign of sexual harassment. . . . Of course, a case on point isn't required if the impropriety of the defendant's challenged conduct is clear from existing case law. If we could be sure that the distinction between public disclosure or government access without a valid purpose, on the one hand, and more limited government access for otherwise legitimate purposes, on the other, is a trivial one we would rule in Mr. Kerns's favor. . . The difficulty is that the Supreme Court in Whalen and NASA and the logic of our own cases preclude such a conclusion and acknowledge instead that such a distinction might make a constitutional difference. . . . The dissent eloquently argues that if the scope of Mr. Kerns's Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments rights in third party held medical records isn't clear enough then we should use this case to address the matter definitively. But to voice this argument is to confirm that the issue we confront today hasn't yet been clearly resolved–and why qualified immunity is unavoidable. The Supreme Court has warned us that small qualified immunity appeals are rarely the right place to decide large new issues of constitutional law. We always do well to abide its warnings. And perhaps especially so here, where the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment questions surrounding medical records are complex, the third party overlay adds another dimension to the problem, the parties' briefing unhelpfully skates past many of the important issues, and the lack of clearly established law is readily apparent from our case law and that of the Supreme Court. So it is we leave the bigger questions for another day and today rest our decision on a much humbler premise, reversing the district court's entry of summary judgment against Sheriff White and ordering the entry of summary judgment in his favor only because Mr. Kerns has failed to identify clearly established law rendering beyond debate that the Sheriff's conduct was unlawful as of 2005.")

Kerns v. Bader, 663 F.3d 1173, 1198 (10th Cir. 2011) (Holloway, J., dissenting) ("Sheriff White's asking the VA for Mr. Kerns's private medical records in the circumstances existing here is so far out of the realm of constitutional behavior that we should not hesitate to hold that it was unlawful, even if we did not have precedents closely on point that mandate that result. But the precedents that do exist are easily close enough on point that any reasonable law enforcement officer would have known that constitutionally protected medical records cannot be obtained simply because a possibility exists that the information would be helpful. Constitutional protection means that such records cannot be routinely obtained without a warrant, without consent, without probable cause, and without exigent circumstances.")

[See also Kerns v. Board of Com'rs of Bernalillo County, 888 F.Supp.2d 1176, 1222 n.35 (D.N.M. 2012) (Browning, J.) ("While the Court is, of course, obligated to follow faithfully the Supreme Court's decisions and opinions, the Court has always been unenlightened and even troubled by Justice Elena Kagan's comments in Camreta v. Greene about 'large' and 'small' cases. . . . As a trial judge, the Court has tried assiduously to avoid thinking about or categorizing some cases as 'large' and some as 'small.' It usually is not mentally healthy for a judge to put all his or her energy into 'large' cases and slight 'small cases'; to the litigants, their case is the most important case on the Court's docket, and it is usually wise for the judge to treat each case on which he or she is working—at that moment—as the most important case at that moment. Getting the decision 'right,' i.e. getting the law and facts correct and accurate, is obviously important, but getting it right is only one-half of a judge's task, particularly a trial judge's job. The other half of dispensing justice is the appearance of justice—did the Court listen to the litigant's arguments, wrestle with those arguments, and deal with them in an intellectually honest way. Americans are pretty good about accepting a judicial decision—even an adverse one—and cease obsessing over an issue, if they are convinced that an authority figure has dressed up, taken them seriously, listened patiently and politely, wrestled with the arguments, addressed them, and accurately stated the facts. The Court believes that, if it starts looking at some cases before it as 'large' and some as 'small,' it begins a slippery slope that does not accomplish both halves of the task of dispensing justice. The justice system depends so much on the nation respecting and accepting the courts' proceedings and decisions, because courts have very little 'power' that does not depend on that acceptance. Thus, Justice Kagan's comments are not only not self-defining, but they are disturbing. If, perhaps, a 'large' case is a Supreme Court case or one that comes from the East Coast or California, rather than one in a district court in New Mexico, then it helps to look at what cases the Supreme Court has decided for the plaintiff. The three most recent qualified immunity cases, the Supreme Court dealt with are: (i) Reichle v. Howards, —— U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012); (ii) Filarsky v. Delia, ——U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. 1657, 182 L.Ed.2d 662 (2012); and (iii) Messerschmidt v. Millender, —— U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. 1235, 182 L.Ed.2d 47 (2012). In Reichle v. Howards, the Supreme Court determined that secret service agents were entitled to qualified immunity for arresting a protestor who touched the Vice President and held that it was not clearly established that an arrest supported by probable cause could give rise to a First Amendment violation. . . In Filarsky v. Delia, the Supreme Court held that a private individual that the government hires to do its work, an internal affairs review, is entitled to seek qualified immunity for Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment violations. . . In Messerschmidt v. Millender, the Supreme Court held that police officers in Los Angeles, California were entitled to qualified immunity when they relied on an invalid warrant to search a home, because a reasonable officer would not have realized the error. . . The Supreme Court has not denied qualified immunity since 2004 in Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. 551, 124 S.Ct. 1284, 157 L.Ed.2d 1068 (2004), where it held that an officer unreasonably relied on a deficient warrant. . . The Court does not think those presumably 'large' cases (they are Supreme Court cases, after all) are any different—substantively, legally, or factually—than this case involving the search of a citizen's home after someone shot down a police helicopter and then detained that suspect for nine months until the United States realized that J. Kerns could not have shot down the helicopter. On the flip side, treating large cases like they are large cases can create an appearance problem to the public and to the litigants—that only big cases deserve the Court's attention. A trial judge can overwork a 'large' case. It is better to treat even 'large' cases like every other case; large cases and their litigants need to know and appreciate that they are not the only case on the court's docket, and realize that the scarcity of judicial resources applies to them too.")]

Whitington v. Lawson, No. 10-1299, 2011 WL 2144549, at *3, *4 (10th Cir. June 1, 2011) (not published) ("Penrod involved a prisoner's allegation that he was denied hygiene items by an intentional and retaliatory decision by prison officials to punish him for filing grievances and for seeking relief in court. Whitington's claim, by contrast, is not presented as a retaliation claim. Penrod did not establish a general rule that a prison could never, even without a retaliatory motive, apply existing policies that had the incidental effect of compelling an inmate to choose between hygiene items and payment of litigation costs. As we have now recognized, see Whitington, 307 F. App'x at 189, such policies may indeed violate the constitutional rights of inmates, but our case law did not clearly establish that rule during the time period relevant to Whitington's complaint. In sum, we conclude that at the pertinent time the law was not clearly established that prison officials violated the Eighth Amendment by requiring an inmate to use funds in his prison account to purchase hygiene products, even if he did not have sufficient funds to purchase these products because of the payment of expenses for constitutionally protected litigation. Hence, the district court properly granted qualified immunity on Whitington's claims against the defendants in their individual capacities.").

Leverington v. City of Colorado Springs, 643 F.3d 719, 732, 733 (10th Cir. 2011) ("The Supreme Court in Pearson made clear that courts have discretion to decide 'which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.'. . .In this case, it was not clearly established that Ms. Leverington's statement to Peters did not constitute a 'true threat' unprotected by the First Amendment. . . . Here, even drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Ms. Leverington, it is debatable whether a reasonable officer in Peters's position would have considered her statement to be a threat. Accordingly, Ms. Leverington's free-speech rights in this context were not clearly established, and Peters is entitled to qualified immunity on this basis. In addition, it was not clearly established that Ms. Leverington's statement was 'protected' for another reason–as discussed above, it was not on a matter of public concern. . . . [W]e need not–and do not–decide here whether the public-concern test applies in the context of a Worrell inquiry. It is sufficient that the law was not clearly established on this point, and thus that Peters is entitled to qualified immunity on this basis as well.")

PJ ex rel. Jensen v. Wagner, 603 F.3d 1182, 1197, 1198 (10th Cir. 2010) ("The district court concluded that the Jensens failed to show that any defendant violated their right to direct P.J.'s medical care. Because the district court decided this issue under the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis, it did not have occasion to consider whether the Jensens' right to direct P.J.'s medical care in the circumstances presented in this case was clearly established at the time of the alleged violations. Furthermore, on appeal, the Jensens confine their argument to the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis and assume that under the circumstances of this case their right to direct P.J.'s medical care is clearly established. We reject this assumption and conclude that the Jensens' right to direct P.J.'s medical care in this case–if any right indeed exists in such circumstances–was not clearly established at the time the Jensens allege the right was violated. [Discussing case law] Here, the state was endowed with. . . broad authority, and the Jensens do not direct us to a clearly established constitutional line that defines what a state can and cannot do to protect a child whose life is compromised by his parents' refusal to obtain medical care. . . Accordingly, under the circumstances of this case, the Jensens' asserted right to direct P.J.'s medical care was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violations; therefore, they cannot overcome the defendants' claims of qualified immunity. . . . In contrast to the Jensens' purported right to direct P.J.'s medical care in this case, we resolve their claims regarding their substantive due process right to familial association and their procedural due process rights on the first prong of the qualified immunity inquiry–namely, that the Jensens have not shown a violation of their constitutional rights.")

Chavez-Rodriguez v. City of Santa Fe, 596 F.3d 708, 713 (10th Cir. 2010) ("When a defendant asserts qualified immunity in a motion for summary judgment, the burden shifts to the plaintiff who must satisfy a heavy two-part burden. . . The plaintiff must show the defendant's conduct violated a constitutional right, and the right was clearly established at the time of the defendant's conduct. Pearson v. Callahan, 129 S.Ct. 808, 815-16 (2009). Though it is often helpful, the court need not resolve the inquiry in this particular order. Id. at 818. Here, the court opts to proceed with the constitutional inquiry first." (goes on to hold public employee's speech was pursuant to official duties and not protected by First Amendment)).

Weise v. Casper, 593 F.3d 1163, 1167, 1170 (10th Cir. 2010), cert. denied, 131 S. Ct. 7 (2010) ("In their discretion, courts are free to decide which prong to address first 'in light of the circumstances of the particular case at hand.'. .The Pearson Court recognized that skipping the constitutional violation question may conserve judicial resources in 'cases in which it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.'. .Some cases are so fact-bound that deciding the constitutional question offers 'little guidance for further cases.'. .Further, proceeding directly to the 'clearly established' question may avoid the risk of deciding a case incorrectly given insufficient briefing on the constitutional violation question. . . Although it is unclear whether Defendants' alleged conduct violated Plaintiffs' constitutional rights, it is obvious that the rights were not clearly established at the time of the violation. . . . In sum, no specific authority instructs this court (let alone a reasonable public official) how to treat the ejection of a silent attendee from an official speech based on the attendee's protected expression outside the speech area. To be sure, in some obvious situations, general authority may put a reasonable public official on notice that his or her conduct is violative of constitutional rights. This is not one of them. Because it is plain that the constitutional right claimed was not clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. Therefore, we need not reach the question of whether Defendants violated Plaintiffs' constitutional rights.")

Weise v. Casper, 593 F.3d 1163, 1172-74 (10th Cir. 2010), cert. denied, 131 S. Ct. 7 (2010) (Holloway, J., dissenting) ("I am persuaded that this is a case in which the issue of whether a right has been violated should be addressed at the outset. In recent years there have been several cases across the nation in which citizens have sought redress for alleged infringement of their fundamental liberties under somewhat similar circumstances. . .Because the right of free speech on matters of public concern is so vital to our democracy, these are important cases, and the judiciary has a valid and vital role in our society's response. The importance of the issues raised in this appeal should weigh heavily in favor of our consideration of them on the merits. . . . The issue thus framed is stark: Defendants excluded Plaintiffs from the President's public speech–after they had obtained tickets, cleared security screening and been seated in the audience–due to the protected expression by one of them outside the event. . . The question, then, is whether the Constitution permitted Defendants to take this action against Plaintiffs for this reason. The answer, informed by decades of free speech jurisprudence–must be a resounding 'no.'").

Nielander v. The Board of County Com'rs, 582 F.3d 1155, 1166, 1169 (10th Cir. 2009) ("We are permitted to address whether the law is clearly established before addressing whether a constitutional violation has occurred. Pearson, __ U.S. at __, 129 S.Ct. at 818. . . . To make clear, we are not holding that qualified immunity is appropriate whenever there is an underlying question of historical fact (in this case, what Mr. Nielander actually said). Rather, we are holding that where a question of ultimate fact (in this case, whether a reasonable officer would be unreasonable in concluding that statement two was a true threat under clearly established federal law) cannot be resolved as a matter of law, the law is not clearly established and qualified immunity is appropriate. . . . Thus, Deputy Perez is entitled to qualified immunity on Mr. Nielander's First Amendment retaliation claim.").

Swanson v. Town of Mountain View, Colo., 577 F.3d 1196, 1199, 1200, 1203, 1204 (10th Cir. 2009) ("Because we conclude the conduct here did not violate clearly established constitutional rights, we take the advice of Pearson and address that issue first. . . . Before turning to the relevant precedent, we want to emphasize that the alleged conduct is, to say the least, troubling. The plaintiffs assert the Mountain View police department established a policy of allowing its officers to perform routine traffic stops outside its town boundaries, and then prosecuted the violations as if they had occurred within the town itself. Whether as a matter of administrative convenience or revenue generation, enforcing traffic laws outside city limits where not specifically authorized by state law raises serious legal concerns. . .Nevertheless, for us to rule in this appeal on the precise contours of the constitutional question raised by the town's policy is unnecessary because Tenth Circuit law did not clearly establish a Fourth Amendment violation at the time of the conduct. . . . [E]ven assuming a constitutional violation, a reasonable police officer would not have known in 2006 that the extra-jurisdictional, but within the same state, traffic stops constituted a violation of clearly established Fourth Amendment law, when no dispute exists that the officer observed traffic violations before effectuating the stops.").

Cordova v. Aragon, 569 F.3d 1183, 1188-95 (10th Cir. 2009) ("[W]e accept the district court's findings that a reasonable juror could find that Officer Aragon was not in immediate danger at the time of the shooting, and we ask only whether the potential risk to third parties created by Mr. Cordova's driving was alone sufficient to justify Officer Aragon's shooting him. . . . Scott strongly suggests that the reasonableness balancing must take into account that there is a spectrum of 'deadly force,' and that just because a situation justifies ramming does not mean it will justify shooting a suspect in the head. . . . We are therefore forced to consider whether the substantial but not imminent risk imposed on innocent bystanders and police by a motorist's reckless driving justifies a reasonable officer to use a level of force that is nearly certain to cause the motorist's death. This is not an easy question, or one that any court could feel confident in answering. . . . We do not believe it would be reasonable for an officer to shoot any motorist who ran a red light or swerved through lanes, simply because reckless driving poses some threat of physical harm to a bystander who might be down the road. Car chases inherently risk injury to persons who might happen along their course, and if that risk alone could justify shooting the suspect, every chase would end much more quickly with a swiftly-fired bullet. . . . When an officer employs such a level of force that death is nearly certain, he must do so based on more than the general dangers posed by reckless driving. . . . To the extent that the district court held that the hypothetical risk Mr. Cordova posed to fellow motorists who might happen along was itself enough to render the shooting reasonable, it was in error. The threat must have been more than a mere possibility. . . . The law in our circuit and elsewhere has been vague on whether the potential risk to unknown third parties is sufficient to justify the use of force nearly certain to cause death. Given that our precedent does authorize the use of deadly force when a fleeing suspect poses a threat of serious harm to others, Officer Aragon was not unreasonable in believing that a potential threat to third parties would justify such a level of force. . . . Because the law was not clear on how high the risk of harm to third parties must be before an officer can use a level of force nearly certain to cause death, however, we AFFIRM on qualified immunity grounds the district court's grant of summary judgment as it applies to Officer Aragon.")

Cordova v. Aragon, 569 F.3d 1183, 1204, 1205 (10th Cir. 2009) (O'Brien, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The majority should have followed the lead of the Supreme Court and stopped with a holding of no violation of clearly established law. We are now unnecessarily committed to a contrary, and in my view, erroneous path. . . . Like the future danger recognized in Scott, Cordova's significant risk of future reckless behavior and dangerousness justified immediate action. Regardless of the justification provided by the imminent threat to Officer Aragon, the threat Cordova posed to the general public also provided an independent justification for the use of deadly force.").

Callahan v. Millard County, 557 F.3d 1140, 1141 (10th Cir. 2009) ("The Supreme Court has now reversed our judgment, holding that courts no longer must decide qualified immunity based upon the sequence required by Saucier v. Katz . . . . The Supreme Court also held that the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established at the time of the incident in question. . . Clearly established law did not show that the Defendants' conduct violated the Fourth Amendment given general acceptance of the 'consent once removed' doctrine in 2002. . . In view of the Supreme Court's disposition, the judgment of the district court is AFFIRMED.")

Christensen v. Park City Mun. Corp., 554 F.3d 1271, 1276-78 (10th Cir. 2009) ("Until very recently, in a case of qualified immunity, district and appellate courts were required to resolve the issue of law before proceeding to whether it was clearly established. . . .Fortunately, very recently, while this opinion was being prepared, the Supreme Court jettisoned its prior holding that courts in qualified immunity cases must determine whether the plaintiff's constitutional rights were violated before turning to whether the asserted right was clearly established. . . .This case is a prime example of when the discretion to avoid the first half of the Saucier two-step should be exercised. To attempt to answer Saucier's first question would require us to opine on an open and significant issue of constitutional law on an inadequate record, without benefit either of a district court holding or of relevant briefing, even though the issue would have no effect on the outcome of the case. We therefore exercise our newfound discretion and move on. . . . Police officers are not constitutional lawyers, and they should not have to fear personal damages liability when they enforce the plain terms of an ordinance that has not been challenged in court, let alone overturned, unless its unconstitutionality is patent. There is no case law from the Supreme Court or the Tenth Circuit establishing–clearly or otherwise–that the conduct complained of by Mr. Christensen was unconstitutional in 2004, or even today. To be sure, the plaintiff cites a handful of decisions from courts in other circuits that lend support to his claim. Even setting aside the fact that two of the cases he cites post-date the incident, the cited decisions have not been so broadly accepted as to be considered the 'weight of authority.' Indeed, the decisions stand for somewhat different interpretations of the First Amendment as applied to sales of artwork on public property. We think it is too much to expect that law enforcement officers, however reasonable or well-informed, would have known in 2004 that it is unconstitutional to enforce a general ordinance prohibiting unlicensed outdoor business activity on public property against an artist wishing to sell his wares in a park.We therefore affirm the district court's holding that the claims against the individual officers must dismissed on qualified immunity grounds.").

V.W. ex rel. Wybrow v. DaVinci Academy of Science and the Arts, No. 1:09-CV-127 TS., 2001 WL 4001150, at *5, *6 (D. Utah Sept. 8, 2011) ("Whether the strip search in this case was constitutional under the framework established by Safford presents a close question. However, the Court need not ultimately determine whether V.W.'s constitutional rights were violated. Determining whether an official is entitled to qualified immunity is a two step process. First, the court must determine whether the facts make out a constitutional violation. . . Second, the court must decide whether the right at issue as 'clearly established' at the time of the defendant's alleged misconduct. . . .The Supreme Court has made clear that courts have the discretion to determine 'which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.'. . In this matter, the Court finds it prudent to address whether the constitutional right allegedly violated here was clearly established at the time of the search. The search at issue here occurred in December 2008. Safford was not issued until June 2009. The Court in Safford acknowledged that lack of uniformity concerning strip searches in the school setting prior to its decision and, as a result of that uncertainty, found that the law had not been clearly established at the time of the search in that case. . . Thus, the school officials in that case were entitled to qualified immunity. The same is true here. There was no controlling case law on the issue of strip searches in the school setting from either the Supreme Court or the Tenth Circuit at the time this search occurred. Therefore, the Court finds that Freeze and Raccuia are entitled to qualified immunity.")

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Montanez v. Carvajal, 889 F.3d 1202, 1208-09, 1211-12 & n.7 (11th Cir. 2018) ("[W]e hold that if police have probable cause to suspect a residential burglary—whether they believe the crime is currently afoot or has recently concluded—they may, without further justification, conduct a brief warrantless search of the home to look for suspects and potential victims. . . .Accordingly, whether the first two entries into Montanez's residence were constitutionally permissible turns on whether the officers had probable cause to suspect a burglary. If they did, then they could enter—and it seems clear to us that they did. . . .As already explained in detail, the officers' first two entries—during which they spotted the marijuana and paraphernalia—were justified under the exigent-circumstances doctrine. Once those entries occurred, Montanez lost any reasonable expectation of privacy in the areas already searched. The officers could thereafter enter and re-enter the residence to observe the contraband without separately violating the Fourth Amendment. . . .Because we conclude that the officers' entries didn't violate the Fourth Amendment, it goes without saying that no analogous precedent (or even obviously applicable general legal principle) 'clearly established' that their entries were unlawful. And indeed, the district court's order denying the officers qualified immunity never suggests otherwise. The court went to great lengths to distinguish cases authorizing warrantless entries in circumstances like those here, but it never pointed to (nor have we found) any law or precedent that even remotely clearly established a contrary rule. Accordingly, even if a case could be made that the officers' entries here violated the Constitution—and for reasons explained, we're confident that they didn't—the officers would still be entitled to summary judgment under the second prong of the qualified-immunity standard.")

Mikko v. City of Atlanta, 857 F.3d 1136, 1143, 1146-48 (11th Cir. 2017) ("The Supreme Court has told us that a district attorney's decision to hire or fire assistant district attorneys, although often crucial to the efficient operation of the office, is not protected by absolute immunity. . . It would be passing strange to hold that while a prosecutor is not immune from liability for firing his own employees, he is immune for getting others to fire their employees. . . . The question is: In June of 2013, was it clearly established law in this circuit that it violates the First Amendment for prosecutors to seek to have a government employer fire an employee because he had furnished an expert opinion to, and planned to testify as an expert witness for, the defense in a criminal case in another state? Mikko contends that our predecessor Court's decision in Rainey answers that question. See Rainey v. Jackson State Coll., 481 F.2d 347 (5th Cir. 1973). . . . The Rainey decision is sufficiently distinguishable from this case that it did not provide the prosecutors with 'fair warning' that their actions violated Mikko's First Amendment rights. For one thing, Rainey addressed the obligations that a public employer owes to its own employee. . . It did not address the duties that a governmental official or entity owes to an employee of another governmental entity. In this case, the two prosecutor defendants are not Mikko's employers or his supervisors, nor did they work in the police department with him. Not only that, but in Rainey the plaintiff had testified before he was hired by the defendant college that fired him. . . He was terminated for pre-employment conduct. Here, Mikko submitted his expert report and planned to testify while he was serving as an employee of the Atlanta Police Department, which is the entity that fired him. We do not mean to say that Mikko's report or his intended testimony was not protected by the First Amendment, which is an issue we need not decide. What we do mean to say is that the circumstances of the Rainey case and this one are different enough that Rainey did not put the constitutional issue in this case 'beyond debate.'. . Even if those two distinctions did not exist, we would still know that neither the 1973 Rainey decision nor any other decision clearly established at the time the prosecutors acted in June 2013 that their actions violated Mikko's First Amendment rights. We would know that because of the Supreme Court's 2014 decision in the Lane case, which arose in our circuit. See Lane v. Franks, 573 U.S. __, 134 S. Ct. 2369, 2378 (2014). In that case the Supreme Court held that a public employer did violate an employee's First Amendment rights by firing him because of his truthful sworn testimony that was compelled by subpoena and occurred outside the scope of his ordinary job responsibilities. . .More importantly for present purposes, however, the Lane Court also held that at the time the plaintiff in that case was fired in 2009 the law of our circuit did not clearly establish that it was a First Amendment violation to fire him. . . . That means the Rainey decision, which our predecessor Court decided in 1973, did not clearly establish that it violates the First Amendment for a government employer to fire an employee on account of testimony the employee gave, under oath and outside the scope of his ordinary job responsibilities. . . If it had, the Supreme Court would have decided the qualified immunity issue in Lane differently. It is true that the prosecutors' conduct in this case occurred in June 2013, which was four-and-a-half years after the January 2009 conduct involved in the Supreme Court's Lane decision. But Mikko has not cited, nor have we found, any binding decision issued between January 2009 and June 2013 that clearly establishes that what the prosecutors did in this case violated the First Amendment. . . . In order for the law to be clearly established to the point that qualified immunity does not apply, the unlawfulness of the defendant's actions must be apparent in light of pre-existing law. . . No pre-existing law compelled that conclusion for the prosecutors under the circumstances of this case, and the Supreme Court's Lane decision shows

Jones v. Fransen, 857 F.3d 843, 851-55 (11th Cir. 2017) ("Here, we address the 'clearly established' inquiry first. Because we conclude that Jones's right was not clearly established in the specific context of the facts in this case, we do not reach the question of whether Defendants violated Jones's constitutional rights. When we consider whether the law clearly established the relevant conduct as a constitutional violation at the time that Defendant Officers engaged in the challenged acts, we look for 'fair warning' to officers that the conduct at issue violated a constitutional right. . . 'Fair warning' comes in the form of binding caselaw from the Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, or the highest court of the state (Georgia, here) that 'make[s] it obvious to all reasonable government actors, in the defendant's place, that what he is doing violates a federal law.'. .A plaintiff may demonstrate in any one of three ways that a defendant had "fair warning" that the right he violated was clearly established. . . . In his complaint, Jones asserts that Defendant Officers violated his Fourth Amendment right to be free from the use of excessive force. . . .The facts in Jones's case land somewhere between those involved in Priester and those in Crenshaw. The alleged crime arguably was more serious than Priester's yet less so than Crenshaw's. Jones purportedly stole a television from his former girlfriend's residence. And while domestic-related crimes certainly have the potential to be extremely serious and dangerous, nothing about this particular incident indicated that it fell into that category. At the time Jones's ex-girlfriend reported the theft, Jones was already out of the apartment, and his ex-girlfriend gave no indication that he had been violent or armed. On the other hand, when Jones fled police, unlike Priester, he did not ultimately overtly surrender himself. Instead, he led police into physically challenging terrain with brush and boulders, similar to the place where Crenshaw fled, and he did not respond in any way to Fransen's K-9 warnings. . . Like the Crenshaw officers, a reasonable officer in one of Defendants' places could have been concerned, at the time Draco was released, about entering the heavy brush to apprehend Jones and being met by a potential ambush. So Jones's case is not directly on all fours with either Priester or Crenshaw. As a result, neither case alone could have provided Defendant Officers with the type of 'fair notice' necessary to breach qualified immunity. And considering the cases together helps no more since Priester and Crenshaw reached opposite conclusions concerning whether an excessive-force violation occurred. We therefore turn to the second method for proving that the right in this case was clearly established at the time of the violation. . . The fact that the Fourth Amendment protects against the use of excessive force during an arrest does not provide an officer with any guidance as to what constitutes an excessive use of force. So this general principle is not the type of 'broader, clearly established principle [that] should control the novel facts [of the] situation' here. . . Finally, Jones did not argue—and particularly in light of Priester and Crenshaw, we cannot find—that Defendants' actions in this case 'lie [ ] so obviously at the very core of what the [Fourth Amendment] prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the official, notwithstanding the lack of case law.'. .For these reasons, we must conclude that Jones's constitutional right was not clearly established when Defendant Officers engaged in the challenged behavior. As a result, Defendant

Militello v. Sheriff of Broward Sheriff's Office, 684 F. App'x 809, 812 n.7, 815 (11th Cir. 2017) ("Consideration of the first prong of qualified immunity is unwarranted here as this case presents at least two of the circumstances identified in Pearson. First, Militello's failure-to-intervene claim presents a fact-bound Fourth Amendment issue for which a particularized analysis by our court would provide little precedential value. . . Second, we find that the second prong of qualified immunity presents a significantly easier question than the first prong. . . We therefore do not address whether Morel and Polk violated Militello's Fourth Amendment rights by failing to intervene. . . . In sum, nothing in our prior precedent put Morel and Polk on notice that, under these circumstances, they were required to take any particular action that they failed to take after hearing Daly-England's statement. Nor did our precedent inform Morel and Polk precisely of what reasonable actions they should have taken to insulate themselves from liability under these facts. Because all of these factors distinguish this case from those where officers have been found liable for failing to intervene when excessive force was used, we hold that Deputies Morel and Polk did not violate clearly established law. Therefore, they are entitled to qualified immunity. To conclude, we emphasize that we have only addressed whether Deputies Morel and Polk violated clearly established law. We need not (and do not) express any opinion as to whether Deputies Morel and Polk violated Militello's Fourth Amendment rights under the facts presented to the district court.")

Dukes v. Deaton, 852 F.3d 1035, 1042-44 (11th Cir. 2017) ("The facts construed in the light most favorable to Dukes establish that Deaton used excessive force. Deaton's conduct posed a significant risk of harm. He threw a flashbang that can generate heat in excess of 2,000 degrees Celsius into a dark room in which the occupants were asleep. He also failed to inspect the room, as he was trained to do, to determine whether bystanders, such as Dukes, occupied the room or if other hazards existed. And there existed minimal need for Deaton's use of force. True, the warrant stated that an informant advised law enforcement that Ward kept a handgun on his person, and the applying officer attested that drug dealers are known to be violent. Perhaps this record could have supported the use of the two flashbangs contemplated by the operational plan to disorient the occupants of the apartment. We need not decide that question. Even if the record supports the use of the first two flashbangs, these earlier flashbangs made Deaton's deployment gratuitous. The break and rake and the detonation of the flashbang on the exterior wall diverted the attention of Ward and Dukes before Deaton deployed his flashbang. There is no evidence that Deaton was aware that Ward had drawn his gun or that Dukes or Ward resisted the officers. And the suspected crime that prompted the search was possession and sale of marijuana. Deaton deployed a dangerous device into a dark room for a de minimis return. The decisions of our sister circuits support our conclusion that Deaton's conduct was unconstitutional. Our sister circuits have held that an officer's failure to perform a visual inspection before throwing a flashbang into an area weighs against reasonableness. Estate of Escobedo v. Bender, 600 F.3d 770, 785 (7th Cir. 2010); Boyd v. Benton Cty., 374 F.3d 773, 779 (9th Cir. 2004). And they have held that the use of a flashbang in an area occupied by bystanders, like Dukes, similarly weighs against reasonableness.

Bender, 600 F.3d at 786; Boyd, 374 F.3d at 779; cf. Krause v. Jones, 765 F.3d 675, 679 (6th Cir. 2014); Molina ex rel. Molina v. Cooper, 325 F.3d 963, 973 (7th Cir. 2003). The totality of the circumstances establishes that Deaton violated the Fourth Amendment. . . . Because no precedent of the Supreme Court, our Circuit, or the Supreme Court of Georgia has addressed the constitutionality of flashbangs, Dukes must establish that 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law ... appl[ies] with obvious clarity' to Deaton's conduct. . . To satisfy this narrow exception, official conduct must be so egregious that 'every objectively reasonable government official facing the circumstances would know that the official's conduct did violate federal law.'. . When this exception for obvious clarity is 'properly applied, it protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. .We conclude that it was not clearly established that Deaton's conduct was unconstitutional when he acted. Although we recognize that the doctrine of excessive force makes some official conduct off limits even in 'novel factual circumstances,'. . . Deaton's conduct was not so lacking in justification that every reasonable officer would know that what he did constituted excessive force. The operational plan contemplated the use of flashbangs to disorient the residents, and there is no evidence Deaton intended to use his flashbang for any other purpose. And the application in support of the search warrant stated that 'drug dealers,' such as Ward, 'commonly utilize weapons, dogs, and barricades to hinder law enforcement in the execution of their duties.' The application also stated that an informant had advised law enforcement that Ward carried a handgun 'on his person.' To be sure, Deaton should have followed his training and checked the bedroom before he threw. But a reasonable officer could have found it 'difficult ... to determine how the relevant legal doctrine, here excessive force,' would apply. . .Dukes argues that 'no decisional law is necessary to inform a reasonable officer that he should not blindly throw a [flashbang] grenade into the bedroom of a small apartment, at 5:30 a.m., ... occupied[ ] by people who ... were doing nothing other than sleeping,' but this portrait ignores facts stated in the warrant and the purpose of a flashbang. Ward carried a weapon. The warrant stated that drug trafficking occurred in his apartment. A flashbang is meant to disorient and avoid physical harm. And the operational plan permitted the officers to use a flashbang if needed. In the absence of binding caselaw to the contrary, Deaton, though badly mistaken, could have reasonably believed, based on the facts known to the officers on the morning of the search, that throwing a flashbang into Ward's bedroom was not excessive force. Our conclusion that Deaton violated the Fourth Amendment, but that the contours of the right were not clearly established, also finds support in the decisions of our sister circuits. In Boyd, for example, the Ninth Circuit ruled that the detonation of a flashbang in a room with up to eight bystanders without first looking was unconstitutional, but that the right was not clearly established. . . In Bing ex rel. Bing v. City of Whitehall, the Sixth Circuit also decided that the use of a second flashbang violated the Fourth Amendment, but that the violation was not obvious. . . Consistent with these decisions, we affirm the ruling that Deaton is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Hart v. Logan, 664 F. App'x 857, 861-62 (11th Cir. 2016) ("Because we may consider the prongs of the qualified immunity test in either order, we proceed directly to examining the qualified immunity test's second prong. . . Plaintiff cites to several cases from this Circuit that she contends clearly establish that Defendant's actions were unconstitutional. In each case, this Court held the use of deadly force in question was unreasonable. However, we conclude that each case is factually distinguishable because Defendant in this case faced a more dangerous situation than the officers in the cited cases. This is so even after construing the factual disputes in favor of Plaintiff, as required at the summary judgment stage. . . .Unlike in McKinney or Mercado, Defendant did not have a ten to twenty minute period of time to talk with Mr. Hart and calmly assess how dangerous he was. Instead Defendant faced a tense and rapidly-escalating situation at the time of the shooting, with Mr. Hart standing and then advancing towards Defendant, all the while ignoring Defendant's repeated commands to stop and show his hands. Mr. Hart's conduct rendered him a much more potentially dangerous threat to Defendant than were the seated and stationary victims in McKinney and Mercado. In addition, given Mr. Hart's repeated demands that Defendant give him the gun, coupled with his approach toward Defendant, a concern by Defendant that Mr. Hart was trying to arm himself, by either getting his own gun back or taking Defendant's gun, was not an unreasonable fear. . . .In sum, Plaintiff has failed to demonstrate that under the above circumstances, Defendant had fair notice that the use of deadly force would be deemed unconstitutional.")

Fish v. Brown, 838 F.3d 1153, 1164-65 (11th Cir. 2016) ("[L]ike the district court, we need not determine whether defendants violated Fish's Fourth Amendment rights by stepping into his sunroom without his explicit consent, because we find that they are entitled to qualified immunity on any such claim. . . Defendants followed Riesco, whom they knew was familiar with Fish's home. She parked her automobile in the rear of the house, next to Fish's SUV. No vehicles were parked in front of the house. Riesco walked confidently from her auto to and through the sunroom door without knocking, or checking to see if it was locked (as though she expected it to be unlocked). She proceeded to walk straight through the sunroom to the interior wood door and knocked. Reisco's authoritative demeanor caused Deputies Harrison and Loucks to conclude that was the customary route taken by guests entering the house, and they followed her lead. . .Those facts lead to a finding of qualified immunity for two reasons. First, the Deputies could reasonably have relied upon a variation of the 'consent-once-removed' doctrine, 'which permits a warrantless entry by police officers into a home when consent to enter has already been granted to an undercover officer or informant who has observed contraband in plain view.' Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 229 (2009). At the time of the seizure that led to the alleged Fourth Amendment violation in Pearson, only courts from a few federal Circuits (not including the Circuit in which the case arose) had considered the doctrine, but all courts that had considered it had adopted it. . . In the absence of law from their own Circuit, the officers who conducted the seizure were entitled to rely upon cases from other Circuits that allowed the 'consent-once-removed' doctrine; and, accordingly, they were entitled to qualified immunity. . . This court does not appear to have addressed the 'consent-once-removed' doctrine after the Supreme Court's 2009 decision in Pearson. Therefore, the doctrine is no more settled today than it was in 2009. Thus, if the Deputies were entitled to rely upon the doctrine in Pearson, they also were entitled to rely upon it here. Second, the Deputies reasonably could have believed that the sunroom was 'impliedly open to use by the public' for the purpose of gaining access to the principal, interior areas of the house. . . . In summary, the law was not sufficiently clearly established at the time of the alleged violation to give Harrison and Loucks fair warning that their entry into Fish's sunroom under the circumstances of this case would violate his Fourth Amendment rights. See Carroll v. Carman, — U.S. —, 135 S. Ct. 348, 349 (2014) (holding that police officers should have been entitled to qualified immunity when they entered onto a ground-level deck on the back of a home to knock on a sliding-glass door, believing the door to be a "customary entryway").")

Moore v. Pederson, 806 F.3d 1036, 1039-40, 1044, 1046-48 (11th Cir. 2015) ("[W]e hold today that, in the absence of exigent circumstances, the government may not conduct the equivalent of a Terry stop inside a person's home. We further hold that a person does not consent to entry into his home by an officer outside simply by following an officer's instructions to turn around and be handcuffed, while the person remains inside his home. But because the law on these points was not clearly established in this Circuit before our decision today, we affirm the district court's entry of summary judgment on qualified-immunity grounds to Pederson. . . . Like the officer in McClish, Pederson did not have a warrant, and he lacked probable cause, exigent circumstances, and consent. He nonetheless breached Moore's home's threshold for the purpose of arresting Moore when he handcuffed Moore, who was standing inside his apartment's doorway at the time. As a result, Pederson violated Moore's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizures. . . .In the absence of probable cause and without a warrant, Pederson could not have lawfully entered Moore's premises for the purpose of arresting him. Because Pederson reached into Moore's home to arrest him, anyway, Pederson violated Moore's constitutional right to be free from unreasonable seizure. . . Having determined that Pederson violated Moore's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure, we consider whether, as of November 15, 2008, when Pederson arrested Moore, the parameters of that right as it arose in this case were clearly established. We find that they were not. . . .Moore does not point to a particular Supreme Court, valid Eleventh Circuit, or Florida Supreme Court case that he contends clearly established that Terry-like stops may not be conducted in the home. Instead, he asserts that it was clearly established that a Terry stop could not occur inside the home because all cases approving of Terry stops involve temporary detentions in public places, not in homes. In further support of his argument, Moore points to a vacated Eleventh Circuit case and cases outside this Circuit where courts have opined that a Terry stop cannot occur in the home. We disagree that Moore has demonstrated that the law was clearly established in this case as of November 15, 2008, that an officer may not conduct a Terry-like stop in the home in the absence of exigent circumstances. First, the mere dearth of binding caselaw holding that a particular activity is constitutional cannot, in and of itself, clearly establish that that activity is unconstitutional or otherwise impermissible. Indeed, that Moore discovered no valid, binding caselaw that holds that a Terry-like stop can be conducted in a home does not somehow clearly establish the principle that a Terry-like stop cannot be executed in a home. Nor does Moore find the necessary support in the cases he cites. Moore relies on a vacated Eleventh Circuit case, two Ninth Circuit cases that were issued after November 15, 2008, and a Tenth Circuit case that was issued in May 2008. To state the obvious, United States v. Tobin, 890 F.2d 319, 327 (11th Cir.1989), vacated, 902 F.2d 821 (11th Cir.1990), the Eleventh Circuit case on which Moore relies, was vacated. That means it has no legal force, so it could not have clearly established the law. While Moore acknowledges as much, he suggests that the Eleventh Circuit's subsequent en banc opinion in Tobin, 923 F.2d 1506, 1511 (11th Cir.1991) (en banc) ("Tobin II "), clearly established that an in-home Terry-like stop violates the Fourth Amendment when it stated that 'reasonable suspicion cannot justify the warrantless search of a house.' Not only does the quotation that Moore cites address warrantless searches, not Terry-like stops, but review of the entire quotation—'Reasonable suspicion cannot justify the warrantless search of a house, but it can justify the agents' approaching the house to question the occupants,' 923 F.3d at 1511 (emphasis added) (citation omitted)—does not 'dictate[ ], that is, truly compel[ ], the conclusion for all reasonable, similarly situated public officials that what Defendant was doing violated Plaintiff['s] federal rights in the circumstances.'. . . In fact, a panel of this Court, relying on the same quotation about 'warrantless search[es]' in Tobin II on which Moore hangs his hat, said only that '[w]e are skeptical that "reasonable suspicion" is the correct standard for justifying the officers' entry' into the home. . . If, as recently as last year, a panel of this Court was, at worst, 'skeptical' that Terry-like stops could occur in the home, we cannot say that the law on that point was 'clearly established' for officers six-and-one-half years ago. For this reason, Moore's argument must fail, regardless of the caselaw from other jurisdictions. And we cannot conclude that in November 2008 the law was clearly established in this Circuit that a Terry-like stop cannot be conducted in the home, in the absence of exigent circumstances. As a result, the district court correctly found that Pederson was protected by qualified immunity with respect to the initial Terry-like stop. . . . [footnotes omitted])

Moore v. Pederson, 806 F.3d 1036, 1048-55 (11th Cir. 2015) ("It is true that as of November 15, 2008, when the incident in this case occurred, the law was clearly established in this Circuit that an officer may not conduct a warrantless arrest without both probable cause and either exigent circumstances or consent. . . And here, Pederson had no warrant, and he similarly lacked exigent circumstances and consent. But, as discussed above, none of the cases that stand for the principle that a warrantless arrest may not be conducted in the home without both probable cause and either exigent circumstances or consent involved a Terry stop. When an officer lawfully conducts a Terry stop, Fla. Stat. § 843.02 authorizes the officer to arrest a person who refuses to provide identification in response to requests. . . Neither exigent circumstances nor probable cause is necessary. So Pederson suggests that, had he been correct in thinking that he could execute a valid Terry stop in the home, he would not have needed either exigent circumstances or consent to effect the arrest of Moore, even though he had to reach into Moore's home. . . . We need not determine whether Pederson's theory on this particular issue is correct because, in any case, we cannot find that, at the time of the events in this matter, the law was clearly established with respect to the bounds of consent to enter the home for the purpose of effecting an arrest. We recognize, of course, the clearly established general proposition that consent is not freely and voluntarily given when a person merely acquiesces to a claim of lawful authority. . . But '[o]bvious clarity cases' are 'rare.'. . To rely on that "narrow exception," we must find that the officer's acts were 'so egregious that preexisting, fact-specific precedent was not necessary to give clear warning to every reasonable ... officer that what the defendant officer was doing must be "unreasonable" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment.'. . Here, we cannot do that. . . .[U]nder McClish, a reasonable officer would not be on clear notice before today that Moore's actions did not constitute the type of

'surrender' that can qualify as consent for the purpose of entering a home to effect an arrest. . . . [B]efore today, a reasonable officer could have understood Moore's actions in turning around and presenting his hands in response to the officer's instructions as surrender, and consequently, as consent under McClish. . . . To be clear, for the reasons we have already described, we strongly reject any suggestion that a person 'surrenders' and therefore 'consents' to arrest in his home simply because he recognizes the officer's authority or 'submit[s] to' or 'acquiesce[s]' in the arresting officer's commands or because he does not close the door of his home in response to an officer's announcement that he is under arrest. Today we clearly establish as the law of this Circuit that merely following an officer's commands—without any separate affirmative act or speech demonstrating voluntary and free consent—does not constitute 'surrender' and therefore consent to an officer's entry into the home to effect the arrest. Nor does failure to close the door. But we have 'emphasized that fair and clear notice to government officials is the cornerstone of qualified immunity.'. . And in light of McClish and Berkowitz, we cannot say that, as of November 15, 2008, Pederson had 'fair and clear notice' that a person does not 'surrender' and therefore consent to entry of his home for purposes of effecting an arrest, by 'acquiesc[ing]' in or 'submit[ting] to' the arresting officer's announcement that he is under arrest and by turning around and presenting hands for cuffing in response to instructions to do just that (and not closing the door of his home instead). As a result, qualified immunity shields Pederson from liability for his wrongful entry into Moore's home to arrest him. . . .Because the law was not clearly established until today that Pederson lacked probable cause to arrest Moore since he could not conduct a Terry-like stop in the home absent exigent circumstances, and further, because the law was not clearly established until today that Moore's actions in acquiescing to Pederson's instructions did not amount to consent to enter the home, the district court properly granted Pederson qualified immunity. . . .Home may be where the heart is, . . . but it cannot be where the government is—at least for purposes of conducting a Terry-like stop, in the absence of exigent circumstances. Today we clearly establish this as the law in this Circuit. But since the law was not clearly established on this point when Pederson engaged in the Terry-like stop of Moore while Moore was in his home, the district court did not err when it granted qualified immunity to Pederson on this issue. The district court likewise did not err in granting qualified immunity to Pederson regarding his arrest of Moore while Moore was in his home. The law was not clearly established at the time of the arrest that Moore's compliance with Pederson's demands that he turn around and present his hands for cuffing did not constitute consent.") Denton v. Stokes, 620 F. App'x 712, 714 (11th Cir. 2015) ("At the time that Stokes seized, photocopied, and disclosed Denton's nonlegal correspondence, it was not clearly established that doing so violated the Fourth Amendment. We had held that both the Sixth Amendment and the 'right of access to the courts' limit the reading of correspondence from inmates with their attorneys. . . We had also held that the First Amendment limits efforts to control of the volume of nonlegal, 'general correspondence' that inmates send and receive. . . [W]e had not held (and still have not held) that the Fourth Amendment bars the reading, photocopying, and disclosing of inmates' nonlegal correspondence as part of an ongoing investigation. There are some indications that it may not. . . . In any event, we need not decide the merits of Denton's Fourth Amendment claim to resolve this appeal, so we express no view on it. It is enough that no precedent of the Supreme Court or this Court would have put Stokes on notice that the Fourth Amendment prohibited him from seizing Denton's nonlegal correspondence while he was incarcerated, photocopying it, and showing those copies to others as part of an ongoing investigation. . . That being the case, Stokes is entitled to qualified immunity from Denton's claim.")

Merricks v. Adkisson, 785 F.3d 553, 559-60, 563 (11th Cir. 2015) ("The salient question for this case, therefore, is whether the state of the law on August 11, 2008 gave Adkisson fair warning that his treatment of Merricks was unconstitutional. . . . Note that in ruling on this case, we will not decide if Adkisson's actions against Merricks amount to a constitutional violation for excessive force against her. Rather, the Court will only consider the clearly established law question as authorized by Pearson v. Callahan . . . . [B]ased on the facts in this case, it was reasonable for Adkisson to believe that he could stop Merricks and search her car and her person for contraband. It was also reasonable for him to believe that he could turn off the car, take the keys, and get her out of the car to search it. . . . And although we are not ruling on the reasonableness of the force he used to get her out of the car, Adkisson was in a tense and uncertain situation, faced with a suspect who refused to cooperate and who struggled to keep him from searching her car. . . . There is substantial case authority in the Supreme Court and this Circuit clearly establishing that harming a suspect after that suspect is compliant, cooperative, under control, or otherwise subdued is gratuitous and, therefore, constitutionally excessive. The three cases Merricks cites establish nothing more than that. On the other hand, there is little, if any, authority dealing with the force an officer can use when he has the undisputed right to search a vehicle, and the driver obstructs the search. For that reason, in analyzing excessive force cases, it is important to understand not only what force was applied but when it was applied. If gratuitous force was applied after the suspect was subdued or otherwise cooperating, qualified immunity will likely not apply, unless the force is de minimis. . . If, on the other hand, the force was applied when the officer was trying to take control of the suspect or the situation confronting him, the officer can make a much better claim to the qualified immunity defense. Merricks's claim falls into the latter category. Consequently, she has failed to satisfy her burden of showing the clearly established nature of the alleged constitutional violation.")

Mobley v. Palm Beach Cnty. Sheriff Dep't, 783 F.3d 1347, 1356 & n.10 (11th Cir. 2015) (per curiam) ("Our decisions demonstrate that the point at which a suspect is handcuffed and 'pose [s] no risk of danger to the officer' often is the pivotal point for excessive-force claims. We have held a number of times that severe force applied after the suspect is safely in custody is excessive. . . But force applied while the suspect has not given up and stopped resisting and may still pose a danger to the arresting officers, even when that force is severe, is not necessarily excessive. . . Mobley has not pointed to any circumstances before he quit resisting and was handcuffed that show the force applied against him was objectively unreasonable. Deputies Yoder, Johnson, and Elliott therefore are entitled to summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity because under the circumstances their conduct did not violate Mobley's constitutional rights. . . .Because we hold that the officers did not violate Mobley's Fourth Amendment right to be free from excessive force during his arrest, we need not decide whether they would be entitled to qualified immunity even if they had done so.")

Jay v. Hendershott, 579 F. App'x 948, 950-54 (11th Cir. 2014) ("Here, because we conclude that Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim is one 'in which it is plain that a constitutional right [was] not clearly established,'. . . we address only the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis and do not reach the issue of whether the complaint sufficiently alleges a constitutional violation. . . .[W]e agree with the district court that no case from the Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, or the Florida Supreme Court is 'on all fours' with the facts alleged in this case. Nor have Plaintiffs identified—and we could not find—any case materially similar to this one. In this Circuit, at one end of the spectrum, we have previously held that the use of a police canine to subdue a suspect is objectively reasonable where the suspect is wanted for the commission of a serious crime, actively flees from police, resists arrest, and is reasonably believed to be armed and dangerous. . . By contrast, at the other end, we have held that such force, when employed against an individual who presents no safety risk and is fully compliant with officers' commands, is excessive under the Fourth Amendment. . . Here, however, we are faced with an individual who, though neither outwardly aggressive nor hostile, failed to comply with any instructions from law enforcement, was still actively evading police when the canine was released, and was approaching both an open garage with unknown items inside and a house with people inside. As we have never before addressed whether the deployment of a canine under these particular circumstances is unconstitutional, our case law is insufficient to put officers on notice as to whether the conduct alleged violates the Fourth Amendment. In denying Hendershott qualified immunity, the district court relied primarily on our decision in Priester, concluding that clearly established law at the time of Monell's arrest would have informed a reasonable officer that the force allegedly employed was unconstitutional. We do not agree that Priester, which was decided on vastly different facts, compels this conclusion. . . . Nor do the facts of this case fall within the scope of the obvious-clarity exception. . . .Plaintiffs appear to suggest that the absence of any overt aggression by Monell, coupled with the fact that Monell suffers from mental illness, somehow nullified this risk, but the facts do not lend themselves quite so easily to that conclusion. The officers on the scene were faced with an individual who led police on a lengthy pursuit, refused to pull over despite the arrival of multiple police cars with lights flashing and sirens blaring, ignored officers' numerous orders to halt, and attempted to enter an open garage that could have contained weapons and a residence that could have held potential hostages. Particularly when viewed against the background of Monell's extended unresponsive and unusual conduct, we cannot say that it should have been obvious to every reasonable officer that Monell's conduct and the potential danger of the situation did not call for the force used. While we do not opine at this juncture as to whether Hendershott's alleged use of force was unconstitutional, we do not believe that the conduct at issue was so 'wholly unnecessary' or 'grossly disproportionate' as to blatantly cross the line of constitutionality in the absence of any case law on point. . . As a result, as the complaint is currently pled, qualified immunity should not have been denied to Hendershott.")

Gilmore v. Hodges, 738 F.3d 266, 269, 273 (11th Cir. 2013) ("Because the significant hearing loss alleged by Weinberg both is a serious medical need and could have been effectively treated with the use of hearing aids, we now hold that Weinberg stated a viable constitutional claim. An uncorrected, substantial inability to hear, much like an inability to see effectively without the aid of a corrective medical device, may place an inmate at risk of serious harm and substantially interfere with the inmate's ability to function in a penal environment. This holding, however, was not clearly established at the time of the alleged constitutional violations—not by this Court, not by the Florida Supreme Court, nor finally by the United States Supreme Court. Thus, because the state of the law did not provide the officers with 'fair warning' that their alleged conduct was unlawful, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .In order to clarify the law for future cases, we begin with the first prong, although we could resolve the case on the second prong alone. We do so for several reasons. In the first place, as the Supreme Court explained in Pearson, although addressing the first prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is no longer required, it is nonetheless 'often appropriate' and 'often beneficial,' particularly 'with respect to questions that do not frequently arise in cases in which a qualified immunity defense is unavailable.'. . We are plainly confronted with such a question here. A claim of deliberate indifference to a serious medical need in violation of the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments necessarily arises only where the plaintiff is incarcerated, and a qualified immunity defense is generally available to the public official or officials against whom the plaintiff brings suit. While a qualified immunity defense is not available when a plaintiff seeks prospective injunctive relief, . . . the nature of a deliberate indifference to serious medical needs claim is such that an inmate will almost always be seeking damages to remedy claimed past injuries caused by the official's failure to provide the inmate with constitutionally adequate medical care. Thus, we see precious little reason to delay the resolution of the constitutional question until a later date, since any later case raising this question will almost surely be decided in the same context of qualified immunity. As we see it, addressing the first prong of qualified immunity in this case 'promotes the development of constitutional precedent,'. . . and has the salutary effect of giving clear guidance to those officials entrusted with the important charge of providing medical care to incarcerated individuals. Moreover, the constitutional question at the heart of this case—whether a substantial hearing impairment that can be remedied by a hearing aid may amount to a serious medical need for purposes of the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments—is a relatively straightforward legal question that we are well equipped to resolve. Although future cases will surely involve factual disputes about whether a particular inmate's hearing impairment is severe enough or poses a substantial enough risk of harm to amount to a serious medical need, or whether a hearing aid actually can remedy the inmate's severe impairment, or indeed whether an official is aware of the inmate's condition, we can provide guidance to courts and officials down the road by answering today the threshold constitutional question of whether a substantial hearing impairment that can be remedied by a hearing aid may present a serious medical need.")

Maddox v. Stephens, 727 F.2d 1109, 1121, 1127 n.19 (11th Cir. 2013) ("A right may be clearly established for qualified immunity purposes in one of three ways: '(1) case law with indistinguishable facts clearly establishing the constitutional right; (2) a broad statement of principle within the Constitution, statute, or case law that clearly establishes a constitutional right; or (3) conduct so egregious that a constitutional right was clearly violated, even in the total absence of case law.'. . It is undisputed that only the third and final category is relevant to this appeal, and thus that Stephens is entitled to qualified immunity unless her conduct fits into this third category. This third category, however, is 'narrow' and 'encompasses those situations where "the official's conduct lies so obviously at the very core of what the [relevant constitutional provision] prohibits that the unlawfulness of the conduct was readily apparent to the official, notwithstanding the lack of case law."'. . .We stress that, on appeal, only Maddox's substantive due process claim is properly before us. And, after thorough review, we hold that, even assuming arguendo that Maddox has established a procedural due process violation and even assuming arguendo that Stephens violated Maddox's substantive due process rights, Stephens is entitled to qualified immunity because the law was not clearly established that Stephens' actions were so conscience shocking as to violate Maddox's liberty interest in the care, custody, and management of J.O. . . . Because we hold that there has been no violation of clearly established substantive due process law, we need not decide whether Stephens' behavior actually violated Maddox's substantive due process rights.")

Loftus v. Clark-Moore, 690 F.3d 1200, 1204, 1205 (11th Cir. 2012) ("Because Loftus's complaint is one 'in which it is plain that a constitutional right [was] not clearly established,'. . . our analysis begins and ends with the second inquiry of the test for qualified immunity. . . .'[S]tate officials who act to investigate or to protect children where there are allegations of abuse almost never act within the contours of "clearly established law,"'. . . so it should come as no surprise that no controlling case law establishes that it is unreasonable for a Florida social worker to interrogate a minor at her school during the course of an investigation of allegations of child abuse. Similarly, no controlling case law requires a showing of probable cause for a Florida social worker to interrogate a minor on school grounds if the minor is suspected of being a victim of child abuse. We have stated instead that a state official may seize a student at a school so long as the seizure is 'justified at its inception' and is 'reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which justified interference in the first place.'. . Although Gray involved a police officer who worked at public school officials' behest to ensure the safety of the other students at that school, we have never limited the standard for evaluating the reasonableness of a seizure of a minor at a school. Loftus cites a decision from one of our sister circuits, Doe v. Heck, 327 F.3d 492 (7th Cir.2003), to support his argument, but that decision cannot provide 'clearly established' law in this Circuit. Loftus insists that the 'notice of illegality ... should not have to come from cases in the district where the improper incident occurred,' but Clark–Moore, as a Florida official performing a discretionary duty, 'cannot be held to a standard of conduct which is unsettled by the Supreme Court[,] ... this circuit[,]' or 'the highest state court' in Florida. . .Loftus argues too that the warrantless seizure of Savonna violated Florida law, which should have put Clark–Moore on notice that her actions were illegal,. . . but this argument fails because 'section 1983 protects only against violations of federally protected rights.'. . . No controlling case law establishes that a social worker violates a parent's right to due process by making threats to remove his children in the course of an investigation of child abuse that the parent invited, and Loftus fails to explain how Ferguson's conduct otherwise obviously violated the Constitution. Loftus cites no decision of our Court, the Supreme Court, or the Florida Supreme Court to support his argument that Ferguson's conduct violated his and his children's clearly established constitutional rights.")

Hoyt v. Cooks, 672 F.3d 972, 977-80 (11th Cir. 2012) ("The Supreme Court has stated that we have discretion in deciding which of those two prongs to address first. . . Because we find that the illegality of Cooks's and Harkleroad's behavior was not clearly established at the time, we need not decide whether there was a constitutional violation. . . In this case, there is no precedent that has staked out a bright line. Plaintiffs produce two cases, but both are inapposite. Plaintiffs' first case is Draper v. Reynolds, 369 F.3d 1270 (11th Cir.2004), where an officer used a single probe-style Taser stun on a truck driver who was 'hostile, belligerent, and uncooperative.'. . However, Draper did not establish that any particular behavior would violate the Constitution. Indeed, it found that the officer's actions were constitutional. . . Also, Draper is distinguishable, primarily because the officers in that case were able to handcuff the suspect after just one use of the Taser, whereas Cooks and Harkleroad were unable to fully handcuff Allen even after repeated stuns. . . Accordingly, Draper did not give Cooks and Harkleroad fair warning that their behavior would constitute excessive force. . .The only other case Plaintiffs cite to support the argument that the illegality of Cooks's and Harkleroad's actions was clearly established is Oliver v. Fiorino, 586 F.3d 898 (11th Cir.2009). However, Oliver was issued in October 2009, and thus it cannot have put Cooks and Harkleroad on notice that their behavior in May 2007 could constitute excessive force. . . Accordingly, Plaintiffs have produced no caselaw that put Cooks and Harkleroad on notice that their actions would violate a clearly established right. However, Plaintiffs are correct in arguing that a right can be clearly established even in the absence of caselaw. . . .This would require that every reasonable officer in Cooks and Harkleroad's position would inevitably conclude that the force was unlawful. . . .This combination of an assault, battery, very unusual behavior, and threats to kill Cooks [footnote omitted] would weigh against a conclusion that Cooks's and Harkleroad's behavior was 'so far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force' that they had to know they were 'violating the Constitution even without caselaw on point.'. . . [T]he facts in Oliver are so different from the instant facts that the obvious clarity holding in Oliver falls short of indicating obvious clarity in this case.")

Roberts v. Spielman, 643 F.3d 899, 904-06 (11th Cir. 2011) ("Roberts appears to argue on appeal, that viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Roberts, Deputy Spielman exceeded the scope of his authority when he remained on Roberts's property after he saw that she was alive and she asked him to leave. We do not agree. Deputy Spielman acted within his authority in remaining on the property and attempting to speak with and observe Roberts for a brief period of time to ensure that she had not attempted, nor was about to attempt, suicide. . . . We stress the limited scope of Deputy Spielman's entry into the home and encounter with Roberts. Deputy Spielman opened the door and then stood in the doorway of Roberts' home for about five minutes while he spoke with her. Deputy Spielman then escorted Roberts outside to the back steps of her garage, but only after she continued yelling and made her ambiguous 'or I will-' statement that a reasonable officer could have interpreted as a threat or at least as further cause for concern about Roberts's mental state.

Although the record is silent as to precisely how long Deputy Spielman spoke with Roberts as she sat on the steps, it does not appear to have been a very long time. When Deputy Spielman determined that Roberts was not threatening suicide, he determined that there was no longer an exigency justifying further action, and he left the property. We conclude that, under the particular factual circumstances of this case, Deputy Spielman's conduct did not violate the Fourth Amendment, and he is therefore entitled to qualified immunity. Furthermore, even assuming arguendo a constitutional violation, a reasonable officer in Deputy Spielman's shoes would not have known that his conduct was unlawful. Roberts has cited no binding precedent that clearly established that probable cause and exigent circumstances immediately evaporate once an officer performing a welfare check for a possibly suicidal person sees that the person is merely alive.")

Coffin v. Brandau, 642 F.3d 999, 1012-18 & n.16 (11th Cir. 2011) (en banc) ("We need not decide in this case whether entering an open garage in order to utilize a passageway to gain access to a visible door to the home is a violation of the Fourth Amendment. We hold, however, that, under the totality of the circumstances, the Deputies' entry into the Coffins' garage was a violation of the Fourth Amendment. The garage here is attached to the home itself, putting it in closer proximity to the home than an unattached garage. . . . Ms. Coffin also attempted to exercise her Fourth Amendment rights. . . . Under these circumstances and in light of Ms. Coffin's indications that she intended to maintain privacy, we hold that entering the garage as Ms. Coffin attempted to close it was a violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . We must next address whether, on the pertinent date, it was already clearly established by preexisting law that entering the Coffins open garage in the face of Ms. Coffins' attempts to exercise her Fourth Amendment privacy rights, including her request that the Deputies leave the property and her attempt to close the garage door, would violate the Fourth Amendment. We hold that the Deputies did not violate clearly established Fourth Amendment law. [discussing cases] Having concluded that no binding case law clearly established the rule of law for this case, we are left with the question of whether the Deputies' entry of the attached garage was a violation of the Fourth Amendment as a matter of obvious clarity. . . . For a number of reasons, we are unable to conclude that, as a matter of obvious clarity, an open attached garage is either a part of the home, or entitled to the same level of protection as the home. . . . Only cases from the Supreme Court of the United States, the Eleventh Circuit, or the Florida Supreme Court can clearly establish the law in our Circuit, but opinions from other courts can suggest that reasonable jurists would not know that certain factual situations rise to the level of constitutional violations, and therefore reasonable officers would not either. . . . [T]he development of the law in other jurisdictions merely reflects the legal landscape, how reasonable jurists have interpreted relevant precedent, and, thus, how reasonable officers might. . . . Although we conclude that the officers did in fact violate the Fourth Amendment under the facts and circumstances of this case, we cannot conclude, in light of all the foregoing considerations, that the officers have violated clearly-established Fourth Amendment law.")

Coffin v. Brandau, 642 F.3d 999, 1018-29 & n.1 (11th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (Barkett, J., joined by Dubina, C.J., and Martin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("My concurrence with the majority is limited to its conclusion that the deputies violated the Coffins' constitutional rights. . .

. The majority's opinion today does nothing less than eviscerate the once inviolate protections historically accorded the home by the Fourth Amendment of the United States Constitution. To accomplish this task, the majority ignores the most basic, bright-line principle of the Supreme Court's Fourth Amendment jurisprudence: that warrantless searches and seizures occurring within the unambiguous physical dimensions of the home are presumptively unconstitutional. The majority circumvents this fundamental precept occupying the very core of the Fourth Amendment by concluding, without any explanation, that an enclosed garage physically attached to a home–and sharing the home's roof and walls–does not exist within the unambiguous physical dimensions of the home. This conclusion rests on the faulty premise that ordinary people expect that deliverymen will come into their attached, enclosed garages and that deliverymen have a right to do so, and fails to recognize that an attached, enclosed garage is no different than any other room in the house, and is thus entitled to the same blanket Fourth Amendment protections as a living room, a den, or a bedroom. . . . While the majority finds a Fourth Amendment violation in this case, it does so, not by recognizing the garage's obvious status as another room in the house, but rather by applying, without support and in conflict with Supreme Court precedent, a newly minted 'totality of the circumstances' test which looks to whether its door is open or closed and whether a person has repeatedly told officers to leave it. The majority opinion upends not only the law of search and seizure but the law of qualified immunity as well. . . . Payton unambiguously held that the Fourth Amendment prohibits law enforcement officials from entering the unambiguous physical dimensions of the home without a warrant, whether its door is open or shut. . . Because the Coffins' attached garage, like the Payton defendant's bedroom, existed within the unambiguous physical dimensions of the home, the Fourth Amendment protected it, as a matter of law, even though the deputies could see inside. The deputies, therefore, violated the Fourth Amendment by crossing its threshold and arresting Mrs. Coffin inside. . . . Not only does the majority erode the protections of the Fourth Amendment, but, in holding that the Coffins' constitutional rights were not clearly established, it also distorts the law of qualified immunity in several ways. First, in relying upon dissents, even from other circuits, as well as opinions from intermediate state appellate courts, . . . the majority appears to abrogate, in a one-sided way, our well-established rule that limits the relevant universe of cases for qualified immunity purposes to those of the United States Supreme Court, Eleventh Circuit, and highest court of the pertinent state. . . While the majority appears to still require § 1983 plaintiffs to follow our prior rule to prove that their rights were clearly established, it now permits defendants to rely on the opinions of any jurist in any jurisdiction to prove that the law was not clearly established. . . This double standard makes no sense. . . . In this case, the applicable binding precedents are even more factually similar to the deputies' conduct than the precedents in Hope were to the prison officials' conduct, and thus gave the deputies fair warning that their conduct violated the Coffins' constitutional rights. The garage, like every other room in the Coffins' home, was within the confines of the home, and Payton says that officers cannot put one foot into the confines of a home without a warrant; Kyllo held that a warrantless search of a garage violates the Fourth Amendment; and Kauz, Sokolow, and Taylor held that entering a garage without a warrant violates the Fourth Amendment. There is nothing unclear or confusing about the straightforward holdings of these cases. . . . Simply put, the majority does exactly what the Supreme Court chastised this Court for doing in Hope. Reading these cases on their own, ordinary people, and especially reasonable officers, would understand clearly that an attached, enclosed garage is protected by the Fourth Amendment.")

Coffin v. Brandau, 642 F.3d 999, 1029, 1030 (11th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (Hull, J., joined by Martin, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("In my view this is an open-and-shut case, not an 'open garage' case. . . . In short, the deputies violated Mrs. Coffin's Fourth Amendment rights when they entered her closed garage door, and the Fourth Amendment law was clearly established that the deputies could not enter Mrs. Coffin's home after she closed the door.")

Coffin v. Brandau, 642 F.3d 999, 1030 (11th Cir. 2011) (en banc) (Martin, J., joined by Dubina, C.J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I write separately only to emphasize that just as Mr. and Mrs. Coffin have been denied relief for this intrusion into their home, the 'totality of the circumstances' test established in the majority opinion does nothing to protect people in their homes from similar intrusions in the future. Specifically, the indefinite standard established by the court today reduces to one the clearly established circumstances under which a person can prevent law enforcement from entering her garage, attached to her home, even where the officer has no warrant, and where the homeowner actively protests the entry. . . . Before today, our binding precedent, which established that an attached garage is treated as part of the 'house' under the Fourth Amendment, drew a firm and bright line. But rather than apply Kyllo's bright line rule, the majority now sets a standard that relies on a number of context-specific and circumstance-dependent factors. In doing so, this court has stripped the Coffins of the very rights that the Fourth Amendment was intended to protect. . . . The shifting standard established here not only muddles our Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, but threatens to strip the home of its sanctity. Indeed, I fear that this case may present the first of many unconstitutional entries into homes that are no longer prohibited by clearly established law.")

Youmans v. Gagnon, 626 F.3d 557, 562, 563, 565, 566 (11th Cir. 2010) ("Following the Supreme Court's decision in Pearson, we are free to consider these elements in either sequence and to decide the case on the basis of either element that is not demonstrated. . . In the present case, it seems best to proceed directly to the question of whether the applicable law was already clearly established when the incident took place. . . Whether or not Defendant's conduct constituted deliberate indifference to a serious medical need in violation of Plaintiff's Fourteenth Amendment rights, . . . the law applicable to these circumstances was not already clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . . [E]valuating the 'objective legal reasonableness' of an officer's acts requires examining whether the right at issue was clearly established in a 'particularized' and 'relevant' way. . .When decisional law is required for prior notice, the law can be clearly established by decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court, Eleventh Circuit, or the highest court of the state where the case arose. . . But in the absence of controlling precedent, cases decided outside this Circuit can buttress our view that the applicable law was not already clearly established. We must not hold police officers to a higher standard of legal knowledge than that displayed by the federal courts in reasonable and reasoned decisions; where 'judges thus disagree on a constitutional question, it is unfair to subject police to money damages for picking the losing side of the controversy.'. . In the present case, that this Court had cited cases of longer delays for similar injuries further confirms for us that an objectively reasonable police officer in Defendant's place would not have known that Defendant's conduct would violate Plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . . We conclude that it is not–and most important, was not in June 2007– clear from the preexisting law that all objectively reasonable policemen would have known that a four-hour delay for booking and interviewing a person with injuries of the kind asserted here is a constitutional violation.")

Muhammad v. Sapp, 388 F. App'x 892, 898, 899 (11th Cir. 2010)("Muhammad contends that the defendants violated the Free Exercise Clause of the First Amendment by failing to provide him with his requested Islamic dietary accommodations. We begin our qualified immunity analysis by addressing the second prong–whether the defendants violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . .The FDOC submitted an affidavit establishing that complying with Muhammad's dietary requests was too costly because it would require the operation of special kitchens or food preparation facilities. Under those circumstances and in light of Martinelli, we cannot say that it would be it obvious to all reasonable correctional officials that denying Muhammad's dietary request violated federal law.")

Randall v. Scott, 610 F.3d 701, 713-16 (11th Cir. 2010) ("Supreme Court and circuit precedent is not entirely clear regarding the degree of First Amendment protection for candidacy, however, every case addressing the issue has found at least some constitutional protection. . . . Since Scott's interest in firing Randall was, as alleged in the complaint, for purely personal reasons, the state has no interest in preventing Randall from running for office. While we have not decided the level of scrutiny to be applied, Randall's decision to run for office enjoys some First Amendment protection. Comparing this level of protection to the state's interest–manifestly none–the dismissal of Randall's complaint cannot be affirmed on the failure to state the denial of a First Amendment right. . . . In the case at hand, based on the scrupulous legal analysis required to determine whether Randall had a First Amendment right violated, we conclude that Randall's rights were not clearly established under broad case law. . . . Since we are aware of no precedential case with similar facts to those described here, we conclude that Randall's rights were not clearly established under materially similar facts. . . .We conclude that Scott's alleged unconstitutional act of working to prevent Randall from running for office was not "obviously" clear. It appears to us that any such right to run for office was not heretofore clearly established. Scott therefore enjoys individual qualified immunity protection for her alleged violation of Randall's First Amendment rights. Accordingly we affirm the district court's judgment on the qualified immunity issue regarding Randall's individual capacity claim against Scott.")

Reed v. Allen, No. 09-14493, 2010 WL 1959526, at *3 (11th Cir. May 18, 2010) (not published) ("We need not consider the constitutional issue. . . Even assuming Reed's complaint states a constitutional violation, the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because the right Reed asserts was not clearly established. The state of law at the time the Defendants implemented the wristband policy was that, under Harris, complete segregation of HIV-positive prisoners was not a constitutional violation. The current policy at Limestone is less restrictive because it disposes of segregation, except for residence, and integrates HIV-positive inmates with the rest of the inmates. It was not then 'clearly established' to prison officials that requiring color-coded wristbands violated Reed's constitutional privacy right when full segregation did not. In light of Harris, Reed has not shown that his privacy right was 'clearly established.'")

Glenn v. City of Columbus, Ga., 375 F. App'x 928, 2010 WL 1558721, at *3-*7 (11th Cir. 2010) ("In Pearson, the Supreme Court recently held that we are no longer obliged to conduct the qualified immunity analysis in the sequence set forth in Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001). Accordingly, we may now exercise our discretion to decide which prong of the inquiry to address first. . . In this case, we need not address the first question at all because, even if we were to assume that Zachary's shooting violated the Constitution, the plaintiffs cannot demonstrate that the law was so clearly established as to give the officers fair warning that shooting a beanbag gun at Zachary under these circumstances would have been illegal. We, therefore, begin and end our analysis with an examination of the second prong. . . . To begin with, there is no case in either the United States Supreme Court, the Supreme Court of Georgia, or in the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit that comes close to identifying the illegality of the officers' use of force in these factual circumstances. First, there is no case involving beanbag munitions in any of the relevant courts. . . . Nor is there any roughly analogous case law that would suffice to put the officers on notice of the illegality of their conduct in these 'tense, uncertain' circumstances. On April 4, 2005, there were no cases in the relevant jurisdictions on the use of less than deadly force (here a beanbag munition) to subdue a suspect who had threatened to shoot at officers who were in front of his house, spoke about killing children, and threatened suicide. . . . Here, the officers reasonably believed on the basis of the defendant's threats that he was equipped to commit and had contemplated homicide as well as suicide. Beyond that, and perhaps most importantly, the use of a bean bag munition, unlike a firearm, is not characterized as deadly force. The bean bag was classified by the Columbus Police Department as a Level 6, the highest level use of force below deadly force, and was authorized 'when deadly force is not justified, but empty hand control and OC [pepper spray] is not sufficient in effecting an arrest.'. . . Ultimately, this is one of those tragic, mistaken cases in the 'hazy border between permissible and forbidden force.'. . Quite simply, there was no clearly established law at the time that would have put Officer Coats and Sergeants Hudson and Touchberry on notice that the use of a beanbag munition in these circumstances violated the Fourth Amendment.")

Keating v. City of Miami, 598 F.3d 753, 765, 766 (11th Cir. 2010) ("Under the facts alleged in the Protesters' complaint, Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon violated the Protesters' First Amendment rights in their supervisory capacities by directing the subordinate officers to use less-than-lethal weapons to disperse a large crowd of allegedly peaceful demonstrators and by failing to stop the subordinate officers from doing the same. Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon argue that their conduct in violation of the First Amendment was not clearly established. . . . Here, the Protesters had a clearly established right to assemble, protest, and demonstrate peacefully, and they sufficiently allege that they engaged in a peaceful demonstration on public property. . . . Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon violated clearly established law when, in their supervisory capacities, they directed their subordinate officers to use less-than-lethal weapons to disperse a crowd at a large public demonstration and consequently failed to stop such conduct. The constitutional violation was clearly established because a broader, clearly established principle, that peaceful demonstrators have a First Amendment right to engage in expressive activities, should control the novel facts in this situation. . . Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon, in directing their subordinates to use less-than-lethal weapons to disperse a crowd of peaceful demonstrators, were aware that their orders to their subordinate officers would violate the Protesters' First Amendment rights. Additionally, Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon were aware that their failure to stop the use of less-than-lethal weapons to disperse a crowd of peaceful demonstrators would violate the Protesters' First Amendment rights. The direction of unlawful conduct and failure to stop such unlawful conduct in their supervisory capacities caused the violation of the Protesters' clearly established constitutional rights because it should have been obvious to Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon that their conduct would violate the Protesters' First Amendment rights. Therefore, Timoney, Fernandez, and Cannon are not entitled to qualified immunity as to the Protesters' First Amendment claims for directing unlawful actions and failing to stop unlawful actions under a theory of supervisory liability.").

Corey Airport Services, Inc. v. Decosta, 587 F.3d 1280, 1286, 1287 (11th Cir. 2009) ("The Supreme Court recently changed course . . . and withdrew the requirement of adherence to the Saucier protocol. . . . Because we conclude examination of the clearly established law question will 'best facilitate the fair and efficient disposition' of this case, we consider only this prong of the qualified immunity analysis. We do not reach the question whether Corey has presented sufficient evidence to show a constitutional violation. Corey claims to be the victim of political discrimination. It presents evidence purporting to show that the individual Defendants conspired to apply facially neutral procurement laws and policies to favor political-insider Clear Channel to the detriment of and with the intent to discriminate against Corey, a political-outsider. To support its claim that insider-outsider discrimination violates a clearly established constitutional right, Corey relies on three cases: Snowden v. Hughes, 321 U.S. 1, 64 S.Ct. 397 (1944); Strickland v. Alderman, 74 F.3d 260 (11th Cir.1996); and E & T Realty v. Strickland, 830 F.2d 1107 (11th Cir.1987). These cases all note the general proposition that the Equal Protection Clause may be violated by an unequal application of a facially neutral statute. . . . Because the circumstances of this case differ from the circumstances of the cited cases and because the courts in the cited cases did not hold that the defendants violated the Constitution, we cannot conclude that these decisions made it clear that the conduct at issue here violated the Constitution. Nor are we aware of any other relevant cases decided prior to 2002 finding a violation of a constitutional right based on facts similar to those in this case. Therefore, to hold that Defendants violated Corey's clearly established constitutional rights, we must conclude that a court's recitation of the highly general principle–that unequal application of facially neutral law with the intent to discriminate may violate the equal protection clause–in and of itself, offered the defendants 'fair warning that their [treatment of Corey] was unconstitutional.'. . Our precedents cannot support this conclusion. For general principles to clearly establish the law, the case must be an obvious one. . . Because this is not such a case, the Defendants did not violate a clearly established constitutional right and are therefore entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Corey's claims of insider-outsider political discrimination present not only novel factual circumstances, but also a novel question of law. Corey cites no precedent holding that insider-outsider political discrimination violates the Constitution. Corey does not point to a single decision concerning political discrimination, let alone one that could control, 'with obvious clarity,' these factual circumstances and offer the defendants 'fair warning,' that is, made it clear, that their acts violated the Constitution.").

Poulakis v. Rogers, No. 08-15425, 2009 WL 2447356, at *3-*5 (11th Cir. Aug. 10, 2009) (not published) ("Under Pearson, the federal courts are no longer obliged to conduct this qualified immunity analysis in the order articulated by Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001); rather, we are now 'permitted to exercise [our] sound discretion' to decide which prong of this inquiry to address first. . . On the facts of this case, we begin and end our analysis with the second question–whether the unconstitutionality of the officers' actions was clearly established at the time of the incident. We hold that it was not. . . . In wrongful arrest cases, we have frequently framed the 'clearly established' prong as an 'arguable probable cause' inquiry. In other words, we have said that when an officer violates the Constitution because he lacked probable cause to make an arrest, the officer's conduct may still be insulated under the second prong of qualified immunity if he had 'arguable probable cause' to make the arrest. . . . In the instant case, no decision from the United States Supreme Court, this Court, or the Florida Supreme Court has clearly established that a firearm found in a center console of a vehicle is 'securely encased' for the purposes of Florida's penal code, Fla. Stat. ' 790.25(5). . . The question then boils down to whether the statutory text itself is so clear and compelling in permitting Poulakis to maintain a concealed firearm in the closed center console of his automobile that no reasonable officer could have thought there was probable cause to effect an arrest under these circumstances.").

Poulakis v. Rogers, No. 08-15425, 2009 WL 2447356, at *11, *13, *16, *17 (11th Cir. Aug. 10, 2009) (not published) (Quist, District Judge, dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent from the Court's opinion. I agree with the district court that Officer Rogers and Sgt. Stender lacked arguable probable cause to arrest Poulakis for violating Florida's concealed weapons law. I would reverse, however, because in my judgment the district court erred in concluding that advice of counsel could transform a patently unreasonable arrest into a reasonable one. My principal disagreement with the majority's analysis is that it treats arguable probable cause as part of the clearly established prong of the qualified immunity analysis, when both Eleventh Circuit precedent and reason show that whether a federal constitutional right was clearly established is distinct from whether a police officer was objectively reasonable in making an arrest. Because, in my judgment, arguable probable cause is properly considered under the first step of the qualified immunity analysis, or at least separately from whether the law was clearly established, we may consider state intermediate appellate decisions construing the pertinent state statute. I also believe that there is no ambiguity in the statutory definition of 'securely encased.'. . . When a state law is at issue within the larger context of arguable probable cause in a Fourth Amendment claim, it makes good sense for a federal court to consider what all courts of that state have to say about that law, just as the police officers, prosecutors, and judges of that state must do. . . . Because I believe that our precedent reveals that arguable probable cause is part of the first, rather than the second, prong of the qualified immunity analysis, I see no principled basis for ignoring pertinent Florida appellate decisions. . . .Even accepting the majority's argument that arguable probable cause is determined as part of the clearly established inquiry, I would reach the same conclusion based solely upon the plain language of the statute; no reasonable interpretation of the 'securely encased' exception supports Defendants' arrest of Poulakis. . . . That is, a closed center console of a vehicle is plainly a 'container which requires a lid or cover to be opened for access.'. . . My larger concern is that this Court's decision sends a signal to police officers that they are free to ignore the law of the intermediate state appellate courts by which they are otherwise bound, and an unambiguous statute, without concern for violating an individual's federal constitutional rights. Therefore, I would reverse on qualified immunity and remand for consideration of the other defenses Defendants raised in their summary judgment motion.").

Presley v. City of Blackshear, No. 09-10501, 2009 WL 2413061, at *2, *3 (11th Cir. Aug. 7, 2009) ("Because Presley has completely failed to demonstrate that the right she alleges was violated was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct, we affirm the district court's grant of summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity and need not decide whether there was a constitutional violation.. . . Presley cites no particularized case law that establishes that a reasonable police offer would have concluded that Antonio's rights were violated by Officer Evans. Additionally, Presley cites no particularized case law that establishes a reasonable paramedic would have concluded Antonio's rights were violated by Farrior. . .None of the cases Presley cites . . . even address a pre-trial detainee's right to emergency medical care, and thus none of the cases clearly establish the constitutional right at issue in this case.").

Lewis v. City of West Palm Beach, Fla., 561 F.3d 1288, 1290-92 (11th Cir. 2009) ("The exact cause of death is unclear. At the district court level, the defendants relied on the testimony of Dr. Michael Bell, the county medical examiner who performed the autopsy of Lewis. Dr. Bell concluded that the cause of death was 'sudden respiratory arrest following physical struggling restraint due to cocaine-induced excited delirium.' Ms. Lewis offered the expert testimony of Dr. Michael Baden, who testified that the cause of death was asphyxia caused by neck compression. . . . . The Supreme Court recently clarified the Saucier two-step process explaining that the order of the inquiry is fluid, providing the Court with the flexibility to focus on the determinative question. [citing Pearson v. Callahan] The Supreme Court recognized that discussion of a constitutional violation may become unnecessary for qualified immunity purposes when the right was not clearly established. . .It is therefore not mandated that the Court examine the potential constitutional violation under Saucier step one prior to analyzing whether the right was clearly established under step two. Such analytical flexibility is certainly applicable here. Even if the officers' actions violated Lewis's Fourth Amendment rights, the appellant did not demonstrate that the officers' conduct was an intrusion on a clearly established right. A right may be clearly established for qualified immunity purposes in one of three ways: (1) case law with indistinguishable facts clearly establishing the constitutional right . . . ; (2) a broad statement of principle within the Constitution, statute, or case law that clearly establishes a constitutional right. . . or (3) conduct so egregious that a constitutional right was clearly violated, even in the total absence of case law. . . Here, case law does not provide the necessary precedent, either specifically or through broad principles, to clearly establish the right. Thus, only if the officers' conduct was so egregious and unacceptable so as to have blatantly violated the Constitution would qualified immunity be unavailable to them. However, to come within this narrow exclusion, 'plaintiff must show that the official's conduct was so far beyond the hazy border between excessive and acceptable force that the official had to know he was violating the Constitution even without case law on point.'. .This standard is met when every reasonable officer would conclude that the excessive force used was plainly unlawful. . . Appellant argues that because the officers further restrained Lewis with the hobble after the need for any use of force had passed and tightened it to form a hogtie, the officers' conduct rose to this level of egregiousness. This is not the case. Even though most of the officers in this case testified that Lewis was not a danger to them and was merely resisting arrest, he was, as the district court described, 'an agitated and uncooperative man with only a tenuous grasp on reality.' Because of his refusal to sit upright and his inability to remain calm, Lewis remained a safety risk to himself and to others. As the district court observed, this was precisely the type of situation where the decisions of the officers confronted with 'circumstances that are tense, uncertain, and rapidly evolving' should not be second-guessed. . . Unlike many of the cases cited by plaintiff, Lewis did not remain compliantly restrained. . . Even though he was not forcefully attacking the officers, Lewis continued to struggle. The application of the hobble may not have been entirely necessary; however, the officers' attempts to restrain Lewis were not so violent and harsh to be considered an egregious violation of a constitutional right, and they are not an obstacle to the application of qualified immunity. Despite the unfortunate result that night, qualified immunity insulates the officers from liability for Lewis's death.").

Fennell v. Gilstrap, 559 F.3d 1212, 1216, 1217 & n.6 (11th Cir. 2009) ("The qualified immunity inquiry usually involves two prongs. First, a plaintiff must show that a constitutional or statutory right has been violated. Second, a plaintiff must show that the right violated was clearly established. . . Although the Supreme Court recently held that lower courts are no longer required to address these prongs in order, it recognized that it is 'often beneficial' to do so. . . Pearson, however, has no application in a Fourteenth Amendment excessive-force claim because the qualified immunity analysis involves only the first prong. . . .We agree with Fennell, therefore, that the district court erred in granting summary judgment on the ground that Gilstrap's use of excessive force was not a violation of clearly established law after holding that there was evidence of a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment through the use of excessive force. . . . Nonetheless, the district court's grant of summary judgment is due to be affirmed because, as Gilstrap argues, Fennell has failed to show that Gilstrap's use of force constituted excessive force violating the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . [O]ur precedent permits the use of force even when a detainee is not physically resisting. . . . The undisputed evidence is that Fennell had grabbed Huskey's arm, and Fennell did not let go of Huskey's arm despite being punched by other officers. Gilstrap was in the room for 15 seconds, during which time six officers were unable to secure and handcuff Fennell. Gilstrap's decision to kick Fennell in the arm was not a malicious and sadistic escalation of force, even if the kick accidentally landed on Fennell's face. Accordingly, the relationship between the need for force created by Fennell's conduct and the force Gilstrap decided to use favors a conclusion that the force in this case was not malicious and sadistic, but rather 'a good faith effort to maintain or restore discipline in a difficult situation.'. . . The undisputed evidence was that Gilstrap intended to kick Fennell in the arm, and not the face. . .No evidence in the record supports a contrary inference. Furthermore, Gilstrap kicked Fennell only once, and did not kick him again after the first kick landed on Fennell's face. . . .In this case, considering all the factors, the undisputed evidence does not show that Gilstrap kicked Fennell maliciously and sadistically. Fennell insists that the kick was unnecessary, that Huskey was never in danger, and that Fennell had stopped struggling. But, Fennell did not testify to this effect, and the statement of every officer in the room during the struggle suggests otherwise. . . . In the absence of evidence that Gilstrap acted maliciously and sadistically, his use of force does not shock the conscience, and thus did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment. Fennell has therefore failed to show any constitutional violation. Gilstrap is entitled to qualified immunity, and summary judgment in his favor was appropriate.")

McCullough v. Antolini, 559 F.3d 1201, 1205-08 (11th Cir. 2009) ("[U]nder Pearson, the federal courts are no longer required to conduct this qualified immunity analysis in the order articulated by Saucier. . . In this case, we begin and end our analysis with whether the law enforcement officers violated McCullough's Fourth Amendment rights. We hold that they did not. . . . We have had occasion to review many excessive force claims against officers in the context of qualified immunity determinations where the decedent was driving an automobile at the time deadly force was used. In some of the cases, we have found that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity. In others, we have awarded qualified immunity. We have, however, consistently upheld an officer's use of force and granted qualified immunity in cases where the decedent used or threatened to use his car as a weapon to endanger officers or civilians immediately preceding the officer's use of deadly force. . . . In short, the sheriff's deputies used deadly force in a split-second situation where a suspect late at night refused to pull over, engaged in a high-speed chase, and then, after pulling over, repeatedly refused to show his hands or respond to officers, revved his engine, and then drove his truck toward the deputy standing nearby in a parking lot. . . . Simply put, the force used against McCullough was not excessive under the Fourth Amendment and the officers were entitled to qualified immunity. Because we can discern no constitutional violation, we need not address whether the constitutional right at issue had been clearly established when the incident arose.")

Amnesty Intern., USA v. Battle, 559 F.3d 1170, 1181, 1182, 1184, 1185 (11th Cir. 2009) ("Although this two-step inquiry is no longer mandatory, we think it remains appropriate in this case. . . . The alleged violations of constitutional rights occurred when Amnesty was prevented from (1) distributing literature to people attending the various protests in the area, and (2) conducting a successful demonstration with an audience and media coverage. . . . Supreme Court caselaw makes clear that the First Amendment right to distribute pamphlets was clearly established prior to November 2003. . . Thus, at this stage in litigation, Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity on Amnesty's claim that its right to distribute leaflets was violated. It is a closer question whether Amnesty's right to have an audience and be heard at its demonstration was clearly established. All of the caselaw cited above, with the exception of Citizens for Peace in Space, is good authority that predates the November 20, 2003 incident. . . None of these cases, however, are on all fours with the instant case, and do not clearly elucidate the fact-specific rule that police may not create a police cordon that makes a protest rally totally ineffective. Prior cases clearly establishing the constitutional violation, however, need not be 'materially similar' to the present circumstances so long as the right is 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . There need not, however, be a prior case wherein 'the very action in question has previously been held unlawful.'. . Here, Defendants had fair warning that Amnesty had a clearly established right to assemble, to protest, and to be heard while doing so.").

Case v. Eslinger, 555 F.3d 1317, 1326, 1327 (11th Cir. 2009) ("Although no longer mandatory, the two-part inquiry of Saucier provides the 'better approach to resolving' this appeal. . . Bypassing the first inquiry in our resolution of whether Officer Davis was entitled to summary judgment would not conserve judicial resources because we must still consider the potential liability of Sheriff Eslinger and the City, which hinges on whether Case's rights were violated by Officer Davis. . . .Case failed to present evidence of a constitutional violation because the record, viewed in the light most favorable to him, establishes that Officer Davis had probable cause to arrest Case and seize his property.").

III. HEIGHTENED PLEADING REQUIREMENT

A. The Leatherman Decision

Although the majority in Siegert disposed of the case on grounds that the plaintiff stated no claim for relief, four Justices who did confront the question, approved of the "heightened pleading standard" where the state of mind of the defendant is an essential component of the underlying constitutional claim, but rejected the District of Columbia Circuit's "direct evidence" requirement, instead requiring nonconclusory allegations of subjective motivation supported by either direct or circumstantial evidence. If this threshold is satisfied, then limited discovery may be allowed.

Plaintiffs attempting to impose Monell liability upon a governmental unit had been required, in some circuits, to plead with particularity the existence of an official policy or custom which could be causally linked to the claimed underlying violation. See, e.g., Strauss v. City of Chicago, 760 F.2d 765 (7th Cir. 1985).

In Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 113 S. Ct. 1160 (1993), the Supreme Court unanimously rejected the "heightened pleading standard" in cases alleging municipal liability. The Fifth Circuit had upheld the dismissal of a complaint against a governmental entity for failure to plead with the requisite specificity. "While plaintiffs' complaint sets forth the facts concerning the police misconduct in great detail, it fails to state any facts with respect to the adequacy (or inadequacy) of the police training." 954 F.2d 1054, 1058 (5th Cir. 1992).

While leaving open the question of "whether our qualified immunity jurisprudence would require a heightened pleading in cases involving individual government officials," the Supreme Court refused to equate a municipality's freedom from respondeat superior liability with immunity from suit. 113 S. Ct. at 1162.

Finding it "impossible to square the 'heightened pleading requirement' . . . with the liberal system of 'notice pleading' set up by the Federal Rules[,]" the Court suggested that Federal Rules 8 and 9(b) would have to be rewritten to incorporate such a "heightened pleading standard." The Court concluded that "[i]n the absence of such an amendment, federal courts and litigants must rely on summary judgment and control of discovery to weed out unmeritorious claims sooner rather than later." Id. at 1163.

B. Crawford-El v. Britton

In Crawford-El v. Britton, 118 S. Ct. 1584 (1998), the Court addressed the "broad question [of] whether the courts of appeals may craft special procedural rules" for cases in which a plaintiff's substantive constitutional claim requires proof of improper motive and "the more specific question [of] whether, at least in cases brought by prisoners, the plaintiff must adduce clear and convincing evidence of improper motive in order to defeat a motion for summary judgment." Id. at 1587. In striking down the D.C. Circuit's "clear and convincing" burden of proof requirement in such cases, a five-member majority of the Court, in an opinion written by Justice Stevens, clarified that the Court's holding in Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 731 (1982), that "bare allegations of malice" cannot overcome the qualified immunity defense, "did not implicate the elements of the plaintiff's initial burden of proving a constitutional violation." 118 S. Ct. at 1592. The Court noted that "although evidence of improper motive is irrelevant on the issue of qualified immunity, it may be an essential component of the plaintiff's affirmative case. Our holding in Harlow, which related only to the scope of an affirmative defense, provides no support for making any change in the nature of the plaintiff's burden of proving a constitutional violation." Id. The Court explained that the subjective component of the qualified immunity defense that was jettisoned in Harlow "permitted an open-ended inquiry into subjective motivation [with the] primary focus . . . on any possible animus directed at the plaintiff." Id. at 1594. Such an open-ended inquiry precluded summary judgment in many cases where officials had not violated clearly established constitutional rights. "When intent is an element of a constitutional violation, however, the primary focus is not on any possible animus directed at the plaintiff; rather, it is more specific, such as an intent to disadvantage all members of a class that includes the plaintiff . . . or to deter public comment on a specific issue of public importance." Id.

Sensitive to the concerns about subjecting public officials to discovery and trial in cases involving insubstantial claims, the Court noted that existing substantive law "already prevents this more narrow element of unconstitutional motive from automatically carrying a plaintiff to trial[,]" and "various procedural mechanisms already enable trial judges to weed out baseless claims that feature a subjective element . . . ." Id.

First, under the substantive law on which plaintiff relies, there may be some doubt as to the whether the defendant's conduct was unlawful. The Court gave as an example the question of whether the plaintiff's speech was on a matter of public concern. Second, where plaintiff must establish both motive and causation, a defendant may still prevail at summary judgment by, for example, showing that defendant would have made the same decision in the absence of the protected conduct. Id.

The Court noted two procedural devices available to trial judges that could be used prior to any discovery. First, the district court may order a reply under Fed. R. Civ. P. 7(a), or grant a defendant's motion for a more definite statement under Rule 12(e). As the Court noted, this option of ordering the plaintiff to come forward with "specific, nonconclusory factual allegations" of improper motive exists whether or not the defendant raises the qualified immunity defense. 118 S. Ct. at 1596-97. Second, where the defendant does raise qualified immunity, the district court should resolve the threshold question before discovery.

> To do so, the court must determine whether, assuming the truth of the plaintiff's allegations, the official's conduct violated clearly established law. [footnote omitted] Because the former option of demanding more specific allegations of intent places no burden on the defendant-official, the district judge may choose that alternative before resolving the immunity question, which sometimes requires complicated analysis of legal issues. If the plaintiff's action survives these initial hurdles and is otherwise viable, the plaintiff ordinarily will be entitled to some discovery. Rule 26 vests the trial judge with broad discretion to tailor discovery narrowly and to dictate the sequence of discovery.

Id. at 1597.

The majority opinion concluded that "[n]either the text of § 1983 or any other federal statute, nor the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, provides any support for imposing the clear and convincing burden of proof on plaintiffs either at the summary judgment stage or in the trial itself." Id. at 1595. Instead of the categorical rule established by the Court of Appeals, the Court endorsed broad discretion on the part of trial judges in the management of the factfinding process. Id. at 1598.

Chief Justice Rehnquist dissented, and formulated the following test for motive-based constitutional claims:

> [W]hen a plaintiff alleges that an official's action was taken with an unconstitutional or otherwise unlawful motive, the defendant will be entitled to immunity and immediate dismissal of the suit if he can offer a lawful reason for his > action and the plaintiff cannot establish, through objective evidence, that the offered reason is actually a pretext.

Id. at 1600 (Rehnquist, C.J., joined by O'Connor, J., dissenting).

Justice Scalia, joined by Justice Thomas, dissented and proposed the adoption of a test that would impose "a more severe restriction upon 'intent-based' constitutional torts." Id. at 1604. (Scalia, J., joined by Thomas, J., dissenting). Under Justice Scalia's proposed test, > [O]nce the trial court finds that the asserted grounds for the official action were objectively valid (e.g., the person fired for alleged incompetence was indeed incompetent), it would not admit any proof that something other than those reasonable grounds was the genuine motive (e.g., the incompetent person fired was a Republican).

C. Swierkiewicz v. Sorema / Hill v. McDonough

Swierkiewicz v. Sorema, 122 S. Ct. 992, 998 (2002) ("Rule 8(a)'s simplified pleading standard applies to all civil actions, with limited exceptions. Rule 9(b), for example, provides for greater particularity in all averments of fraud or mistake. [footnote omitted] This Court, however, has declined to extend such exceptions to other contexts. . . . Just as Rule 9(b) makes no mention of municipal liability under Rev. Stat. '1979, 42 U.S.C. § 1983 (1994 ed., Supp. V), neither does it refer to employment discrimination. Thus, complaints in these cases, as in most others, must satisfy only the simple requirements of Rule 8(a).").

See also Hill v. McDonough, 126 S. Ct. 2096, 2103 (2006) ("Specific pleading requirements are mandated by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and not, as a general rule, through case-by-case determinations of the federal courts.").

D. Jones v. Bock

Jones v. Bock, 127 S. Ct. 910, 918, 919, 921, 926 (2007) ("There is no question that exhaustion is mandatory under the PLRA and that unexhausted claims cannot be brought in court. . . What is less clear is whether it falls to the prisoner to plead and demonstrate exhaustion in the complaint, or to the defendant to raise lack of exhaustion as an affirmative defense. The minority rule, adopted by the Sixth Circuit, places the burden of pleading exhaustion in a case covered by the PLRA on the prisoner; most courts view failure to exhaust as an affirmative defense. . . We think petitioners, and the majority of courts to consider the question, have the better of the argument. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a) requires simply a 'short and plain statement of the claim' in a complaint, while Rule 8(c) identifies a nonexhaustive list of affirmative defenses that must be pleaded in response. The PLRA itself is not a source of a prisoner's claim; claims covered by the PLRA are typically brought under 42 U. S. C. § 1983, which does not require exhaustion at all, see Patsy v. Board of Regents of Fla., 457 U. S. 496, 516 (1982). Petitioners assert that courts typically regard exhaustion as an affirmative defense in other contexts. . . and respondents do not seriously dispute the general proposition. . . The PLRA dealt extensively with the subject of exhaustion, see 42 U. S. C. ''1997e(a), (c)(2), but is silent on the issue whether exhaustion must be pleaded by the plaintiff or is an affirmative defense. This is strong evidence that the usual practice should be followed, and the usual practice under the Federal Rules is to regard exhaustion as an affirmative defense. In a series of recent cases, we have explained that courts should generally not depart from the usual practice under the Federal Rules on the basis of perceived policy concerns. [citing Leatherman, Swierkiewicz and Hill] . . . . We think that the PLRA's screening requirement does not–explicitly or implicitly–justify deviating from the usual procedural practice beyond the departures specified by the PLRA itself . . . . We conclude that failure to exhaust is an affirmative defense under the PLRA, and that inmates are not required to specially plead or demonstrate exhaustion in their complaints. We understand the reasons behind the decisions of some lower courts to impose a pleading requirement on plaintiffs in this context, but that effort cannot fairly be viewed as an interpretation of the PLRA. 'Whatever temptations the statesmanship of policy-making might wisely suggest,' the judge's job is to construe the statute–not to make it better.". . . We are not insensitive to the challenges faced by the lower federal courts in managing their dockets and attempting to separate, when it comes to prisoner suits, not so much wheat from chaff as needles from haystacks. We once again reiterate, however–as we did unanimously in Leatherman, Swierkiewicz, and Hill–that adopting different and more onerous pleading rules to deal with particular categories of cases should be done through established rulemaking procedures, and not on a case-by-case basis by the courts.")

Jones v. Bock, 127 S. Ct. 910, 922, 923 (2007) ("The PLRA requires exhaustion of 'such administrative remedies as are available,' 42 U. S. C. '1997e(a), but nothing in the statute imposes a 'name all defendants' requirement along the lines of the Sixth Circuit's judicially created rule. . . . . Compliance with prison grievance procedures, therefore, is all that is required by the PLRA to 'properly exhaust.' The level of detail necessary in a grievance to comply with the grievance procedures will vary from system to system and claim to claim, but it is the prison's requirements, and not the PLRA, that define the boundaries of proper exhaustion. As the MDOC's procedures make no mention of naming particular officials, the Sixth Circuit's rule imposing such a prerequisite to proper exhaustion is unwarranted.")

Jones v. Bock, 127 S. Ct. 910, 924 (2007) ("As a general matter, if a complaint contains both good and bad claims, the court proceeds with the good and leaves the bad. '[O]nly the bad claims are dismissed; the complaint as a whole is not. If Congress meant to depart from this norm, we would expect some indication of that, and we find none.'")

See also Albino v. Baca, 747 F.3d 1162, 1166 (9th Cir. 2014) (en banc) ("First, although it may be more a matter of a change of nomenclature than of practical operation, we overrule Wyatt v.

Terhune, 315 F.3d 1108, 1119 (9th Cir.2003), in which we held that a failure to exhaust under § 1997e(a) should be raised by a defendant as an 'unenumerated Rule 12(b) motion.' We conclude that a failure to exhaust is more appropriately handled under the framework of the existing rules than under an 'unenumerated' (that is, non-existent) rule. Failure to exhaust under the PLRA is 'an affirmative defense the defendant must plead and prove.' Jones v.. Bock, 549 U.S. 199, 204, 216 (2007). In the rare event that a failure to exhaust is clear on the face of the complaint, a defendant may move for dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6). Otherwise, defendants must produce evidence proving failure to exhaust in order to carry their burden. If undisputed evidence viewed in the light most favorable to the prisoner shows a failure to exhaust, a defendant is entitled to summary judgment under Rule 56. If material facts are disputed, summary judgment should be denied, and the district judge rather than a jury should determine the facts. Second, we hold that Albino has satisfied the exhaustion requirement of § 1997e(a). Defendants have failed to prove that administrative remedies were available at the jail where Albino was confined. Because no administrative remedies were available, he is excused from any obligation to exhaust under § 1997e(a). We therefore direct the district court to grant summary judgment to Albino on the issue of exhaustion.")

E. Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly

Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1968, 1969, 1974 (2007) ("Justice Black's opinion for the Court in Conley v. Gibson spoke not only of the need for fair notice of the grounds for entitlement to relief but of 'the accepted rule that a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief.'. . This 'no set of facts' language can be read in isolation as saying that any statement revealing the theory of the claim will suffice unless its factual impossibility may be shown from the face of the pleadings; and the Court of Appeals appears to have read Conley in some such way when formulating its understanding of the proper pleading standard . . . . On such a focused and literal reading of Conley's 'no set of facts,' a wholly conclusory statement of claim would survive a motion to dismiss whenever the pleadings left open the possibility that a plaintiff might later establish some 'set of [undisclosed] facts' to support recovery. So here, the Court of Appeals specifically found the prospect of unearthing direct evidence of conspiracy sufficient to preclude dismissal, even though the complaint does not set forth a single fact in a context that suggests an agreement. . . . [A] good many judges and commentators have balked at taking the literal terms of the Conley passage as a pleading standard. [citing cases and commentators] We could go on, but there is no need to pile up further citations to show that Conley's 'no set of facts' language has been questioned, criticized, and explained away long enough. . . . [A]fter puzzling the profession for 50 years, this famous observation has earned its retirement. The phrase is best forgotten as an incomplete, negative gloss on an accepted pleading standard: once a claim has been stated adequately, it may be supported by showing any set of facts consistent with the allegations in the complaint. . . .Conley, then, described the breadth of opportunity to prove what an adequate complaint claims, not the minimum standard of adequate pleading to govern a complaint's survival. . . . [W]e do not require heightened fact pleading of specifics, but only enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face. Because the plaintiffs here have not nudged their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible, their complaint must be dismissed.").

Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S. Ct. 1955, 1978, 1988, 1989 (2007) (Stevens, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., except as to Part IV, dissenting) ("If Conley's 'no set of facts' language is to be interred, let it not be without a eulogy. . . . Petitioners have not requested that the Conley formulation be retired, nor have any of the six amici who filed briefs in support of petitioners. I would not rewrite the Nation's civil procedure textbooks and call into doubt the pleading rules of most of its States without far more informed deliberation as to the costs of doing so. Congress has established a process–a rulemaking process–for revisions of that order. . . . Whether the Court's actions will benefit only defendants in antitrust treble-damages cases, or whether its test for the sufficiency of a complaint will inure to the benefit of all civil defendants, is a question that the future will answer. But that the Court has announced a significant new rule that does not even purport to respond to any congressional command is glaringly obvious.")

F. Erickson v. Pardus

Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 2200 (2007) ("It was error for the Court of Appeals to conclude that the allegations in question, concerning harm caused petitioner by the termination of his medication, were too conclusory to establish for pleading purposes that petitioner had suffered 'a cognizable independent harm' as a result of his removal from the hepatitis C treatment program. . . . The complaint stated that Dr. Bloor's decision to remove petitioner from his prescribed hepatitis C medication was 'endangering [his] life.' . .It alleged this medication was withheld 'shortly after' petitioner had commenced a treatment program that would take one year, that he was 'still in need of treatment for this disease,' and that the prison officials were in the meantime refusing to provide treatment. . . This alone was enough to satisfy Rule 8(a)(2). Petitioner, in addition, bolstered his claim by making more specific allegations in documents attached to the complaint and in later filings. The Court of Appeals' departure from the liberal pleading standards set forth by Rule 8(a)(2) is even more pronounced in this particular case because petitioner has been proceeding, from the litigation's outset, without counsel.")

G. Ashcroft v. Iqbal

Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1942, 1943, 1949-54 (2009) ("This case . . . turns on a narrower question: Did respondent, as the plaintiff in the District Court, plead factual matter that, if taken as true, states a claim that petitioners deprived him of his clearly established constitutional rights. We hold respondent's pleadings are insufficient. . . . Two working principles underlie our decision in Twombly. First, the tenet that a court must accept as true all of the allegations contained in a complaint is inapplicable to legal conclusions. Threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice. . . . Rule 8 marks a notable and generous departure from the hyper-technical, code-pleading regime of a prior era, but it does not unlock the doors of discovery for a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions. Second, only a complaint that states a plausible claim for relief survives a motion to dismiss. . . Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will, as the Court of Appeals observed, be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense. . . But where the well-pleaded facts do not permit the court to infer more than the mere possibility of misconduct, the complaint has alleged-but it has not 'show[n]'-'that the pleader is entitled to relief.'. . In keeping with these principles a court considering a motion to dismiss can choose to begin by identifying pleadings that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth. While legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint, they must be supported by factual allegations. When there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief. . . . We begin our analysis by identifying the allegations in the complaint that are not entitled to the assumption of truth. Respondent pleads that petitioners 'knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject [him]' to harsh conditions of confinement 'as a matter of policy, solely on account of [his] religion, race, and/or national origin and for no legitimate penological interest.'. .The complaint alleges that Ashcroft was the 'principal architect' of this invidious policy. . .and that Mueller was 'instrumental' in adopting and executing it. . . .These bare assertions, much like the pleading of conspiracy in Twombly, amount to nothing more than a 'formulaic recitation of the elements' of a constitutional discrimination claim. . .namely, that petitioners adopted a policy ' Abecause of," not merely Ain spite of," its adverse effects upon an identifiable group.'. .As such, the allegations are conclusory and not entitled to be assumed true. . . It is important to recall that respondent's complaint challenges neither the constitutionality of his arrest nor his initial detention in the MDC. Respondent's constitutional claims against petitioners rest solely on their ostensible Apolicy of holding post-September-11th detainees" in the ADMAX SHU once they were categorized as Aof high interest.". . To prevail on that theory, the complaint must contain facts plausibly showing that petitioners purposefully adopted a policy of classifying post-September-11 detainees as 'of high interest' because of their race, religion, or national origin. This the complaint fails to do. Though respondent alleges that various other defendants, who are not before us, may have labeled him a person of 'of high interest' for impermissible reasons, his only factual allegation against petitioners accuses them of adopting a policy approving 'restrictive conditions of confinement' for post-September-11 detainees until they were ' Acleared" by the FBI.' . . Accepting the truth of that allegation, the complaint does not show, or even intimate, that petitioners purposefully housed detainees in the ADMAX SHU due to their race, religion, or national origin. All it plausibly suggests is that the Nation's top law enforcement officers, in the aftermath of a devastating terrorist attack, sought to keep suspected terrorists in the most secure conditions available until the suspects could be cleared of terrorist activity. Respondent does not argue, nor can he, that such a motive would violate petitioners' constitutional obligations. He would need to allege more by way of factual content to 'nudg[e]' his claim of purposeful discrimination 'across the line from conceivable to plausible.'. . . [R]espondent's complaint does not contain any factual allegation sufficient to plausibly suggest petitioners' discriminatory state of mind. His pleadings thus do not meet the standard necessary to comply with Rule 8. It is important to note, however, that we express no opinion concerning the sufficiency of respondent's complaint against the defendants who are not before us. Respondent's account of his prison ordeal alleges serious official misconduct that we need not address here. Our decision is limited to the determination that respondent's complaint does not entitle him to relief from petitioners. . . . Our decision in Twombly expounded the pleading standard for 'all civil actions'. . .and it applies to antitrust and discrimination suits alike. . . . Because respondent's complaint is deficient under Rule 8, he is not entitled to discovery, cabined or otherwise. . . .It is true that Rule 9(b) requires particularity when pleading 'fraud or mistake,' while allowing '[m]alice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind [to] be alleged generally.' But 'generally' is a relative term. In the context of Rule 9, it is to be compared to the particularity requirement applicable to fraud or mistake. Rule 9 merely excuses a party from pleading discriminatory intent under an elevated pleading standard. It does not give him license to evade the less rigid-though still operative-strictures of Rule 8. . . . And Rule 8 does not empower respondent to plead the bare elements of his cause of action, affix the label 'general allegation,' and expect his complaint to survive a motion to dismiss.")

Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S. Ct. 1937, 1959-61 (Souter, J., joined by Stevens, J., Ginsburg, J., Breyer, J., dissenting) ("The complaint . . . alleges, at a bare minimum, that Ashcroft and Mueller knew of and condoned the discriminatory policy their subordinates carried out. Actually, the complaint goes further in alleging that Ashcroft and Muller affirmatively acted to create the discriminatory detention policy. If these factual allegations are true, Ashcroft and Mueller were, at the very least, aware of the discriminatory policy being implemented and deliberately indifferent to it. Ashcroft and Mueller argue that these allegations fail to satisfy the 'plausibility standard' of Twombly. They contend that Iqbal's claims are implausible because such high-ranking officials 'tend not to be personally involved in the specific actions of lower-level officers down the bureaucratic chain of command.'. . But this response bespeaks a fundamental misunderstanding of the enquiry that Twombly demands. Twombly does not require a court at the motion-to-dismiss stage to consider whether the factual allegations are probably true. We made it clear, on the contrary, that a court must take the allegations as true, no matter how skeptical the court may be. . . The sole exception to this rule lies with allegations that are sufficiently fantastic to defy reality as we know it: claims about little green men, or the plaintiff's recent trip to Pluto, or experiences in time travel. That is not what we have here. . . . Iqbal's claim is not that Ashcroft and Mueller 'knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject' him to a discriminatory practice that is left undefined; his allegation is that 'they knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject' him to a particular, discrete, discriminatory policy detailed in the complaint. Iqbal does not say merely that Ashcroft was the architect of some amorphous discrimination, or that Mueller was instrumental in an ill-defined constitutional violation; he alleges that they helped to create the discriminatory policy he has described. Taking the complaint as a whole, it gives Ashcroft and Mueller 'Afair notice of what the Y claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.'"")

U.S. Supreme Court

Johnson v. City of Shelby, Miss., 135 S. Ct. 346, 346-47(2014) (per curiam) ("We summarily reverse. Federal pleading rules call for 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief,' Fed. Rule Civ. Proc. 8(a)(2); they do not countenance dismissal of a complaint for imperfect statement of the legal theory supporting the claim asserted. . . In particular, no heightened pleading rule requires plaintiffs seeking damages for violations of constitutional rights to invoke § 1983 expressly in order to state a claim. See Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 164, 113 S.Ct. 1160, 122 L.Ed.2d 517 (1993) (a federal court may not apply a standard 'more stringent than the usual pleading requirements of Rule 8(a)' in 'civil rights cases alleging municipal liability'); Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N. A., 534 U.S. 506, 512, 122 S.Ct. 992, 152 L.Ed.2d 1 (2002) (imposing a 'heightened pleading standard in employment discrimination cases conflicts with Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a)(2)'). The Fifth Circuit defended its requirement that complaints expressly invoke § 1983 as 'not a mere pleading formality.'. . The requirement serves a notice function, the Fifth Circuit said, because '[c]ertain consequences flow from claims under § 1983, such as the unavailability of respondeat superior liability, which bears on the qualified immunity analysis.'. . This statement displays some confusion in the Fifth Circuit's perception of petitioners' suit. No 'qualified immunity analysis' is implicated here, as petitioners asserted a constitutional claim against the city only, not against any municipal officer. . . Our decisions in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009), are not in point, for they concern the factual allegations a complaint must contain to survive a motion to dismiss. A plaintiff, they instruct, must plead facts sufficient to show that her claim has substantive plausibility. Petitioners' complaint was not deficient in that regard. Petitioners stated simply, concisely, and directly events that, they alleged, entitled them to damages from the city. Having informed the city of the factual basis for their complaint, they were required to do no more to stave off threshold dismissal for want of an adequate statement of their claim. . . For clarification and to ward off further insistence on a punctiliously stated 'theory of the pleadings,' petitioners, on remand, should be accorded an opportunity to add to their complaint a citation to § 1983. . . .For the reasons stated, the petition for certiorari is granted, the judgment of the United States Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit is reversed, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

D.C. CIRCUIT

Tooley v. Napolitano 586 F.3d 1006, 1009 (D.C. Cir. 2009) ("We recognize that in a nation of 300 million people, with millions of government employees, some are bound at any given moment to be acting unwisely, foolishly, counterproductively, mistakenly, maliciously, viciously, even inanely. But the particular combination of sloth, fanaticism, inanity and technical genius alleged here seems to us to move these allegations into the realm of claims 'flimsier than Adoubtful or questionable"–... Aessentially fictitious,"' . . . not realistically distinguishable from allegations of 'little green men' of the sort that Justice Souter recognized in Iqbal as properly dismissed on the pleadings.").

Owens v. Republic of Sudan, 531 F.3d 884, 894, 895 (D.C. Cir. 2008) ("Sudan tries to limit the principle expressed in Swierkiewicz to merits pleadings . That argument is inconsistent with Rule 8, which, as just noted, expressly applies its 'a short and plain statement' requirement to jurisdictional pleadings . . . Indeed, we have held the standard for assessing the sufficiency of jurisdictional pleadings under the FSIA 'is similar to that of Rule 12(b)(6).'. . Thus no heightened pleading requirement applies here. . . . We only require that the complaint contain 'enough factual matter (taken as true)' to suggest that Sudan's material support of al Qaeda was a cause of the embassy bombings. See Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 1965 (2007). In other words, we require 'enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence' of this causal link.").

Aktieselskabet AF 21.November 2001 v. Fame Jeans Inc., 525 F.3d 8, 15-17 (D.C. Cir. 2008) ("[T]he district court interpreted Twombly as establishing a new threshold for complaints: enough facts to 'clarify the grounds' on which each claim rests and 'nudge[ ] their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.'. . Many courts have disagreed about the import of Twombly. [collecting cases in footnote] We conclude that Twombly leaves the long-standing fundamentals of notice pleading intact. . . . Rule 8 requires, not a specific quantity of facts, but simply 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.' . . . Over the years, courts have tended to drift away from this standard by imposing various requirements of particularity. . . The Supreme Court has continually pruned back such requirements, with the admonition that we are not to impose heightened pleading requirements. . . After decades of such consistency, we will not lightly assume the Supreme Court intended to tighten pleading standards. Indeed, the Court has indicated quite clearly that it meant no such thing. Twombly itself reiterated that a complaint 'does not need detailed factual allegations.'. . . In sum, Twombly was concerned with the plausibility of an inference of conspiracy, not with the plausibility of a claim. A court deciding a motion to dismiss must not make any judgment about the probability of the plaintiff's success, for a complaint 'may proceed even if it appears Athat a recovery is very remote and unlikely."'").

Ghawanmeh v. Islamic Saudi Academy, No. 09-631 (JMF), 2009 WL 4456328, at *9, *10 (D.D.C. Nov. 27, 2009) ("In order to state a claim under Title VII, a plaintiff must aver that '(1) she is a member of a protected class; (2) she suffered an adverse employment action; and (3) the unfavorable action gives rise to an inference of discrimination.'. . In her complaint, plaintiff claims that the ISA discriminated against her in violation of Title VII on the basis of her gender (female) and her national origin (Jordanian). . . She argues that she was unfairly denied leave and ultimately dismissed because there was a 'systemic prejudicial and biased culture favoring males and Saudi Arabian nationals at Defendant ISA, which policies, either express or implied, are known or constructively known to Defendant KSA and nonetheless allowed to persist.'. . She also makes the following allegations: Due to Defendant's workplace culture of preferential treatment, other employees were granted unpaid leaves of absence for vacations and other reasons, before and during this period. . . Other similarly situated teachers who also happen to be Saudi Arabian nationals were not so dismissed, and were not otherwise unfairly treated. . . Defendant ISA allows and perhaps encourages a culture of Saudi ethnocentrism at the school, with knowledge (actual or constructive) of Defendants KSA, evinced by the disparate way non-Saudi teachers, especially women, are treated. . . Had Plaintiff been male and/or a Saudi Arabian national, she would not have been fired. . . The problem is that plaintiff does not identify the other similarly situated teachers. The question, therefore, is whether her failure to do so merits dismissal. After Twombly but before Iqbal, the court of appeals for this circuit confronted the argument that Twombly required a plaintiff to specify those facts which entitled him to relief. See Aktieselskabet AF 21 v. Fame Jeans, Inc., 525 F.3d 8 (D.C. Cir.2008). The court rejected the proposition that a complaint needed detailed factual allegations to survive and rejected the argument that Twombly should be read to abrogate the requirement of Rule 8 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure that the complaint need only contain a 'short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.'. . It pointed to a decision by the Supreme Court issued after Twombly, that indicated that 'specific facts were not necessary' if the complaint gave fair notice of the claim. Id. (quoting Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 167 L.Ed.2d 1081 (2007)) (per curiam). Judged by that standard and construed liberally in plaintiff's favor, the allegations give notice to defendant that plaintiff is asserting that she was treated differently from Saudis and men who applied for the leave she was refused, and who were not fired as a result of seeking that leave, as she was. Thus, even though she does not name the persons who are similarly situated to herself, but who were treated differently, plaintiff's complaint survives defendant's motion to dismiss.").

FIRST CIRCUIT

Medina-Velazquez v. Hernandez-Gregorat, 767 F.3d 103, 111-12 (1st Cir. 2014) ("Under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, '[p]ublic officials may be held liable ... for a constitutional violation only if a plaintiff can establish that his or her constitutional injury resulted from the direct acts or omissions of the official, or from indirect conduct that amounts to condonation or tacit authorization.'. . .We recognize that 'precise knowledge of the chain of events leading to the constitutional violation may often be unavailable to a plaintiff' when a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss is filed; therefore, 'we take to heart the Supreme Court's call to "draw on our 'judicial experience and common sense' as we make a contextual judgment about the sufficiency of the pleadings."'. . On its own, the complaint does not specifically connect the appellees to the adverse employment actions. Each appellant, however, does claim that he 'placed in writing his concern' regarding the negative employment actions but that the 'communication went unanswered.' The district court properly requested these letters, which were incorporated by reference into the complaint, and supplemented the allegations with the identity of the recipient defendants. We have recognized that a letter may be used as evidence at trial to show for purposes of § 1983 liability that the named recipient personally knew of the writer's employment situation. . . Whether the addressee actually received the letter is 'a factual question appropriate for jury determination.'. . Hence, in resolving a motion to dismiss, where the burden is merely demonstrating the plausibility of a claim and all reasonable inferences are drawn in the plaintiff's favor, we can infer that the recipients of the letters were aware of their contents.")

Garcia-Catalan v. U.S., 734 F.3d 100, 104, 105 (1st Cir. 2013) ("[T]he appellant's complaint is plainly modeled on Form 11 of the Appendix to the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. . .The complaint disclosed the date, time, and place of the alleged tort, and it delineated both the nature of the dangerous condition at the commissary and the resulting injuries to the appellant. At least two courts of appeals have concluded that the standard announced in Twombly and Iqbal does not undermine the viability of the federal forms as long as there are sufficient facts alleged in the complaint to make the claim plausible. See K–Tech Telecomm., Inc. v. Time Warner Cable, Inc., 714 F.3d 1277, 1283–84 (Fed.Cir.2013); Hamilton v. Palm, 621 F.3d 816, 818 (8th Cir.2010). We share this view. It pays due homage to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 84, which declares that '[t]he forms in the Appendix suffice.' Fed.R.Civ.P. 84. Honoring Rule 84 is, in turn, consistent with the Supreme Court's instruction that the Civil Rules may not be amended by 'judicial interpretation.' . . For another thing, 'some latitude may be appropriate' in applying the plausibility standard in certain types of cases. . . Generally speaking, these are cases in which a material part of the information needed is likely to be within the defendant's control. . . This is such a case: it cannot reasonably be expected that the appellant, without the benefit of discovery, would have any information about either how long the liquid was on the floor or whether any employees of the commissary were aware of the spill. . .We add, moreover, that the plausibility inquiry properly takes into account whether discovery can reasonably be expected to fill any holes in the pleader's case. . . Given what the appellant has set forth in her complaint, it is reasonable to expect that 'modest discovery may provide the missing link' that will allow the appellant to go to trial on her claim. . .We need go no further. . For the reasons elucidated above, we hold that the appellant's complaint contains sufficient factual content to support a plausible claim for negligence against the United States. Consequently, we reverse the judgment of the district court and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Atieh v. Riordan, 727 F.3d 73, 76 (1st Cir. 2013) ("The plausibility standard is a screening mechanism designed to weed out cases that do not warrant either discovery or trial. . . To this end, the plausibility standard asks whether the complaint 'contain[s] sufficient factual matter ... to "state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face."'. . APA review, however, involves neither discovery nor trial. Thus, APA review presents no need for screening. It follows that the plausibility standard has no place in APA review. This makes perfect sense. The focal point of APA review is the existing administrative record. . . Allowing the allegations of a complaint to become the focal point of judicial review introduces an unnecessary and inevitably unproductive step into the process. The relevant inquiry is—and must remain—not whether the facts set forth in a complaint state a plausible claim but, rather, whether the administrative record sufficiently supports the agency's decision. . . This paradigm dictates the outcome of the instant appeal. We hold that the plausibility standard does not apply to a complaint for judicial review of final agency action and that the district court therefore erred in invoking it.")

Evergreen Partnering Group, Inc. v. Pactiv Corp., No. 12–1730, 2013 WL 3063902 (1st Cir. June 19, 2013) ("In assessing these allegations, the district court improperly applied a heightened pleading standard in reviewing Evergreen's complaint, and it improperly occupied a factfinder role when it both chose among plausible alternative theories interpreting defendants' conduct and adopted as true allegations made by defendants in weighing the plausibility of theories put forward by the parties. The court went beyond Twombly's pleading requirements when it found Evergreen's complaint deficient as compared to those in other cases that pled 'highly specific details as to how the alleged conspirators communicated with each other, the individuals who were involved, when the communications took place, the substance of their contents, and the dramatic switch in business practices that followed.' Evergreen, 865 F.Supp.2d at 142. As discussed earlier, Twombly does not require such heightened pleadings for § 1 claims.")

Gianfrancesco v. Town of Wrentham, 712 F.3d 634, 639, 640 (1st Cir. 2013) ("Gianfrancesco's due process claim is of the substantive sort, and alleges executive (rather than legislative) misconduct. . .Thus, he must plausibly allege that the actions taken against him were so egregious as to shock the conscience and that they deprived him of a protected interest in life, liberty, or property. . . He has not done so. Construed in Gianfrancesco's favor, the amended complaint describes a pattern of selective and excessive enforcement of municipal regulations. But it is remarkably vague. The complaint says that Tom's Tavern was subject to 'inapplicable' septic and sprinkler system requirements, but it does not say how or when it was subjected to these requirements, or by whom; it also does not say what makes the requirements excessive. None of these missing facts should be beyond Gianfrancesco's reach. . . In any event, even if Gianfrancesco has established that Tom's Tavern was subjected to unlawful regulation, he has not plausibly alleged that this overreaching was 'a brutal and inhumane abuse of official power,' or 'truly outrageous, uncivilized, and intolerable.'. . The complaint is devoid of allegations actually describing the defendants' conduct, and accusatory adverbs like 'wrongfully,' 'deliberately,' and 'selectively' cannot carry a factually inadequate complaint across the pleading threshold. . . . Gianfrancesco's equal protection claim is similarly deficient. Under the class-of-one rubric, an equal protection plaintiff may press a claim 'that [he] has been intentionally treated differently from others similarly situated and that there is no rational basis for the difference in treatment,' even where he does 'not [show] membership in a class or group. . . But, as we recently explained, a class-of-one plaintiff bears the burden of showing that his comparators are similarly situated in all respects relevant to the challenged government action. . . Gianfrancesco says that he has carried this burden by identifying one similarly situated business (the Anvil Pub), but we do not agree. The complaint makes no effort to establish how or why the Anvil Pub is similarly situated to Tom's Tavern in any relevant way, and does not mention any other putative comparator. It simply says that the regulatory and enforcement measures taken against Tom's Tavern were not also taken against 'similarly situated establishments.' These are 'assertions nominally cast in factual terms but so general and conclusory as to amount merely to an assertion that unspecified facts exist to conform to the legal blueprint.'. . And there is no suggestion that Gianfrancesco lacks the information needed to identify similarly situated businesses. . . In light of these shortcomings, Gianfrancesco has not pled a plausible class-of-one claim.") Rodriguez-Reyes v. Molina-Rodriguez, 711 F.3d 49, 51-57 (1st Cir. 2013) ("The court below ruled, among other things, that the complaint failed to state a claim for relief because it did not assert facts sufficient to establish a prima facie case of political discrimination.The prima facie case is an evidentiary model, not a pleading standard. For this reason, the interaction between the prima facie case and the plausibility standard crafted by the Supreme Court in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009), has created some confusion. We now resolve that confusion and hold that the prima facie case is not the appropriate benchmark for determining whether a complaint has crossed the plausibility threshold. Accordingly, that aspect of the district court's decision must be annulled and the case remanded for further proceedings. . . . [A]n inquiry into plausibility necessitates a two-step pavane. . . First, the court must sift through the averments in the complaint, separating conclusory legal allegations (which may be disregarded) from allegations of fact (which must be credited). . . Second, the court must consider whether the winnowed residue of factual allegations gives rise to a plausible claim to relief. . . .In this case, the district court tested the complaint in a crucible hotter than the plausibility standard demands. It repeatedly faulted the complaint for failing to 'establish a prima facie case of political discrimination.'. . The plaintiffs argue that this laser-like focus on a prima facie case is misplaced at the pleading stage; that requirement, they say, should be reserved for summary judgment and trial. We agree. In Swierkiewicz v. Sorema, 534 U.S. 506 (2002), the Supreme Court negated any need to plead a prima facie case in the discrimination context and emphasized that the prima facie model is an evidentiary, not a pleading, standard. . . .We recognize that these cases were decided before the Supreme Court effected a sea change in the law of federal pleading in Iqbal and Twombly. This gives rise to two questions. First, does the hegemony of the Swierkiewicz/Leatherman/Educadores line of cases continue in a post-Iqbal/Twombly world? Second, what is the role, if any, of the prima facie case in determining plausibility at the pleading stage? We answer the first question in the affirmative: the Swierkiewicz holding remains good law. . . It is not necessary to plead facts sufficient to establish a prima facie case at the pleading stage. . . .Iqbal does not mention, but is wholly consistent with, Swierkiewicz; there, the Court stressed that, notwithstanding the neoteric plausibility standard, no 'detailed factual allegations' are required in a complaint. . . The prima facie standard is an evidentiary standard, not a pleading standard, and there is no need to set forth a detailed evidentiary proffer in a complaint. In answering the first question, we do not write on a pristine page. Several other courts of appeals have considered the question and concluded, as we do, that the Swierkiewicz Court's treatment of the prima facie case in the pleading context remains the beacon by which we must steer. See, e.g., Keys v. Humana, Inc., 684 F.3d 605, 609–10 (6th Cir.2012); Khalik v. United Air Lines, 671 F.3d 1188, 1191–92 (10th Cir.2012); Coleman v. Md. Ct. of App., 626 F.3d 187, 190 (4th Cir.2010); Arista Records LLC v. Doe 3, 604 F.3d 110, 120–21 (2d Cir.2010); al- Kidd v. Ashcroft, 580 F.3d 949, 974 (9th Cir.2009), rev'd on other grounds, 131 S.Ct. 2074 (2011). This brings us to the second question. With respect to this question, we do not mean to imply that the elements of the prima facie case are irrelevant to a plausibility determination in a discrimination suit. They are not.

Those elements are part of the background against which a plausibility determination should be made. . . .In a nutshell, the elements of a prima facie case may be used as a prism to shed light upon the plausibility of the claim. Although a plaintiff must plead enough facts to make entitlement to relief plausible in light of the evidentiary standard that will pertain at trial—in a discrimination case, the prima facie standard—she need not plead facts sufficient to establish a prima facie case. . . .With this architecture in place, we first examine the district court's conclusion that the complaint failed adequately to establish that Molina (the de facto head of the agency) was aware of the plaintiffs' affiliations with opposing political parties. . . To be sure, the complaint contains only a conclusory statement of Molina's knowledge. For pleading purposes, however, knowledge may be inferable from other allegations in the complaint. . . So it is here. . . . We think that the district court subjected the complaint to an overly stringent pleading standard. An assertion that a defendant was affirmatively seeking information about employees' political affiliations is more than a bare legal conclusion. The plaintiffs' 'witch-hunt' and 'talk[ing] about politics' averments, though general, are factual assertions that must, at the pleading stage, be given credence. . . .The relevant question for a district court in assessing plausibility is not whether the complaint makes any particular factual allegations but, rather, whether 'the complaint warrant[s] dismissal because it failed in toto to render plaintiffs' entitlement to relief plausible.'. . There need not be a one-to-one relationship between any single allegation and a necessary element of the cause of action. What counts is the 'cumulative effect of the [complaint's] factual allegations.'. . Here, the factual allegations, taken in their entirety, plausibly support a finding that Molina had acquired knowledge of the plaintiffs' political affiliations. The district court also held that the plaintiffs had failed plausibly to allege Ríos's antagonistic political affiliation. . . . [T]o survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, it is not necessary for a plaintiff in a political discrimination case to bring forth evidence that the defendant is a card-carrying member of the opposition party. On this issue, the plaintiffs' factual allegations are adequate for pleading purposes. . . . The last pillar on which the district court's order rests involves what it concluded was the absence of any plausible allegation that political affiliation was a substantial or motivating factor behind the adverse employment actions. . . Once again, it is important to bear in mind that the plaintiffs, for pleading purposes, need not establish this element; the facts contained in the complaint need only show that the claim of causation is plausible. . . . The complaint here contains allegations that all of the plaintiffs were affiliated with political parties that opposed the NPP; that none of them ever received a negative evaluation for her work at the AIJ; that each was replaced by an NPP adherent; and that the critical decisions were made by newly appointed officials loyal to the NPP and in a politically charged atmosphere. The record contains no nondiscriminatory explanation for the adverse employment actions. . . .When all is said and done, we think that the array of circumstances described in the complaint suffices to support an inference of political animus.")

Grajales v. Puerto Rico Ports Authority, 682 F.3d 40, 45-47, 49, 50 (1st Cir. 2012) ("Under ordinary circumstances, a court may measure the plausibility of a complaint by means of a motion for judgment on the pleadings. . . We have not, however, spoken to the question of whether it is appropriate to apply the plausibility standard after substantial pretrial discovery has taken place. An obvious anomaly arises in such a situation because a court attempting to determine whether a complaint should be dismissed for implausibility must decide, on the basis of the complaint alone, if the complaint lacks enough factual content to allow a 'reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.'. . This is, by its nature, a threshold inquiry, and logic strongly suggests that it occur prior to discovery. Ignoring the entire panoply of facts developed during discovery makes little sense. An artificial evaluation of this sort seems especially awkward because one of the main goals of the plausibility standard is the avoidance of unnecessary discovery. . . Applying the plausibility standard to a complaint after discovery is nearly complete would defeat this core purpose. . . Thus, while district courts enjoy broad discretion in managing their dockets, we think that, once the parties have invested substantial resources in discovery, a district court should hesitate to entertain a Rule 12(c) motion that asserts a complaint's failure to satisfy the plausibility requirement. Here, however, we need not decide the difficult question of whether the district court's decision to entertain the defendants' Rule 12(c) motion after nine months of pretrial discovery was an abuse of discretion. As we explain below, this case can readily be resolved on the merits of the plausibility claim. We turn, therefore, to the plaintiff's substantive contention. . . . As a general matter, liability for public officials under section 1983 arises only if 'a plaintiff can establish that his or her constitutional injury resulted from the direct acts or omissions of the official, or from indirect conduct that amounts to condonation or tacit authorization.'. . Moreover, supervisory liability under section 1983 cannot arise solely on the basis of respondeat superior. . . Such liability requires that the supervisor's conduct (whether action or inaction) constitutes 'supervisory encouragement, condonation or acquiescence[,] or gross negligence of the supervisor amounting to deliberate indifference.'. . Finally, the case law requires a separate assessment of the potential liability of each of the defendants. . .Viewing the pleaded facts in the light most hospitable to the plaintiff, the following picture emerges. In 2008, the plaintiff—who had an exemplary record of service within the PRPA—moved from a trust (policymaking) to a career (non-policymaking) position. Shortly after the change in administration wrought by the 2008 election, the plaintiff began experiencing significant harassment at the hands of persons loyal to an opposing political party (which controlled the new administration). This course of harassment consisted in large part of actions for which there was no legitimate explanation. The harassment culminated in unjustified disciplinary threats, disparate treatment, the loss of the plaintiff's right to carry a sidearm, his involuntary transfer to a remote work station, the elongation of his workday, and a denial of remuneration for the extra time and travel involved. The scenario here is not unfamiliar. Similar claims of political discrimination in the public workplace following a change in administration appear to be increasingly common in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico. . . In this instance, the close temporal proximity between the regime change and the onset of pervasive cross-party harassment, coupled with the absence of any legitimate reason for much of the offending conduct, permits a plausible inference at the pleading stage that political animus was a motivating factor behind the harassment. . . We hold, therefore, that the factual allegations in the second amended complaint, taken as true and considered as a whole, state a plausible section 1983 claim for political discrimination. We caution, however, that a favorable plausibility determination does not necessarily herald a likelihood of success at subsequent stages of the litigation. Factual allegations must be proven, evidence to the contrary must be factored into the mix, and the merits remain entirely open.")

Pruell v. Caritas Christi, 678 F.3d 10, *1-*5 (1st Cir. 2012) ("The need for pleading specificity in federal complaints has been somewhat unsettled since the Supreme Court's decisions in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007) and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). The Federal Rules of Civil Procedure have long provided for 'notice pleading,' requiring a 'short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief,' Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(2), but the Supreme Court also made clear in Twombly that Rule 8(a)(2) still requires a 'showing,' rather than a blanket assertion, of entitlement to relief. Without some factual allegation in the complaint, it is hard to see how a claimant could satisfy the requirement of providing not only 'fair notice' of the nature of the claim, but also 'grounds' on which the claim rests. . .Indeed, well before Twombly and Iqbal, specificity requirements had been stiffened in many circuit courts, see Twombly, 550 U.S. at 562 (collecting cases), redressing what had been a much earlier swing of the pendulum to the other end of its arc, e.g., Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41 (1957); other pressures for tightening up have come from growing dockets, the enormous cost of modern discovery, and the benefits to court and parties of sorting out hopeless claims early on. But, as in any transition, there remain issues of fair warning and elucidation. To allege an employment relationship, plaintiffs in this case state: 'At all relevant times, Ashleigh Pruell and Amy Gordon ('Plaintiffs') were employees under the FLSA, employed by defendants within this district and reside within this District' and to allege underpayment of overtime, the complaint as amended says: 'Throughout their employment with defendants, Plaintiffs regularly worked hours over 40 in a week and were not compensated for such time, including the applicable premium pay.'. . The key statement—'regularly worked hours over 40 in a week and were not compensated for such time'—is one of those borderline phrases. . . . Standing alone, the quoted language is little more than a paraphrase of the statute. . . . Nevertheless, we think the motion to amend should be allowed. The precedents on pleading specificity are in a period of transition, and precise rules will always be elusive because of the great range and variations in causes of action, fact-patterns and attendant circumstances (e.g., warnings, good faith of counsel). . . While specifics as to the named plaintiffs here are lacking, some of the information needed may be in the control of defendants. Plaintiffs certainly know what sort of work they performed and presumably know how much they were paid as wages; but precisely how their pay was computed and based upon what specific number of hours for particular time periods may depend on records they do not have. Complaints cannot be based on generalities, but some latitude has to be allowed where a claim looks plausible based on what is known. . . . Under all of these circumstances we think another amendment should be permitted, and it would be helpful on remand for the district judge to indicate to plaintiffs what deficiencies remain and what the court expects to be supplied in a final amended complaint. The judgment is affirmed so far as it finds the complaint inadequate to state an FLSA claim, but the dismissal with prejudice is vacated, and the case remanded to give the plaintiffs a final opportunity to file a sufficient complaint.")

Schatz v. Republican State Leadership Committee, 669 F.3d 50, 56-58 (1st Cir. 2012) ("Like the district judge, we skip over whether Schatz's complaint plausibly alleges defamation and focus on whether it plausibly alleges actual malice—given that this is the simplest way to pinpoint Schatz's problem. Not so fast, Schatz says, suggesting that courts cannot take that tack. Unfortunately for Schatz, he cites no case for the point, and we are aware of none, so we need say no more about that. See Rodríguez v. Municipality of San Juan, 659 F.3d 168, 175–76 (1st Cir.2011). But before we tangle with the actual-malice issue, we need to clear away some underbrush. . . .His complaint used actual-malice buzzwords, contending that the RSLC had 'knowledge' that its statements were 'false' or had 'serious doubts' about their truth and a 'reckless disregard' for whether they were false. But these are merely legal conclusions, which must be backed by well-pled facts. See, e.g., Ocasio–Hernández, 640 F.3d at 12. As for facts, the complaint alleged that the RSLC had basically branded him a criminal, falsely charging him with working with his co-selectmen to 'wrong [ly]' divert $10,000 in 'taxpayer' funds to a 'political organization' and then voting to kill a $10,000 fireworks celebration. The reality, at least according to his complaint, is that town residents had voted in January 2008 to contribute to the Coalition and that he had voted in March 2009 to fund the fireworks display. From these allegations Schatz further insists that the RSLC had portrayed him in a sinister light by connecting the two funding decisions (the one had nothing to do with the other) and by referring to the Coalition as a 'political organization' rather than by its name (leaving the impression that maybe his 'political organization' had gotten the 10 grand). Given what the newspapers had reported, which, according to the complaint, were the RSLC's sole sources of information, the RSLC knew the offending statements were false or made them recklessly without any regard for the truth—or so Schatz argues. He also points out that his complaint alleged that the RSLC did not launch 'any additional investigation' to determine whether what it said was true. And, reaching the ultimate crescendo, he contends that the complaint's allegations plausibly show that the RSLC acted with actual malice. We think just the opposite. After comparing what the RSLC proclaimed with what the newspapers disclosed (as everyone agrees we should), we conclude that none of Schatz's points, individually or collectively, can save the day for him. . . . The bottom line, then, is that he has not 'nudged' his actual-malice claim 'across the line from conceivable to plausible,' so the judge rightly dismissed the complaint. . . . As a last-ditch effort to save his case, Schatz suggests that if we do not reverse the judge we will be setting pleading standards higher than what Twombly and Iqbal require. Not so. Sure, malice is not a matter that requires particularity in pleading—like other states of mind, it 'may be alleged generally.' See Fed.R.Civ.P. 9(b). But, to make out a plausible malice claim, a plaintiff must still lay out enough facts from which malice might reasonably be inferred—even in a world with Twombly and Iqbal.. . Having followed Twombly and Iqbal to a T, we easily reject Schatz's last line of attack.") Feliciano-Hernandez v. Pereira-Castillo, 663 F.3d 527, 533-36 (1st Cir. 2011) ("Feliciano-Hernández's complaint fails under Iqbal to plead adequately that the individual defendants violated his constitutional rights and so fails the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis. As such, he necessarily fails the second prong as well: an objectively reasonable public official situated as defendants would not be on notice of violations of any constitutional rights. The named defendants are very high-level officials, each of whom, as Secretary of the Department of Corrections, had vast responsibilities. . . . The complaint sets forth a series of conclusions. It alleges that '[i]n keeping the plaintiff confined beyond the term of his sentence, each defendant acted with deliberate indifference and/or reckless disregard of the plaintiff's Eighth Amendment rights and due process of law' and that '[e]ach defendant [ ] unjustifiabl[y] deprived plaintiff of liberty in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights and due process of law.'. The complaint states as to each of the former-Secretary defendants that he or she 'is being sued on the basis of his [or her] deliberate indifference and/or reckless disregard' of the plaintiff's rights. It alleges among other conclusions that the defendants 'failed in their duty to assure adequate monitoring, disciplining, evaluating, training and supervising any and all personnel under their charge, to assure that all inmates were properly classified and released upon completion of their sentence.' It relatedly alleges that '[h]ad the defendants complied with their supervisory duties, they would have identified those employees that did not properly register the plaintiff's classification and inaccurately categorized the crimes for which he had been sentenced.' None of these conclusory allegations suffice to establish a claim. These are exactly the sort of 'unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation[s]' that both we and the Supreme Court have found insufficient. . . . There are a number of other specific deficiencies in the complaint. We start (and end) with the failure to plead that any of the named defendants, each a former Secretary of the Department of Corrections, had any individual notice that plaintiff's incarceration beyond 1993 was a violation of his constitutional rights, much less that there was an affirmative link to them or that they were deliberately indifferent to those notices of alleged violations of his rights. Actual or constructive knowledge of a rights violation is a prerequisite for stating any claim. . . .Even beyond failing to show notice to the individual defendants, the complaint fails on other grounds. Feliciano-Hernández 'would still have to go further, for "not every official who is aware of a problem exhibits deliberate indifference by failing to resolve it."'. . . The complaint contains no factual allegations to support even a minimal showing of deliberate indifference.")

Air Sunshine, Inc. v. Carl, 663 F.3d 27, 35 (1st Cir. 2011) ("The bald allegation that Carl refused to accept the inspection Air Sunshine had conducted, pending revision of certain manuals, which Air Sunshine had been waiting for Carl to approve, also does not state a procedural due process claim. The complaint does not state when the private inspection took place, when the results were submitted to Carl, when Carl refused to accept the inspection, why his refusal was improper, and provides no other information that would provide necessary context for a claim of constitutional violation. These and the other 'naked assertion[s]' of procedural due process violations are 'devoid of "further factual enhancement"' and do not survive the motion to dismiss. . . Carl's actions were also entirely consistent with lawful conduct, which is another reason the complaint fails to meet the Iqbal standard.")

Soto-Torres v. Fraticelli, 654 F.3d 153, 157 n.2 (1st Cir. 2011) ("The complaint's allegations that Soto-Torres was 'illegally and unreasonabl[y] detained' and that 'excessive force' was used in pushing him to the floor are legal conclusions that are not to be credited.")

Ocasio-Hernandez v. Fortuno-Burset, 640 F.3d 1, 13-17, 19 (1st Cir. 2011) ("At issue. . . is the correctness of the district court's conclusion that the plaintiffs' complaint fails to show that the defendants had knowledge of the plaintiffs' political affiliation and that the plaintiffs' political affiliation motivated the defendants' participation in the plaintiffs' terminations. . . . The district court erred by not affording the plaintiffs' allegations the presumption of truth to which they were entitled. First, as we explained above, the Supreme Court's concerns about conclusory allegations expressed in Twombly and Iqbal focused on allegations of ultimate legal conclusions and on unadorned recitations of a cause-of-action's elements couched as factual assertions. Allegations of discrete factual events such as the defendants questioning the plaintiffs and replacing the plaintiffs with new employees are not 'conclusory' in the relevant sense. Second, factual allegations in a complaint do not need to contain the level of specificity sought by the district court. . . . Additionally, the district court erred when it failed to evaluate the cumulative effect of the factual allegations. The question confronting a court on a motion to dismiss is whether all the facts alleged, when viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, render the plaintiff's entitlement to relief plausible. . . . Indeed, the Supreme Court has suggested that allegations that would individually lack the heft to make a claim plausible may suffice to state a claim in the context of the complaint's other factual allegations. . . . We also reject the district court's 'lead to the conclusion' formulation to the extent it implies a stronger logical connection than that demanded by plausibility. As we have said previously, '[a] plausible but inconclusive inference from pleaded facts will survive a motion to dismiss.' Sepúlveda-Villarini, 628 F.3d at 30. Taking all well-pleaded factual allegations as true, the plaintiffs in this case have pleaded adequate factual material to support a reasonable inference that the four defendants had knowledge of their political beliefs. . . . Because precise knowledge of the chain of events leading to the constitutional violation may often be unavailable to a plaintiff at this early stage of the litigation, we take to heart the Supreme Court's call to 'draw on our "judicial experience and common sense" as we make a contextual judgment about the sufficiency of the pleadings.'. . As we have often emphasized, one rarely finds 'smoking gun' evidence in a political discrimination case. . . Circumstantial evidence must, at times, suffice. Moreover, the requirement of plausibility on a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6) 'simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of the illegal [conduct].'. . The allegations above plausibly show that each defendant possessed knowledge of and shared some responsibility for the termination of employees at La Fortaleza. . . . Turning to the question of discriminatory motive, we must again conclude that the district court erred. The allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint support the reasonable inference that the defendants' decision to terminate the plaintiffs' employment was substantially motivated by political affiliation. . . . The cumulative weight of the plaintiffs' factual allegations easily nudges their claim of political discrimination 'across the line from conceivable to plausible' as to each defendant. . . Read as a whole, the plaintiffs' complaint unquestionably describes a plausible discriminatory sequence that is all too familiar in this circuit. . . Under the Federal Rules, no more is required to 'unlock the doors of discovery' for these plaintiffs.") Rios-Colon v. Toledo-Davila, 641 F.3d 1, 2, 5 (1st Cir. 2011) ("Plaintiff Víctor Hugo Ríos-Colón ('Ríos') appeals from the judgment of the United States District Court for the District of Puerto Rico, dismissing his suit alleging racial discrimination in the course of his employment in the Puerto Rico Police Department for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted. Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6). The complaint alleged that he is black and that his supervisor in the Police Department used racial slurs against him and transferred him to a less desirable position. For the reasons explained below, we conclude that the complaint plausibly alleged claims of racial discrimination in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000e-2000e-17, and of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution, made actionable by 42 U.S.C. § 1983. . . . The complaint alleges that Ríos was transferred from a position with the Drug Prevention Division to a less desirable position with the Bureau of Illegal Arms. The position to which he was transferred allegedly offered materially less attractive working conditions and fewer opportunities to earn overtime pay. The complaint furthermore plausibly alleges that the disadvantageous transfer was based on racial discrimination. It alleges that Cordero, the supervisor who caused Ríos to be transferred and who recommended a less qualified white candidate in preference to Ríos when a position in the Drug Prevention Division later became available, had used abusive and derogatory slurs expressing explicit anti-black racial bias. These allegations were sufficient to plead a cognizable claim under the Equal Protection Clause, as they convey a plausible inference that Cordero discriminated against Ríos in official acts, depriving him of significant advantages because of his race.") Penalbert-Rosa v. Fortuno-Burset, 631 F.3d 592, 595-97 (1st Cir. 2011) ("Iqbal could be viewed as emergent law, see, e.g., 129 S.Ct. at 1961 (Souter, J., dissenting), but we ourselves had earlier said a complaint that rests on 'bald assertions' and 'unsupportable conclusions' may be subject to dismissal, Aulson v. Blanchard, 83 F.3d 1, 3 (1st Cir.1996); and our decisions since Iqbal have several times found unadorned factual assertions to be inadequate. . . Without trying to lay down a mechanical rule, it is enough to say that sometimes a threadbare factual allegation bears insignia of its speculative character and, absent greater concreteness, invites an early challenge–which can be countered by a plaintiff's supplying of the missing detail. Here, Peñalbert's complaint does allege that personnel decisions in the executive mansion are within the authority of the governor, but nothing beyond speculation supports the further assertion that the governor or his chief of staff participated in the decision to dismiss Peñalbert. Someone denominated the 'administrator' of the governor's mansion might more plausibly be involved, but nothing in the complaint indicates the administrator's actual duties or that the administrator ordinarily passes on the selection or discharge of a receptionist. A defendant could be liable, even without knowing of Peñalbert or her position, if (for example) on some generic basis that defendant authorized the impermissible firing of PDP supporters because of their party membership or beliefs. . . But, again, mere possibility is not enough to state a claim and again no facts are stated in the complaint to show that in this instance any of the three gave such an order or that it is even plausible that they did. If Peñalbert had any basis beyond speculation for charging any one of the named defendants with knowing participation in the wrong, it seems almost certain that this would have been mentioned–if not in the complaint at least in the opposition to the motion to dismiss. Specific information, even if not in the form of admissible evidence, would likely be enough at this stage; pure speculation is not. This may seem hard on a plaintiff who merely suspects wrongdoing, but even discovery requires a minimum showing and 'fishing expeditions' are not permitted. . .However, Peñalbert's position is in one respect different: the complaint adequately alleges–based on the non-conclusory facts already listed–that someone fired Peñalbert based on party membership. Of course, the factual allegations might be later undermined or countered by affirmative defenses . . . but at this stage the complaint adequately asserts a federal wrong by someone. So while the present complaint does not justify suit against the defendants actually named, an avenue for discovery may be open. A plaintiff who is unaware of the identity of the person who wronged her can sometimes proceed against a 'John Doe' defendant as a placeholder. . . We have previously condoned the device, at least when discovery is likely to reveal the identity of the correct defendant and good faith investigative efforts to do so have already failed. . .Whether Peñalbert could make such a showing is not clear from the face of her complaint, and she has not sought this 'John Doe' alternative. Rarely do we rescue a civil claim–even to the very limited extent now contemplated–on grounds not urged either on the district court or on us. But Twombly and Iqbal are relatively recent; developing a workable distinction between 'fact' and 'speculation' is still a work in progress; and while upholding the dismissal of the complaint against the named defendants, we think that the interests of justice warrant a remand to give Peñalbert a reasonable opportunity to move to amend the complaint to seek relief against a 'John Doe' defendant.")

Sepulveda-Villarini v. Department of Educ. of Puerto Rico, 628 F.3d 25, 29, 30 (1st Cir. 2010) ("We think that the district court demanded more than plausibility. Each set of pleadings includes two significant sets of allegations. First, for a period of four or five school years the school administration provided the reduced class size in response to the respective plaintiff's request, supported by some sort of medical certification attesting to its legitimacy. In each complaint, those years of requested accommodation are put forward as establishing, in effect, a base-line of adequacy under the statute in response to an implicit acknowledgment that a statutory disability required the provisions that were made. Second, each set of pleadings describes changed facts beginning in the 2007-08 year, in which instructions from the defendant Secretary resulted in raising the class size to 30 (with a young team teacher to share the load with Sepúlveda). Each complaint alleges that the plaintiff's emotional and physical health subsequently deteriorated to the point of requiring treatment, and each concludes that assigning 30 pupils was less than reasonable accommodation under the statute. . . . We . . . see the trial judge's call for allegations explaining 'how' class size was significant and the change in size was actionable as a call for pleading the details of medical evidence in order to bolster the likelihood that a causal connection will prove out as fact. It may even be read as an expression of skepticism that medical evidence would support the causal claim that increased class size damaged health. But Twombly cautioned against thinking of plausibility as a standard of likely success on the merits; the standard is plausibility assuming the pleaded facts to be true and read in a plaintiff's favor. . . . A plausible but inconclusive inference from pleaded facts will survive a motion to dismiss, and the fair inferences from the facts pleaded in these cases point to the essential difference between each of them and the circumstances in Twombly, for example, in which the same actionable conduct alleged on the defendant's part had been held in some prior cases to be lawful behavior. . . . We therefore vacate the portion of the order in each case that found the complaint inadequate to state a Title I violation, and inadequate to state a Rehabilitation Act claim for the same reason.")

Maldonado v. Fontanes, 568 F.3d 263, 273-75 & n.7(1st Cir. 2009) ("[A]nalyzing the pleadings under Iqbal, we hold that the allegations of the complaint do not allege a sufficient connection between the Mayor and the alleged conscience-shocking behavior–the killing of the seized pets–to state the elements of a substantive due process violation.. . . The purported liability of the Mayor for damages for substantive due process violations does not involve a policy of the Municipality for which he is responsible, nor does it rest on his personal conduct. Instead, the allegations against the Mayor are that he promulgated a pet policy for the public housing complexes and was present at and participated in one of the raids. This level of involvement is insufficient to support a finding of liability. . . . Plaintiffs complaint identifies no policy which authorized the killing of the pets, much less one which the Mayor authorized. Second, the complaint does not allege that the Mayor was personally involved in any conscience-shocking conduct during the raids. . . .A government official who himself inflicts truly outrageous, uncivilized, and intolerable harm on a person or his property may be liable; but there is no claim in this complaint the Mayor himself inflicted such harm. . . The allegations against the Mayor thus do not establish that his involvement was sufficiently direct to hold him liable for violations of the plaintiffs' substantive due process rights. Nor do the allegations make out a viable case for supervisory liability, such that the Mayor could, on these pleadings, be held responsible for violations of the plaintiffs' substantive due process rights committed by subordinate municipal employees or workers from ACS. . . . Some recent language from the Supreme Court may call into question our prior circuit law on the standard for holding a public official liable for damages under § 1983 on a theory of supervisory liability. . . We need not resolve this issue, however, because we find that the plaintiffs have not pled facts sufficient to make out a plausible entitlement to relief under our previous formulation of the standards for supervisory liability. . . . Here, the Mayor's promulgation of a pet policy that was silent as to the manner in which the pets were to be collected and disposed of, coupled with his mere presence at one of the raids, is insufficient to create the affirmative link necessary for a finding of supervisory liability, even under a theory of deliberate indifference. The Mayor is entitled to qualified immunity on the pleadings on the Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process claims.")

Thomas v. Rhode Island, 542 F.3d 944, 949 (1st Cir. 2008) ("[E]ven if the probable cause theory of the appellants were properly before us, we would reject it. The vague references in the complaint to acts of the defendants that 'are illegal' and 'without lawful authority' were insufficient to apprise defendants that the appellants were asserting a more particular claim that there was a lack of probable cause for the arrests. As we have stated, '[n]otice pleading rules do not relieve a plaintiff of responsibility for identifying the nature of her claim.'. . Our precedent is clear that courts 'must always exhibit awareness of the defendant's inalienable right to know in advance the nature of the cause of action being asserted against him,' because such notice is '[a] fundamental purpose of pleadings under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.'. . Here, the generality of the complaint's language did not afford defendants such notice with respect to the probable cause claim.").

Solomon v. Dookhan, No. 13–10208–GAO, 2014 WL 317202, *7, *8 (D. Mass. Jan. 27, 2014) [O'Toole, J. (adopting Magistrate Judge Sorokin's R & R) ("[T]he fact that Keenan is alleged by Solomon to have engaged in unconstitutional misconduct, and then to have engaged in further misconduct in an immunized capacity (i.e., his grand jury testimony) does not serve to immunize him retroactively with respect to the earlier acts. . . It is also potentially evidence with respect to the allegation plausibly made in the Amended Complaint that Keenan colluded with Dookhan and the ADA, intending to frame Solomon, which would also state a claim for violation of his due process rights. Even where Brady is not implicated, state actors nevertheless violate an accused's due process rights when they engage in a 'deliberate deception.'. . As in Limone, Solomon's allegations here are broader than a Brady claim. . . . Solomon alleges not that Keenan merely disposed of the tested substance, but then was otherwise an unwitting collateral victim of Dookhan's misconduct. Rather, he plausibly alleges that Keenan, along with Dookhan, knowingly sought Solomon's wrongful conviction by: failing to provide the field test materials; attempting to intimidate Solomon's counsel; seeking an indictment of Solomon on the felony charge; and offering false (albeit immunized) testimony and evidence to the grand jury.")

Brace v. Massachusetts, 673 F.Supp.2d 36, 42, 43 (D. Mass. 2009) ("[T]he heightened 'plausibility' pleading standard first articulated in Twombly and then re-stated in Iqbal might not be as universal as Plaintiff's counsel seemed to contend at oral argument. Regardless of the actual reach of Twombly and Iqbal, and even assuming, arguendo, that the heightened pleading standard applies, Plaintiff in this case has pled sufficient facts to survive Defendant Frey's motion to dismiss. As to the first element needed to establish a violation of Ms. Brace's rights under the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments, there is little question that Plaintiff's complaint establishes that Ms. Brace's condition while she was in custody constituted a serious medical need. Similarly, Plaintiff's complaint contains enough factual detail to plausibly support a claim that Defendant Frey might have exhibited deliberate indifference to this serious medical need. The complaint alleges that Defendant Frey observed Ms. Brace while she was in obvious medical distress, which would establish that she was subjectively aware of the substantial risk of serious harm. The complaint also avers that Defendant Frey did take the minimal step of making a phone call to the medical unit about Ms. Brace's condition, which is enough to establish that she in fact did actually draw the inference that a risk of harm existed. Given Plaintiff's factual allegations about Defendant Frey's role in the events of August 20, 2005, it is plausible that Plaintiff could establish that Defendant Frey's failure to take any further action could constitute deliberate indifference. The complaint here does not begin and end with a conclusory recitation of the legal elements that must be proved. Rather, Plaintiff has cited to enough specific alleged acts or omissions by Defendant Frey that might support a claim under the Eighth or Fourteenth Amendments, especially given the limited access to information that Plaintiff has had prior to taking discovery in this case.").

Chao v. Ballista, 630 F.Supp.2d 170, 177-79 & n.2 (D. Mass. 2009) ("Plausibility, as the Supreme Court's recent elaboration in Ashcroft v. Iqbal makes clear, is a highly contextual enterprise–dependent on the particular claims asserted, their elements, and the overall factual picture alleged in the complaint. . . .Allegations become 'conclusory' where they recite only the elements of the claim and, at the same time, the court's commonsense credits a far more likely inference from the available facts. . .This analysis depends on the full factual picture, the particular cause of action, and the available alternative explanations. Yet in keeping with Rule 8(a), a complaint should only be dismissed at the pleading stage where the allegations are so broad, and the alternative explanations so overwhelming, that the claims no longer appear plausible. . . .Together, [the] factual allegations [of the complaint] raise the plausible inference that, given their supervisory duties and security responsibilities, the Defendants failed to adequately train, supervise, or investigate Ballista's year-long sexual encounters with Chao. They encompass also a failure to adopt policies and procedures within the DOC that would have prevented the sexual abuse alleged in the complaint. . . . Given the public attention devoted to sexual abuse in prisons writ large, and the repetitive, long-lasting abuse alleged in this case, it is a fair inference from the pleadings that prison officials–including Commissioner Dennehey–were deliberately indifferent to the risks and reality of this abuse. . . . Notably, the state of mind required to make out a supervisory claim under the Eighth Amendment–i.e., deliberate indifference–requires less than the discriminatory purpose or intent that Iqbal was required to allege in his suit against Ashcroft and Mueller. . . Together with the other contextual factors discussed above, what qualifies as a fair or credible inference from the facts alleged in the pleadings must be calibrated accordingly.. . . While the Defendants' personal involvement will be further tested at the summary judgment stage, Chao's claims have met the crucial threshold of plausibility and survive the Defendants' Motion to Dismiss.")

Farrah v. Gondella , No. 07-12075-RGS, 2008 WL 2788090, at *3, *4 (D. Mass. July 16, 2008) (not reported) ("In Blodgett's view, the supervisory claim is pled so broadly that it would allow civil rights plaintiffs to sweep any superior officer into the ambit of liability simply by using catch-phrases like "knew or should have known" and "failed to act." Blodgett contends that plaintiff is attempting to bootstrap allegations regarding Blanchard's past conduct into the claim of supervisory liability without pleading any link between the alleged conduct and Blodgett personally. According to Blodgett, Twombly requires more. Blodgett may in this regard place too much weight on Twombly, but there is another consideration. Rule 8 requires a civil rights plaintiff (as it does plaintiffs generally) to set forth factual allegations with respect to each material element necessary to warrant relief, including 'who did what to whom, when, where, and why.' Educadores Puertorriqueños en Accíon v. Hernández, 367 F.3d 61, 68 (1st Cir.2004) (affirming the application of Rule 8 to civil rights actions, but rejecting a 'heightened pleading standard'). . . . Plaintiff's supervisory claim against Blodgett, as currently pled, skirts perilously close to an unadorned theory of vicarious liability, a tort concept that has no application in a section 1983 context. . . .While a civil rights plaintiff need not plead encyclopedic facts in order to adequately state a supervisory liability claim, the facts pled should be sufficient to cross the rim of the speculative into the realm of the plausible. This is particularly true where the supervisor against whom the claim is brought is an elected official whose duties run well beyond oversight of one of many components of a government office owing manifold duties to the general public. Perhaps the court is mistaken in permitting plaintiff a second chance as against Blodgett, but at this stage of the proceedings, the rules are appropriately plaintiff-friendly, and Blodgett has not (as yet) raised a claim of qualified immunity. The court will permit plaintiff to conduct discovery from Blodgett limited solely (and strictly) to the issues of: (1) his authority to discipline members of the Drug Task Force for alleged misconduct; and (2) his knowledge of any propensity by Blanchard (or others) to use excessive force.").

Brown v. Sweeney, 526 F.Supp.2d 126, 129, 130 (D.Mass. 2007) ("The United States Supreme Court is the flagship of a vast fleet of courts. Where, as here, it makes a course correction after sailing on a particular tack for a long period of time, it has the right to expect that each of the subordinate units will keep station on the flag, make the identical course correction, and sail on the new course in perfect alignment. At least that is the theory. Here, of course, the metaphor breaks down. Decisions of the Supreme Court do not come with precise orders, such as 'alter course three degrees to starboard.' Rather they carefully decide the specific controversy before the Court and explain the grounds of such decision. Given our strong stare decisis tradition, however, every such decision implicitly carries a signal much like Nelson's famous 'England expects ...' flag hoist at Trafalgar, i.e. 'that every man shall do his duty' and so we all shall ... at least insofar as we can make out the signal. There is some merit to an argument limiting the reach of Bell Atlantic to its antitrust subject matter. Professor Erwin Chermerinsky suggested such a limitation in addressing the District of Massachusetts Judicial Conference in June 2007. The Supreme Court in Bell Atlantic noted the imperative of dismissing antitrust claims before embarking your expensive discovery. . . Such an argument is supported by the more recent Supreme Court decision in Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197 (2007). The Supreme Court, in Erickson, addressed a claim for a section 1983 violation and stated that '[s]pecific facts are not necessary.' . . To make matters more confusing, the authority cited for the proposition is Bell Atlantic, with an internal quotation citing Conley. . . . Bell Atlantic, when read together with Erickson, and in light of the cases that have addressed this issue, appears neither to be confined to antitrust cases nor to impose a significantly heightened pleading standard. . . The use of the Bell Atlantic language and standard in Erickson implies that recognizing a heightened (or different) pleading standard only for antitrust cases and therefore distinguishing Bell Atlantic on its antitrust subject matter ought fail. . . Still, Erickson is instructive in analyzing a motion to dismiss after Bell Atlantic. In Erickson, the Supreme Court held that a section 1983 claim alleging deliberate indifference to serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment was properly pled where '[t]he complaint stated that [the doctor's] decision to remove petitioner from his prescribed hepatitis C medication was Aendangering [his] life"' and that 'this medication was withheld Ashortly after" petitioner had commenced a treatment program that would take one year, that he was Astill in need of treatment for this disease," and that the prison officials were in the meantime refusing to provide treatment.'. . These generalized factual allegations were deemed sufficient and demonstrate that a liberal pleading standard as to the 'grounds' of a claim remains. . . The decision in Bell Atlantic, therefore, is properly read as undermining only those claims that rest exclusively on conclusory or merely speculative assertions.").

SECOND CIRCUIT

Willey v. Kirkpatrick, 801 F.3d 51, 68 (2d Cir. 2015) ("[W]e find erroneous each of the three apparently independent grounds given by the district court for dismissing Willey's claim for unsanitary conditions of confinement. The first two aim to set a minimum duration and minimum severity of an exposure for it to reach the level of a constitutional violation. We agree that there are many exposures of inmates to unsanitary conditions that do not amount to a constitutional violation, but we reject the district court's conclusion that there is any bright-line durational requirement for a viable unsanitary-conditions claim. Nor is there some minimal level of grotesquerie required, which goes unmet by an inmate's accumulating human waste that fills a toilet but does not 'overflow[ ] into his cell.'. . Instead, our decisions and those of other circuits evaluate the product of these two components—whether exposure to human waste is cruel and unusual depends on both the duration and the severity of the exposure. . . . The severity of an exposure may be less quantifiable than its duration, but its qualitative offense to a prisoner's dignity should be given due consideration. Here, the district court's analysis did not appear to consider the effect that the cell shields would have in exponentially amplifying the grotesquerie of the odor of the accumulating waste. Another relevant consideration increases the severity of Willey's second alleged exposure, which the district court did not discuss. Over those fourteen days in a filthy cell, Willey alleges that he was kept naked and without access to clothing. We do not mean to set out any precise formula—we do not say, for example, that this 14–day exposure without clothing was more or less grave than the later 28–day exposure with clothing—but any analysis must consider both the duration and the severity of an inmate's experience of being exposed to unsanitary conditions. Finally, the district court's imposition of a third requirement—that an inmate 'claim[ ] that he suffered sickness or other ill effects' to establish a violation, J.A. 676—fares no better. Although the seriousness of the harms suffered is relevant to calculating damages and may shed light on the severity of an exposure, serious injury is unequivocally not a necessary element of an Eighth Amendment claim. . . Even if such harm were required, Willey plainly alleged that his mental-health problems and attempted suicide followed the campaign of retaliation of which the unsanitary conditions of his confinement were a prominent part. For these reasons, independent of the reaching of grounds not raised by the movants without notice and an opportunity to respond, we vacate the dismissal of Willey's claim for unsanitary conditions of confinement.")

Crawford v. Cuomo, 796 F.3d 252, 254 (2d Cir. 2015) ("We write today to clarify the rule set forth in Boddie: A corrections officer's intentional contact with an inmate's genitalia or other intimate area, which serves no penological purpose and is undertaken with the intent to gratify the officer's sexual desire or to humiliate the inmate, violates the Eighth Amendment. Moreover, we recognize that sexual abuse of prisoners, once passively accepted by society, deeply offends today's standards of decency. The proper application of the rule in Boddie must reflect these standards. By alleging that Officer Prindle fondled their genitals for personal gratification and without penological justification, Crawford and Corley stated a cognizable Eighth Amendment claim.")

Dolan v. Connolly, 794 F.3d 290, 292, 295 (2d Cir. 2015) ("We hold that action as a member of an ILC, i.e. the filing or voicing of grievances on behalf of a prison population, qualifies as constitutionally protected conduct under the First and Fourteenth Amendments and that retaliation for such conduct is therefore actionable under Section 1983. . . . While we harbor some skepticism as to whether the complaint, as it stands, adequately pleads a factual basis from which to infer a causal connection between Dolan's protected conduct and the adverse actions allegedly taken by (at least) some defendants, reading the pro se complaint and opposition papers liberally, we cannot conclude that amendment would be futile.")

Drimal v. Tai, 786 F.3d 219, 223-24 (2d Cir. 2015) ("The district court's rulings on the pleadings and on qualified immunity suffer from two deficiencies. First, the district court erred in finding Drimal's complaint sufficient to plead a violation of Title III because Drimal simply asserted in a conclusory fashion that intercepting marital telephone calls violated Title III without any reference to the duty to minimize. Second, in evaluating defendants' claims of qualified immunity, the district court ruled on all the defendants as a single group instead of evaluating Drimal's claims against each defendant individually. Accordingly, we vacate the district court's denial of the motion to dismiss and direct the dismissal of the complaint with leave to replead under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a)(2) because it appears that amending the complaint would not be futile. . . .In assessing the complaint, the district court read the minimization requirement into the plaintiff's allegations that defendants 'unlawfully' listened to her calls and required no greater specificity as to the facts alleged. However, a simple allegation that defendants behaved 'unlawfully,' unsupported by any factual detail, is precisely the type of legal conclusion that a court is not bound to accept as true on a motion to dismiss, and the district court erred in doing so here.")

Nielsen v. Rabin, 746 F.3d 58, 64 (2d Cir. 2014) ("'Determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief ... requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense' Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 679. We would love to live in a world where it is implausible for a doctor to disregard her oath and refuse to treat a patient she believed had attacked a female officer—just as we would love to live in a world where it is implausible for an employer to be so irrational as to refuse to hire a qualified applicant because of the applicant's skin color. Unfortunately, we do not. . .Taking the allegations in Nielsen's complaint and his opposition brief as true, Nielsen can plausibly allege that Dr. Rabin acted with a sufficiently culpable state of mind. . . If Nielsen's complaint were amended to include the allegations in his opposition to the motion to dismiss, the complaint would sufficiently set forth the mental state element of his deliberate indifference claim. Thus, amendment would not be futile. We therefore REVERSE the decision to deny leave to amend and REMAND to the District Court for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Nielsen v. Rabin, 746 F.3d 58, 64-67 (2d Cir. 2014) (Jacobs, J., dissenting) ("I respectfully dissent. It is common ground that Nielsen's initial complaint was properly dismissed. It alleged that he received minimal medical treatment for serious injuries after police officers informed his treating physicians that Nielsen had attacked two of the officers. . .The majority and I agree that these allegations, even if proven, cannot sustain a Fourteenth Amendment due process claim for deliberate indifference. . .The holding of the majority is that an amended complaint would survive if augmented by two incremental allegations made in Nielsen's opposition to the motion to dismiss: that the officers accompanying Nielsen told Dr. Rabin that (1) one of the officers Nielsen attacked was a woman, and (2) Nielsen 'should be ignored and left alone.' I am of the view that these two allegations do not render plausible the claim that Dr. Rabin withheld medical services from a patient with serious visible injuries. . . It is implausible that a doctor would neglect a patient at the request of a malicious policeman. In any event, the claim is defeated by a review of the medical file (attached as an exhibit to the declaration of counsel in support of Dr. Rabin's motion to dismiss). It reflects that Nielsen did not report symptoms indicative of serious injury, that Nielsen was examined by multiple medical professionals, that some treatment was administered, that what was done reflected a medical consensus, and that Nielsen was told to return for follow-up attention. The claim thus becomes that two doctors violated their oaths and that a nurse falsely reported that Nielsen was in a low level of pain at the time of discharge, all at the behest of police officers who told the doctors that their patient should be neglected. This claim, which is absurd, is easily classed as implausible. . . .The majority opinion reflects two fallacies that are indulged with some frequency in our opinions. First, there is insufficient appreciation that this section 1983 action is a personal claim against the individual assets of Dr. Rabin, and that the defense costs of such a claim alone can wipe out a college fund or equity on a home. . . The plausibility test in cases such as this is a safeguard against a financial injustice that can often outweigh the harm claimed by a plaintiff. True, some or many defendants are indemnified by employers or insurers (though insurance may not cover intentional acts); but such an arrangement would be dehors the record, and may not be considered by us in deciding whether a claim survives through the expense of discovery and extended motion practice. See Gonzalez v. City of Schenectady, 728 F.3d 149, 162 n. 6 (2d Cir.2013). Second, the majority's ruling on plausibility unintentionally implies a certain disrespect for the ethics of doctors and nurses. The majority deems it plausible that each of these medical professionals (and all of them together) would allow a patient's suffering to go unabated at the say-so of policemen expressing hostility to a person in custody. We would never deem such dereliction plausible if alleged against a lawyer.") Walker v. Schult, 717 F.3d 119, 126, 128, 130 (2d Cir. 2013) ("Walker plausibly alleged that his conditions of confinement at FCI Ray Brook deprived him of the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities and subjected him to unreasonable health and safety risks. He alleged that for approximately twenty-eight months, he was confined in a cell with five other men, with inadequate space and ventilation, stifling heat in the summer and freezing cold in the winter, unsanitary conditions, including urine and feces splattered on the floor, insufficient cleaning supplies, a mattress too narrow for him to lie on flat, and noisy, crowded conditions that made sleep difficult and placed him at constant risk of violence and serious harm from cellmates. Based on these allegations, we conclude that Walker has plausibly alleged cruel and unusual punishment in violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . .In dismissing Walker's complaint, the district court improperly 'assay[ed] the weight of the evidence,'. . . and failed to draw all reasonable inferences in Walker's favor. For example, the district court found that Walker's failure to indicate 'the exact extent or duration of [his] exposure to unsanitary conditions' was fatal to his Eighth Amendment claim. Similarly, the court held that Walker's allegations of inadequate ventilation were insufficient because he did not provide any details about the temperatures in his cell. Such detailed allegations, however, are not required for a pro se complaint to survive a motion to dismiss. Moreover, Walker alleged that he was placed in the six-man cell on November 18, 2008 and was still there when he filed his complaint on March 16, 2011. He also alleged that it was so hot during the summer that he had difficulty breathing, and it was so cold during the winter that ice formed inside the cell windows. Drawing all reasonable inferences in Walker's favor, these allegations plausibly alleged that the conditions persisted for twenty-eight months and that the temperatures were extreme enough to state an Eighth Amendment claim. . . .In so holding, we reaffirm that each prisoner complaint alleging a constitutional violation must be carefully analyzed in light of the particular facts contained therein. Here, the specific facts in Walker's complaint plausibly alleged a violation of the Eighth Amendment. But each complaint is different, and courts have the power and duty to dismiss complaints that contain only conclusory, frivolous, or implausible allegations.")

Ruston v. Town Bd. for Town of Skaneateles, 610 F.3d 55, 59, 60 (2d Cir. 2010) ("District courts in our Circuit differ as to the impact of this pleading standard on a 'class of one' equal protection claim. . .This uncertainty is attributable to the tension between [i] this Court's decision in DeMuria v. Hawkes, 328 F.3d 704, 707 (2d Cir.2003), which held under a now-obsolete pleading standard that a 'class of one' claim is adequately pled ('albeit barely' so) even without specification of others similarly situated, and [ii] the Supreme Court's recent clarifications, which require that a complaint allege facts sufficient to establish 'a plausible claim for relief[.]'. . . We hold that the pleading standard set out in Iqbal supersedes the 'general allegation' deemed sufficient in DeMuria, 328 F.3d at 707. Under Iqbal, factual allegations must be sufficient to support necessary legal conclusions. . . . The Rustons' complaint fails to allege facts that 'plausibly suggest an entitlement to relief.' As to the Town defendants, the Rustons' argument appears to be that the Town refused to consider their application while considering applications submitted by those similarly situated. However, the Rustons do not allege specific examples of the Town's proceedings, let alone applications that were made by persons similarly situated. The equal protection claim as to the Town defendants therefore fails for lack of factual allegations to support the legal conclusion. As to the Village, the Rustons argue that other, similarly situated properties were allowed to connect to the Village's sewer system. The Rustons do identify several properties that allegedly were allowed to connect to the Village's sewer system, all of them individual homes or businesses that (like the Rustons' land) were outside the Village but within the Town. We credit, as we must, the factual allegations that these other properties received sewer access while the Rustons' property did not. Nevertheless the complaint fails to state a claim that would support relief. . . . None of these properties is similar to the Rustons' proposed 14-home development, let alone so similar that no rational person could see them as different. . . .As the Rustons fail to allege that properties sufficiently similar to theirs were treated more favorably by either the Village or the Town, they have failed to state a 'class of one' equal protection claim.") Arista Records, LLC v. Doe 3, 604 F.3d 110, 120, 121 (2d Cir. 2010) ("The Twombly plausibility standard, which applies to all civil actions, see Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1953, does not prevent a plaintiff from pleading facts alleged 'upon information and belief' where the facts are peculiarly within the possession and control of the defendant, see, e.g., Boykin v. KeyCorp, 521 F.3d 202, 215 (2d Cir.2008), or where the belief is based on factual information that makes the inference of culpability plausible, see Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949 . . . . Concluding that the complaint before it failed to state a plausible claim, the Twombly Court stated that '[i]n reaching this conclusion, we do not apply any A heightened" pleading standard,' id. at 569 n. 14 (emphasis added). Rather, it emphasized that its holding was consistent with its ruling in Swierkiewicz that 'a heightened pleading requirement,' requiring the pleading of ' A specific facts" beyond those necessary to state [a] claim and the grounds showing entitlement to relief,' was 'impermissibl[e],' Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570. . . . Nor did Iqbal heighten the pleading requirements. Rather, it reiterated much of the discussion in Twombly and rejected as insufficient a pleading that the Iqbal Court regarded as entirely conclusory. Accordingly, although Twombly and Iqbal require ' A factual amplification [where] needed to render a claim plausible,"'. . . we reject Doe 3's contention that Twombly and Iqbal require the pleading of specific evidence or extra facts beyond what is needed to make the claim plausible.") Shomo v. State of New York, No. 06-5434-pr., 2010 WL 1628771, at *1, *2 (2d Cir. Apr. 22, 2010) (not published) ("Appellant, pro se, appeals from the order of the United States District Court for the Western District of New York ("rcara, C.J.), sua sponte dismissing Appellant's 42 U.S.C. § 1983 complaint with leave to amend, pursuant to Rules 8 and 10 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e). . . . We conclude that, under either an abuse of discretion or de novo standard, the district court erred in dismissing Appellant's complaint, even with leave to amend, because many of Appellant's claims, if true, would be actionable under the Eighth Amendment, the Americans with Disabilities Act, 42 U.S.C. § 12101 et seq. ("ADA"), and section 504 of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, 29 U.S.C. § 794. While the district court afforded Appellant the opportunity to amend his complaint, Appellant's complaint was not so deficient as to require its dismissal at such an early stage of litigation. The jurisprudence involving Rule 8, traced from our decision in Salahuddin through the Supreme Court's recent Iqbal decision, is difficult to apply to the dismissal of a complaint containing too much detail, especially where the complaint is filed by a pro se litigant. . . . Notably, even after Twombly, where a litigant is proceeding pro se, courts remain 'obligated' to construe pro se complaints liberally. . . . Notwithstanding the length and detail of Appellant's complaint, his claims enunciate recognizable unconstitutional behavior. The day-to-day events described by Appellant concern the activities of his daily living: his need to be fed, bathed, and aided with toileting. While citing to numerous federal statutes (a practice not uncommon for pro se litigants), Appellant's claims centered around his disability and the alleged deliberate indifference to his serious medical needs. He then amplified these claims, as required under Twombly and Iqbal, by making specific references to events that he claimed were evidence of such deliberate indifference. Insofar as he cited multiple civil rights statutes, '[t]he failure in a complaint to state a statute, or to cite the correct one, in no way affects the merits of a claim. Factual allegations alone are what matters.' Albert v. Carovano, 851 F.2d 561, 571 n. 3 (2d Cir.1988). In fact, while not a model of clarity, Appellant's complaint is neither 'unintelligible' nor 'a labrynthian prolixity of unrelated and vituperative charges that defied comprehension.'").

Turkmen v. Ashcroft, 589 F.3d 542, 546, 547 (2d Cir. 2009) ("We could undertake to decide whether the challenged claims satisfy the pleading standard of Twombly and Iqbal; however, in the circumstances of this case–where plaintiffs have already announced their intent to file a Fourth Amended Complaint to preserve for the putative class the claims asserted only by the settling plaintiffs-we think it better to vacate that portion of the district court's order denying dismissal of the conditions of confinement claims on the ground that an outdated pleading standard was applied, and to remand the case for further proceedings consistent with the standard articulated in Twombly and Iqbal. It may be that the district court will grant plaintiffs leave to file the proposed Fourth Amended Complaint to satisfy the heightened pleading standard. . . . If the district court denies leave to file the proposed Fourth Amended Complaint, it should evaluate the sufficiency of the Third Amended Complaint in light of the settlement and the heightened pleading standard. The district court can then address whether, under Twombly and Iqbal, the Third Amended Complaint fails to state a claim, or inadequately alleges the personal involvement of the moving defendants, or entitles the moving defendants to qualified immunity with respect to the conditions of confinement claims. At this stage of proceedings, we do no more than vacate the order denying the motions to dismiss with respect to the conditions of confinement claims, and remand to the district court for further proceedings.").

Boykin v. KeyCorp, 521 F.3d 202, 213-16 (2d Cir. 2008) ("We agree with the Iqbal panel's conclusion that Twombly focused on the plausibility of the complainant's claim for relief, although Iqbal does not offer much guidance to plaintiffs regarding when factual 'amplification [is] needed to render [a] claim plausible.' . . We need not locate the outer bounds of Twombly's new standard for assessing pleadings under Rule 8(a) here, because no amplification was necessary in this case. After Twombly, the Supreme Court issued another decision addressing the sufficiency of a pleading under Rule 8(a), but this time specifically for a complaint filed pro se. See Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197 (2007) (per curiam). The Court reversed the Tenth Circuit's dismissal of a prisoner's Eighth Amendment claim, holding that the court of appeals had 'depart[ed] from the liberal pleading standards' of Rule 8(a). . . The Court reiterated that '[s]pecific facts are not necessary,' and that the complainant 'need only Agive the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests."' . . But Erickson also emphasized that the court of appeals' departure from Rule 8(a)'s liberal pleading standard was particularly unwarranted because the complainant was pro se . . . . Twombly and Erickson explicitly disavow that Rule 8(a) requires any plaintiff–let alone a pro se plaintiff–to plead 'specific facts.' . . Moreover, as Boykin correctly observes, the names and records, if any, of persons who were not members of the protected classes and were more favorably treated in the loan application process is information particularly within KeyBank's knowledge and control. Pleading on the basis of information and belief is generally appropriate under such circumstances. . . . Boykin is correct that she did not need to allege discriminatory animus for her disparate treatment claim to be sufficiently pleaded. There is no heightened pleading requirement for civil rights complaints alleging racial animus . . .

and this Court has found such claims sufficiently pleaded when the complaint stated simply that plaintiffs 'are African-Americans, describe[d] defendants' actions in detail, and allege[d] that defendants selected [plaintiffs] for maltreatment Asolely because of their color."'. . We have upheld the vitality of this principle since Twombly. . . Here, it is sufficient that Boykin's complaint states that she 'is an African American female,' describes KeyBank's actions with respect to her loan application and alleges that she 'was treated differently from similarly situated loan applicants ... because of her race, sex, and the location of the property in a predominantly African-American neighborhood.' In sum, Boykin's allegations, taken as true, indicate the possibility of discrimination and thus present a plausible claim of disparate treatment. The complaint gives KeyBank notice of Boykin's claim and the grounds upon which it rests that is sufficient to satisfy Rule 8(a). We emphasize that we are expressing no opinion regarding the merits of Boykin's claim. And that is precisely the point: even after Twombly, dismissal of a pro se claim as insufficiently pleaded is appropriate only in the most unsustainable of cases. The merits of a claim like Boykin's, which on its face presents a plausible allegation of disparate treatment, should be tested on summary judgment.").

In re Elevator Antitrust Litigation, 502 F.3d 47, 50 (2d Cir. 2007) ("A narrow view of Twombly would have limited its holding to the antitrust context, or perhaps only to Section 1 claims; but we have concluded that Twombly affects pleading standards somewhat more broadly. [citing Iqbal]").

Brown v. City of N.Y., No. 13-CV-06912, 2017 WL 1390678, at *8 (S.D.N.Y. Apr. 17, 2017) ("Brown contends that Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O'Connell, Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz, and Captain Skepple gave gang members special privileges and responsibilities at GMDC. But Brown has not pled any specific facts that, if accepted as true, would establish that these defendants created this policy or allowed it to continue under their watch. For example, Brown does not allege that Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O'Connell, Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz, and Captain Skepple instructed specific correction officers to behave this way, nor does Brown claim that Laboriel, O'Connell, Beltz, and Skepple learned of and ignored specific instances of correction officers condoning attacks by the Bloods. The complaint's conclusory statements that these defendants' created an unconstitutional policy are thus insufficient to demonstrate their personal involvement in this case. . . . Brown's allegations about the false reports, though, are sufficient to establish the personal involvement of Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O'Connell, Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz, and Captain Skepple. Brown contends that Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz and Captain Skepple authored false reports, and that Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O'Connell, and Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz 'signed off' on false reports prepared by others. . . Defendants cite the Second Circuit's decision in Williams v. Smith, 781 F.2d 319, 324 (2d Cir. 1986) for the proposition that 'the creation of an inaccurate report alone' does not constitute a constitutional violation. . . Here, however, Brown alleges not only that the incident reports were inaccurate, but also that the Individual Defendants who authored and reviewed them did so to retaliate against him for his complaint about CO James. Although 'a prison inmate has no general constitutional right to be free from being falsely accused in a misbehavior report,' the creation of a false report can infringe on an inmate's constitutional rights when it is used to retaliate against him for exercising a constitutional right. . . Since the complaint here plausibly suggests that Deputy Warden Laboriel, Deputy Warden O'Connell, Assistant Deputy Warden Beltz, and Captain Skepple had a retaliatory motive, the court cannot dismiss Brown's § 1983 claims against them for lack of personal involvement.")

Doe v. New York, No. 10 CV 1792(RJD)(VVP), 2012 WL 4503409, *10-*12 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 28, 2012) ("[I]f defendants admittedly promulgated written policies which limited or denied altogether Hepatitis treatment for symptomatic inmates who specifically requested treatment—or, as in several cases, whose treating physicians did so—it is certainly plausible that defendants had an unwritten policy to withhold diagnoses and treatment from asymptomatic inmates who did not request testing or treatment. Additionally, courts in this Circuit have repeatedly declined to dismiss allegations concerning similar instances of failing to inform inmates of their Hepatitis diagnosis over long periods of time, including pursuant to policies nearly identical to those alleged by plaintiffs in this case. . .The Court accordingly rejects defendants' plausibility challenge. . . .Thus although plaintiffs' claims against Governor Pataki in his individual capacity may proceed based on his alleged role in creating the Hepatitis policy, plaintiffs' claims brought pursuant to Section 1983 against all individually named DOCS officials are dismissed for failure to adequately allege personal involvement under Section 1983. The fatal flaws identified by the Court may be readily remedied, at least as to some of the individual DOCS defendants. Accordingly, plaintiffs may amend their complaint with respect to these defendants within thirty days of the date of this Order.")

Bradley v. Rell, No. 1:07-CV-0148 (GTS/RFT), 2010 WL 1257868, at *5 (N.D.N.Y. Mar. 26, 2010) ("As have other Circuits, the Second Circuit has recognized that the clarified plausibility standard that was articulated by the Supreme Court in Twombly governs all claims, including claims brought by pro se litigants (although the plausibility of those claims is to be assessed generously, in light of the special solicitude normally afforded pro se litigants). . . It should be emphasized that Fed.R.Civ.P. 8's plausibility standard, explained in Twombly, was in no way retracted or diminished by the Supreme Court's decision (two weeks later) in Erickson v. Pardus, in which (when reviewing a pro se pleading) the Court stated, "Specific facts are not necessary" to successfully state a claim under Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(2). . .That statement was merely an abbreviation of the often-repeated point of law–first offered in Conley and repeated in Twombly–that a pleading need not 'set out in detail the facts upon which [the claim is based]' in order to successfully state a claim. . . That statement did not mean that all pleadings may achieve the requirement of 'fair notice' without ever alleging any facts whatsoever. Clearly, there must still be enough fact set out (however set out, whether in detail or in a generalized fashion) to raise a right to relief above the speculative level to a plausible level.").

Valenti v. Massapequa Union Free School Dist., No. 09-CV-977 (JFB)(MLO), 2010 WL 475203, at *4 n.5 (E.D.N.Y. Feb. 5, 2010) ("The recent Supreme Court decisions in Iqbal and Twombly do not obviate this standard. Indeed, the Court in Twombly explicitly reaffirmed Swierkiewicz. 550 U.S. at 570 (citing Swierkiewicz, 534 U.S. at 508); see also Boykin v. Key Corp., 521 F.3d 202, 213 (2d Cir.2008) (noting that the Twombly Court "affirmed the vitality of Swierkiewicz"); Gilman v. Inner City Broadcasting Corp., No. 08 Civ. 8909(LAP), 2009 WL 3003244, at 3 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 18, 2009) (" Iqbal* was not meant to displace Swierkiewicz's teachings about pleading standards for employment discrimination claims because in Twombly, which heavily informed Iqbal, the Supreme Court explicitly affirmed the vitality of Swierkiewicz.").").

Kregler v. City of New York, No. 08 Civ. 6893(VM), 2009 WL 2524628, at 7-9, *12 (S.D.N.Y Aug. 17, 2009) ("Fundamentally, the 'plausibility' standard that the Supreme Court articulated in Twombly and Iqbal reflect [sic] one judicial means to part the wheat from the chaff in assessing the sufficiency of pleadings. Yet, as the case at hand illustrates and the law reports amply record, the problem persists, a sign of an intrinsic tension built into the federal rules. Whether in their factual allegations as originally crafted, or upon being granted leave to replead deficient claims, seasoned plaintiffs' counsel know to charge the pleadings with enough adjectives that reverberate of extreme malice, improper motives, and bad faith to raise factual issues sufficient to survive a dispositive motion, thus securing a hold on the defendant strong enough for the duration, however long and costly the ultimate resolution of the claim be. In practical terms, the philosophy of pleading that these rules embody, a one-rule-fits-all principle, defines the scope of the problem engendered by its unintended outcomes. . . . In consequence, the Court's Rule 12(i) hearing represented an effort to employ an infrequently used procedure to bring about speedier and better-informed resolution of a motion to dismiss involving serious accusations of violations of constitutional rights leveled against high-ranking government officials. This endeavor accords with guidance by the Supreme Court and the Second Circuit instructing district courts to exercise their broad discretion to guard public officials from being 'subjected to unnecessary and burdensome discovery or trial proceedings.'. . . As scheduled, the hearing was limited to two threshold issues raised in Defendants' objections to the pleadings in the Amended Complaint: the absence of sufficient allegations of personal involvement by various individual defendants in making the decision to reject Kregler's application, and lack of a causal connection between Kregler's endorsement of Morgenthau and the rejection of his application for appointment as a City Marshal. These questions constitute fundamental aspects of a sufficient claim of First Amendment retaliation, and are thus decisive in any review of whether the pleadings, as amplified by the pertinent record of the preliminary hearing, satisfy the Twombly/ Iqbal plausibility standard. To summarize its purpose and scope, Rule 12(i) authorizes the Court to conduct a preliminary hearing to consider and decide before trial a motion raising any defense listed in Rule 12(b)(1)-(7). See Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(i). As appropriate, the Court may use that procedure to determine jurisdictional as well as other threshold issues. . . . Here, on repleading to address deficiencies in the original complaint, Kregler described the threshold issues either in conclusory terms or with generalized allegations which still require substantial inferential leaps to make his claims plausible, rather than with well-pleaded facts that, accepted as true, plausibly suggest Defendants' retaliatory misconduct as the likely explanation for their rejection of Kregler's application. The Rule 12(i) hearing, even limiting the Court's consideration solely to Kregler's testimony on direct and cross-examination, confirms the Court's finding in this regard. . . . In terms of time, it took approximately five months from the Court's preliminary decision to order the Rule 12(i) hearing to the disposition of the case by the instant ruling. Thus, the Court was able to resolve this matter in a far shorter time than would have been required if it had denied Defendants' original motion to dismiss by reason of the closeness of the call at the initial review and thereby permitting the litigation to proceed into lengthier discovery and probably more time-consuming summary judgment motions– a process which, given the type of case involved, in this District would ordinarily consume as much as two years of litigation to conclude with the Court's determination.").

THIRD CIRCUIT

Hildebrand v. Allegheny County, No. 13–1321, 2014 WL 2898527, *11 (3d Cir. June 26, 2014) ("The District Court erred by applying Iqbal and Twombly to Hildebrand's pleading of the conditions precedent to filing suit under the ADEA. Iqbal and Twombly interpreted Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a), which governs the standard for pleading a claim for relief. The pleading of conditions precedent is governed by Rule 9(c), not Rule 8(a). Neither Iqbal nor Twombly purport to alter Rule 9. We see no indication that those cases sought to override the plain language of Rule 9(c), and we therefore conclude that the pleading of conditions precedent falls outside the strictures of Iqbal and Twombly.")

Lawal v. McDonald, 546 F. App'x 107, 113, 114 (3d Cir. 2014) ("As the District Court observed, the repeated and collective use of the word 'Defendants' 'fail[ed] to name which specific Defendant engaged in the specific conduct alleged.'. . As a result, the Amended Complaint is ambiguous about each Defendant's role in the operation and whether he committed the act himself or supervised other agents in doing so. In using the collective 'Defendants,' Plaintiffs alleged that each of the Defendants: (a) directed the PPA to send the letters to Plaintiffs advising them that they were entitled to a refund, to be picked up at the PPA facility; (b) attacked each driver, throwing him against a wall and handcuffing him; (c) was told by Plaintiffs that Plaintiffs were citizens; (d) interrogated each Plaintiff for more than one hour; (e) acknowledged to each Plaintiff that he 'had been mistakenly detained,' but (f) told them they were not permitted to leave; (g) held the Plaintiffs for several additional hours; and (h) prohibited them from speaking or standing. There is a serious question as to whether it is plausible that each of the three defendants committed all of the acts ascribed to them, particularly given the number of other individuals brought to the facility during the operation and the affidavits submitted with Defendants' motion to dismiss. . . In light of these ambiguities, the Amended Complaint may fail to meet Iqbal's directive that 'a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.'. .Moreover, given the very narrow potential claim upon which relief may be granted, it is difficult for Defendants to determine which of them are alleged to have held or directed others to hold Plaintiffs after their U.S. citizenship was verified and they were no longer suspected of violating the immigration laws. To the extent Plaintiffs seek to proceed on a theory of supervisory liability, the pleading likely requires further factual assertions linking the direction or act of an individual defendant to the alleged unconstitutional conduct. . .Thus, to resolve the ambiguity regarding the precise actions each individual Defendant allegedly took, we will provide Plaintiffs a final opportunity to file a pleading that provides the factual enhancements that specify the acts each individual Defendant . . . allegedly took, explains whether each Defendant personally engaged in the acts or if the actions were taken at the specific Defendant's direction, and includes facts concerning the reasonableness of Plaintiffs' detention. Of course, such a pleading must comply with Fed.R.Civ.P. 11. If Plaintiffs choose to file a Second Amended Complaint, the District Court will be free to entertain another motion to dismiss before permitting any discovery and determine whether Plaintiffs have alleged facts that demonstrate a specific Defendant plausibly engaged in an unreasonable seizure after they verified Plaintiffs' citizenship status, and, even if sufficiently alleged, whether the specific Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.")

James v. City of Wilkes-Barre, 700 F.3d 675, 680-682 (3d Cir. 2012) ("Mrs. James's assertion that she 'justifiably and reasonably believ[ed] herself compelled by law' to comply with Officer Marshall's request does not alter our conclusion. . . . By crediting these allegations, the District Court assumed that Mrs. James was 'compelled' to accompany her daughter to the hospital. This was error because whether she was in fact 'compelled' to do so is a legal conclusion. At the motion to dismiss stage, we accept as true all factual assertions, but we disregard threadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action, legal conclusions, and conclusory statements. . . Although Mrs. James asks us to accept as fact her assertion that she 'justifiably and reasonably believ[ed] herself compelled by law,' in reality it is a legal conclusion artfully pleaded as a factual assertion, which is not entitled to a presumption of truth. . . As far as relevant factual averments go, the Complaint pleads only that the officers 'insisted' that one parent accompany Nicole. As we have explained, insistence alone is insufficient to constitute a seizure under the Fourth Amendment. . . . The only fact that might point toward a seizure is Officer Marshall's threat that Mr. and Mrs. James would be charged with assisted manslaughter if they prevented Nicole from going to the hospital and she actually committed suicide. But that threat was not made in connection with Mrs. James's decision to accompany Nicole to the hospital; rather, it was made in the context of the parents agreeing to send Nicole to the hospital in the first place, which does not implicate a restriction on Mrs. James's freedom of movement. . . .For the reasons stated, we hold that Mrs. James was not seized in violation of the Fourth Amendment. Having found no constitutional violation, we hold that Officer Marshall is entitled to qualified immunity.")

Bistrian v. Levi, 696 F.3d 352, 368-71(3d Cir. 2012) ("After stripping away conclusory allegations not entitled to the presumption of truth, we conclude that Bistrian states a plausible failure-to-protect claim against the ten Prison Management Defendants, Lts. Rodgers and Robinson, and Sr. Officer Bowns based on Bistrian's placement in the recreation yard with Northington and his gang. First, Bistrian alleges that putting him in a locked recreation area with Northington et al. posed a substantial risk of serious harm because (a) Northington and others knew of Bistrian's cooperation with prison officials plus (b) Northington had a violent criminal past and had previously threatened to attack Bistrian in the recreation yard because of that cooperation. Second, Bistrian alleges that officials were deliberately indifferent to the obvious risk posed because they made no attempt to prevent his placement in the yard with Northington despite the fact that he (Bistrian) repeatedly advised the officials responsible for the photocopying operation of the threats Northington and others made. Third, Bistrian pleads causation: Northington and two other inmates violently attacked him on June 30, 2006 in the recreation yard because he cooperated with prison officials, not for some other reason. We consider the supporting factual allegations in further detail. . . . [T]he alleged number of tortfeasors in this case does not undermine the plausibility of the underlying torts. In Young v. Quinlan, we allowed an inmate's failure-to-protect claim to proceed past summary judgment when, among other things, he claimed to have 'told [ten named prison officials] several times that he was concerned for his safety and needed to be placed in protective custody,' and each of these ten officials had failed to respond reasonably to stop the assaults by other inmates. . . Here too the fact that Bistrian claims to have specifically warned eight officials of the risks he faced does not transform his allegations into impermissible 'group pleading.'. . . In sum, Bistrian has stated a plausible claim that thirteen officials violated their constitutional duty to protect him from inmate violence by being deliberately indifferent to the risk posed by his placement in the recreation yard with Northington and others who knew of his prior complicity with prison authorities. If this claim fails to survive a motion to dismiss, little does.")

Green v. New Jersey, No. 12–1517, 2012 WL 3641995, *1, *2 (3d Cir. Aug. 27, 2012) (not published) ("We agree with the District Court that, as drafted, the complaint fails to state a claim on which relief may be granted. To avoid dismissal, a complaint's '[f]actual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.'. . The complaint 'must not be "so undeveloped that it does not provide a defendant the type of notice of claim which is contemplated by [Fed.R.Civ.P. 8]"'. . . Green's complaint fails to satisfy these standards. . . Nevertheless, prior to dismissing a pro se complaint under § 1915(e), a District Court must give the plaintiff an opportunity to amend his pleading to cure the defect unless such an amendment would be inequitable or futile. . . The District Court neither informed Green that he could amend his complaint, nor did it determine that any amendment would be inequitable or futile. On the current record, we cannot exclude the possibility that Green, who is litigating his case pro se, might plead additional facts in an amended complaint that will state a claim for relief. Thus, while we express no view as to whether Green will ultimately plead any meritorious claims, we conclude that the District Court erred in dismissing the complaint without providing Green leave to amend. Accordingly, we will summarily vacate the District Court's order dismissing the case with prejudice and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Burtch v. Milberg Factors, Inc., No. 10-2818, 2011 WL 5027511, at *5 (3d Cir. Oct. 24, 2011)("To determine the sufficiency of a complaint under Twombly and Iqbal, we must take the following three steps: First, the court must 'tak[e] note of the elements a plaintiff must plead to state a claim.' Second, the court should identify allegations that, 'because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to the assumption of truth.' Finally, 'where there are well-pleaded factual allegations, a court should assume their veracity and then determine whether they plausibly give rise to an entitlement for relief.'")

Argueta v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, 643 F.3d 60, 72, 74-77 (3d Cir. 2011) ("[W]e assume for purposes of this appeal that a federal supervisory official may be liable in certain circumstances even though he or she did not directly participate in the underlying unconstitutional conduct. The District Court specifically concluded that a Fourth Amendment claim does not require a showing of a discriminatory purpose and that Plaintiffs could therefore proceed under a 'knowledge and acquiescence' theory. Plaintiffs acknowledge that the 'terminology' used to describe 'supervisory liability' is 'often mixed.'. . They contend that a supervisor may be held liable in certain circumstances for a failure to train, supervise, and discipline subordinates. . . . We accordingly stated in a § 1983 action that '[p]ersonal involvement can be shown through allegations of personal direction or of actual knowledge and acquiescence.' Rode v. Dellarciprete, 845 F.2d 1195, 1207 (3d Cir.1988). . . We further indicated that a supervisor may be liable under § 1983 if he or she implements a policy or practice that creates an unreasonable risk of a constitutional violation on the part of the subordinate and the supervisor's failure to change the policy or employ corrective practices is a cause of this unconstitutional conduct. . . . Having addressed the legal elements that a plaintiff must plead to state a legally cognizable claim, we turn to the remaining steps identified by Iqbal: (1) identifying those allegations that, because they are no more than conclusions, are not entitled to any assumption of truth; and (2) then determining whether the well-pleaded factual allegations plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief. . . We acknowledge that Plaintiffs filed an extensive and carefully drafted pleading, which certainly contained a number of troubling allegations especially with respect to alleged unconstitutional behavior on the part of lower-ranking ICE agents. Plaintiffs are also correct that, even after Iqbal, we must continue to accept all factual allegations as true, construe the complaint in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, and then determine whether a reasonable inference may be drawn that the defendant is liable for the alleged misconduct. . . .[W]e ultimately conclude that, like Iqbal, Plaintiffs failed to allege a plausible Bivens claim against the four Appellants. Initially, certain allegations in the Second Amended Complaint were conclusory in nature and merely provided, at best, a 'framework' for the otherwise appropriate factual allegations. . . For instance, the broad allegations regarding the existence of a 'culture of lawlessness' are accorded little if any weight in our analysis. . . We further note that the relevant counts in the pleading contained boilerplate allegations mimicking the purported legal standards for liability, which we do not assume to be true. We also must reject certain broad characterizations made by the District Court, which were not supported by either the actual factual allegations in the Second Amended Complaint or reasonable inferences from such allegations. Most significantly, the District Court went too far by stating that Myers and Torres 'worked on these issues everyday.'. . Turning to the non-conclusory factual allegations in the Second Amended Complaint, we begin with the critical issue of notice. Plaintiffs did reference an impressive amount of documentation that allegedly provided notice to Appellants of their subordinates' unconstitutional conduct. However, these alleged sources of notice were fatally flawed in one way or another. Broadly speaking, we must point out the typical 'notice' case seems to involve a prior incident or incidents of misconduct by a specific employee or group of employees, specific notice of such misconduct to their superiors, and then continued instances of misconduct by the same employee or employees. The typical case accordingly does not involve a 'knowledge and acquiescence' claim premised, for instance, on reports of subordinate misconduct in one state followed by misconduct by totally different subordinates in a completely different state. . . . Second, we observe that allegations specifically directed against Appellants themselves (unlike the allegations directed at the agents who actually carried out the raids) described conduct consistent with otherwise lawful behavior. . . In other words, a federal official specifically charged with enforcing federal immigration law appears to be acting lawfully when he or she increases arrest goals, praises a particular enforcement operation as a success, or characterizes a home entry and search as an attempt to locate someone (i.e., a fugitive alien). In fact, the qualified immunity doctrine exists to encourage vigorous and unflinching enforcement of the law. . . .We also agree with Appellants' assertion that Plaintiffs themselves did not really identify in their pleading what exactly Appellants should have done differently, whether with respect to specific training programs or other matters, that would have prevented the unconstitutional conduct. . . . We also cannot overlook the fact that Appellants themselves occupied relatively high-ranking positions in the federal hierarchy. . . .[T]he context here involved, at the very least, two very high-ranking federal officials based in Washington D.C. who were charged with supervising the enforcement of federal immigration law throughout the country (as well as two other officials responsible for supervising such enforcement throughout an entire state). . . . [W]e wish to emphasize that our ruling here does not leave Plaintiffs without any legal remedy for the alleged violation of the United States Constitution. Chavez, Galindo, and W.C. are still free to pursue their official capacity claims for injunctive relief against any further intimidation or unlawful entry into their home. Also, we do not address Plaintiffs' individual capacity claims for damages against the lower-ranking ICE agents named in the Second Amended Complaint.") Santiago v. Warminster Tp., 629 F.3d 121, 128-34 & n.8, n.10 (3d Cir. 2010) ("While we conclude that the Third Amended Complaint can be read as alleging liability based on the Supervising Officers' own acts, we will nevertheless affirm the District Court's ruling because those allegations fail to meet the pleading requirements set forth by the Supreme Court in Twombly and *Iqbal. . . . [A]ny claim that supervisors directed others to violate constitutional rights necessarily includes as an element an actual violation at the hands of subordinates. In addition, a plaintiff must allege a causal connection between the supervisor's direction and that violation, or, in other words, proximate causation. . . . Therefore, to state her claim against Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly, Santiago needs to have pled facts plausibly demonstrating that they directed Alpha Team to conduct the operation in a manner that they 'knew or should reasonably have known would cause [Alpha Team] to deprive [Santiago] of her constitutional rights.'. . .As to her claim against Lt. Springfield, Santiago must allege facts making it plausible that 'he had knowledge of [Alpha Team's use of excessive force during the raid]' and 'acquiesced in [Alpha Team's] violations.'. . . Numerous courts, including this one, have expressed uncertainty as to the viability and scope of supervisory liability after *Iqbal. . . . Because we hold that Santiago's pleadings fail even under our existing supervisory liability test, we need not decide whether Iqbal requires us to narrow the scope of that test. . . . Santiago alleges that the plan developed and authorized by Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly 'specifically sought to have all occupants exit the Plaintiff's home, one at a time, with hands raised under threat of fire, patted down for weapons, and then handcuffed until the home had been cleared and searched.' Because this is nothing more than a recitation of what Santiago says the Alpha Team members did to her, it amounts to a conclusory assertion that what happened at the scene was ordered by the supervisors. While the allegations regarding Alpha

Team's conduct are factual and more than merely the recitation of the elements of a cause of action, the allegation of supervisory liability is, in essence, that 'Murphy and Donnelly told Alpha team to do what they did' and is thus a 'formulaic recitation of the elements of a [supervisory liability] claim,' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct.. at 1951 (internal quotation marks omitted)–namely that Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly directed others in the violation of Santiago's rights. Saying that Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly 'specifically sought' to have happen what allegedly happened does not alter the fundamentally conclusory character of the allegation. . . Our conclusion in this regard is dictated by the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal. . . . In short, Santiago's allegations are 'naked assertion[s]' that Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly directed Alpha Team to conduct the operation in the allegedly excessive manner that they did and that Lt. Springfield acquiesced in Alpha Team's acts. As mere restatements of the elements of her supervisory liability claims, they are not entitled to the assumption of truth. However, it is crucial to recognize that our determination that these particular allegations do not deserve an assumption of truth does not end the analysis. It may still be that Santiago's supervisory liability claims are plausible in light of the non-conclusory factual allegations in the complaint. We therefore turn to those allegations to determine whether the claims are plausible. . . . In summary, the allegations against Alpha Team are that the officers ordered everyone to exit the house one at a time; that Santiago exited first under threat of fire; that Santiago was patted down in a demeaning fashion, found to be unarmed, and subsequently handcuffed; that the remaining occupants of the home then exited, some of whom were handcuffed while others were not; that Santiago's daughter was coerced into consenting to a search of the home; and that Santiago was left restrained for thirty minutes while her home was searched, during which time she had a heart attack. The question then becomes whether those allegations make it plausible that Chief Murphy and Lt. Donnelly directed Alpha Team to conduct the operation in a manner that they 'knew or should reasonably have known would cause [Alpha Team] to deprive [Santiago] of her constitutional rights,'. . . or that Lt. Springfield 'had knowledge [that Alpha Team was using excessive force during the raid]' and 'acquiesced in [Alpha Team's] violations.'. . . [T]here is no basis in the complaint to conclude that excessive force was used on anyone except Santiago. Even if someone else had been subjected to excessive force, it is clear that the occupants were not being treated uniformly. Thus, Santiago's allegations undercut the notion of a plan for all occupants to be threatened with fire and handcuffed. While it is possible that there was such a plan, and that Alpha Team simply chose not to follow it, 'possibility' is no longer the touchstone for pleading sufficiency after Twombly and Iqbal. Plausibility is what matters. Allegations that are 'merely consistent with a defendant's liability' or show the 'mere possibility of misconduct' are not enough. . . Here, given the disparate treatment of the occupants of the home, one plausible explanation is that the officers simply used their own discretion in determining how to treat each occupant. In contrast with that 'obvious alternative explanation' for the allegedly excessive use of force, the inference that the force was planned is not plausible. Where, as here, an operation results in the use of allegedly excessive force against only one of several people, that use of force does not, by itself, give rise to a plausible claim for supervisory liability against those who planned the operation. To hold otherwise would allow a plaintiff to pursue a supervisory liability claim anytime a planned operation resulted in excessive force, merely by describing the force used and appending the phrase 'and the Chief told them to do it.' Iqbal requires more. . . . We next ask whether the allegation that Lt. Springfield was placed in charge of the operation, coupled with what happened during the operation, makes it plausible that Lt. Springfield knew of and acquiesced in the use of excessive force against Santiago. Again, we conclude that it does not. The complaint implies but does not allege that Lt. Springfield was present during the operation. Assuming he was present, however, the complaint still does not aver that he knew of the allegedly excessive force, nor does it give rise to the reasonable inference that he was aware of the level of force used against one individual. . . . In sum, while Santiago's complaint contains sufficient allegations to show that the Supervising Officers planned and supervised the operation and that, during the operation, Alpha Team used arguably excessive force, her allegations do nothing more than assert the element of liability that the Supervising Officers specifically called for or acquiesced in that use of force. . . . The Third Amended Complaint was filed after the close of discovery. Consequently, there is no reason to believe that Santiago's conclusory allegations were simply the result of the relevant evidence being in the hands of the defendants. Under *Iqbal, however, the result would be the same even had no discovery been completed. We recognize that plaintiffs may face challenges in drafting claims despite an information asymmetry between plaintiffs and defendants. Given that reality, reasonable minds may take issue with Iqbal and urge a different balance between ensuring, on the one hand, access to the courts so that victims are able to obtain recompense and, on the other, ensuring that municipalities and police officers are not unnecessarily subjected to the burdens of litigation. . . The Supreme Court has struck the balance, however, and we abide by it.")

West Penn Allegheny Health System, Inc. v. UPMC, 627 F.3d 85, 98 (3d Cir. 2010) ("The District Court opined that judges presiding over antitrust and other complex cases must act as 'gatekeepers,' and must subject pleadings in such cases to heightened scrutiny. The District Court's gloss on Rule 8, however, is squarely at odds with Supreme Court precedent. Although Twombly acknowledged that discovery in antitrust cases 'can be expensive,' . . . it expressly rejected the notion that a ' "heightened" pleading standard' applies in antitrust cases. . . and Iqbal made clear that Rule 8's pleading standard applies with the same level of rigor in ' "all civil actions[]"'. . . . It is, of course, true that judging the sufficiency of a pleading is a context-dependent exercise. . . Some claims require more factual explication than others to state a plausible claim for relief. . . For example, it generally takes fewer factual allegations to state a claim for simple battery than to state a claim for antitrust conspiracy. . . But, contrary to the able District Court's suggestion, this does not mean that Twombly's plausibility standard functions more like a probability requirement in complex cases. We conclude that it is inappropriate to apply Twombly's plausibility standard with extra bite in antitrust and other complex cases.")

In re Insurance Brokerage Antitrust Litigation, 618 F.3d 300, 319 n.17 (3d Cir. 2010 ("Although Fowler v. UPMC Shadyside, 578 F.3d 203 (3d Cir.2009), stated that Twombly and Iqbal had 'repudiated' the Supreme Court's earlier decision in Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 122 S.Ct. 992, 152 L.Ed.2d 1 (2002), see Fowler, 578 F.3d at 211, we are not so sure. Clearly, Twombly and Iqbal inform our understanding of Swierkiewicz, but the Supreme Court cited Swierkiewicz approvingly in Twombly, see 550 U.S. at 555-56, 127 S.Ct. 1955, and expressly denied the plaintiffs' charge that Swierkiewicz 'runs counter' to Twombly's plausibility standard, id. at 569-70, 127 S.Ct. 1955. As the Second Circuit has observed, Twombly 'emphasized that its holding was consistent with [the Court's] ruling in Swierkiewicz that "a heightened pleading requirement," requiring the pleading of "specific facts beyond those necessary to state [a] claim and the grounds showing entitlement to relief," was "impermissibl[e]."' Arista Records, 604 F.3d at 120 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 570, 127 S.Ct. 1955 (alterations in Arista Records).) In any event, Fowler's reference to Swierkiewicz appears to be dicta, as Fowler found the complaint before it to be adequate. 578 F.3d at 212; see also id. at 211 ('The demise of Swierkiewicz, however, is not of significance here.')").

Fowler v. UPMC Shadyside, 578 F.3d 203, 209, 210 (3d Cir. 2009) ("Standards of pleading have been in the forefront of jurisprudence in recent years. Beginning with the Supreme Court's opinion in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007), continuing with our opinion in Phillips, supra., and culminating recently with the Supreme Court's decision in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, __ U.S. __, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1955, 173 L.Ed.2d 868 (2009), pleading standards have seemingly shifted from simple notice pleading to a more heightened form of pleading, requiring a plaintiff to plead more than the possibility of relief to survive a motion to dismiss. . . . The Supreme Court's opinion in Iqbal extends the reach of Twombly, instructing that all civil complaints must contain 'more than an unadorned, the-defendant-unlawfully-harmed-me accusation.'. . Therefore, after Iqbal, when presented with a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, district courts should conduct a two-part analysis. First, the factual and legal elements of a claim should be separated. The District Court must accept all of the complaint's well-pleaded facts as true, but may disregard any legal conclusions. . . Second, a District Court must then determine whether the facts alleged in the complaint are sufficient to show that the plaintiff has a 'plausible claim for relief.'. . Inasmuch as this is an employment discrimination case, we asked the parties to comment on the continued viability of the Supreme Court's decision in Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 122 S.Ct. 992, 152 L.Ed.2d 1 (2002). In Swierkiewicz, the Supreme Court held that a complaint alleging unlawful employment discrimination did not have to satisfy a heightened pleading requirement. The complaint in that case was said to be sufficient because it 'detailed the events leading to [the plaintiff's] termination, provided relevant dates, and included the ages and nationalities of at least some of the relevant persons involved with his termination.'. . The Supreme Court in Swierkiewicz expressly adhered to Conley's then-prevailing 'no set of facts' standard and held that the complaint did not have to satisfy a heightened standard of pleading. . . Swierkiewicz and Iqbal both dealt with the question of what sort of factual allegations of discrimination suffice for a civil lawsuit to survive a motion to dismiss, but Swierkiewicz is based, in part, on Conley, which the Supreme Court cited for the proposition that Rule 8 'relies on liberal discovery rules and summary judgment motions to define disputed facts and issues and to dispose of unmeritorious claims.'. .We have to conclude, therefore, that because Conley has been specifically repudiated by both Twombly and Iqbal, so too has Swierkiewicz, at least insofar as it concerns pleading requirements and relies on Conley. . . The demise of Swierkiewicz, however, is not of significance here. We had already extended our holding in Phillips, to the employment discrimination context. In Wilkerson v. New Media Technology Charter School, Inc., 522 F.3d 315 (3d Cir.2008), a terminated charter-school teacher brought an action claiming that she was fired for retaliation and her religious beliefs. The teacher pleaded that she was fired because of her ' AChristian religious beliefs," her refusal to engage in the Alibations ceremony," and her Acomplaints related to the ceremony."'. . We held that the 'plausibility paradigm announced in Twombly applies with equal force to analyzing the adequacy of claims of employment discrimination.'").

Wilkerson v. New Media Technology Charter School Inc., 522 F.3d 315, 322 (3rd Cir. 2008) ("Today, we extend our holding in Phillips to the employment discrimination context. The plausibility paradigm announced in Twombly applies with equal force to analyzing the adequacy of claims of employment discrimination.").

Phillips v. County of Allegheny, 515 F.3d 224, 230-34 (3rd Cir. 2008) ("What makes Twombly's impact on the Rule 12(b)(6) standard initially so confusing is that it introduces a new 'plausibility' paradigm for evaluating the sufficiency of complaints. At the same time, however, the Supreme Court never said that it intended a drastic change in the law, and indeed strove to convey the opposite impression; even in rejecting Conley's 'no set of facts' language, the Court does not appear to have believed that it was really changing the Rule 8 or Rule 12(b)(6) framework. . . . In determining how Twombly has changed this standard, we start with what Twombly expressly leaves intact. The Supreme Court reaffirmed that Fed.R.Civ.P. 8 ' Arequires only a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief," in order to Agive the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests,"' and that this standard does not require 'detailed factual allegations.' . . . [T]he Twombly decision focuses our attention on the 'context' of the required short, plain statement. Context matters in notice pleading. Fair notice under Rule 8(a)(2) depends on the type of case–some complaints will require at least some factual allegations to make out a 'showing that the pleader is entitled to relief, in order to give the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.' Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1964. Indeed, taking Twombly and the Court's contemporaneous opinion in Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197 (2007), together, we understand the Court to instruct that a situation may arise where, at some point, the factual detail in a complaint is so undeveloped that it does not provide a defendant the type of notice of claim which is contemplated by Rule 8. . . . The second important concept we take from the Twombly opinion is the rejection of Conley's 'no set of facts' language. In rejecting the Conley language, the Supreme Court was careful to base its analysis in pre-existing principles. . .The Court emphasized throughout its opinion that it was neither demanding a heightened pleading of specifics nor imposing a probability requirement. . . Indeed, the Court cited Twombly just days later as authority for traditional Rule 8 and 12(b)(6) principles. See Erickson, 127 S.Ct. at 2200. Thus, under our reading, the notice pleading standard of Rule 8(a)(2) remains intact, and courts may generally state and apply the Rule 12(b)(6) standard, attentive to context and an showing that 'the pleader is entitled to relief, in order to give the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests.' Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1964. . . . The more difficult question raised by Twombly is whether the Supreme Court imposed a new 'plausibility' requirement at the pleading stage that materially alters the notice pleading regime. . . The answer to this question is difficult to divine. Numerous references to 'plausibility' in Twombly seem to counsel reliance on the concept as a standard for notice pleading. . . . Yet, the Twombly decision repeatedly indicated that the Court was not adopting or applying a 'heightened pleading standard.'. . . The issues raised by Twombly are not easily resolved, and likely will be a source of controversy for years to come. Therefore, we decline at this point to read Twombly so narrowly as to limit its holding on plausibility to the antitrust context. Reading Twombly to impose a 'plausibility' requirement outside the § 1 context, however, leaves us with the question of what it might mean. 'Plausibility' is related to the requirement of a Rule 8 'showing.' In its general discussion, the Supreme Court explained that the concept of a 'showing' requires only notice of a claim and its grounds, and distinguished such a showing from 'a pleader's Abare averment that he wants relief and is entitled to it."' Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1965 n. 3. . . . The Supreme Court's Twombly formulation of the pleading standard can be summed up thus: 'stating ... a claim requires a complaint with enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest' the required element. Id. This 'does not impose a probability requirement at the pleading stage,' but instead 'simply calls for enough facts to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of' the necessary element. . . . That is to say, there must be some showing sufficient to justify moving the case beyond the pleadings to the next stage of litigation. The complaint at issue in this case clearly satisfies this pleading standard, making a sufficient showing of enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest the required elements of Phillips' claims.").

Mitchell v. Township of Willingboro Municipality Government, 913 F.Supp.2d 62, 67, 68, 72 (D.N.J. 2012) ("The Third Circuit has cautioned against dismissing a case based on qualified immunity on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion because 'it is generally unwise to venture into a qualified immunity analysis at the pleading stage as it is necessary to develop the factual record in the vast majority of cases.' Newland v. Reehorst, 328 F. App'x 788, 791 n. 3 (3d Cir.2009). While the issue of whether a right is clearly established and whether a reasonable officer could have believed his actions were lawful are questions of law for the court to decide, the Court does not consider facts outside the pleadings in assessing these issues. The Third Circuit has clearly held that 'qualified immunity will be upheld on a 12(b)(6) motion only when the immunity is established on the face of the complaint.' Thomas v. Independence Township, 463 F.3d 285, 291 (3d Cir.2006). In this case, the court confirms its previous holding that the Plaintiff has sufficiently pled a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights by Defendant Perez. . . Plaintiff's complaint alleges that Officer Perez received a 9–1–1 dispatch call to pull over a blue Honda Accord with no license plates that had been speeding down a nearby road. Plaintiff alleges his car was a green Honda Accord with a Pennsylvania license plate and that he was not committing any traffic violations at the time he was pulled over by Officer Perez. Plaintiff further argues his Honda Accord had a rear Pennsylvania license plate and that Pennsylvania does not require a license plate on the front of the car. Plaintiff maintains Defendant Perez used the 9–1–1 dispatch call as a pretext to make the stop and Plaintiff avers the only reason he was pulled over was because he is an African American male. This sufficiently alleges a deprivation of a constitutional right and plausibly states a claim under the Fourth Amendment. With regard to the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis, it is well established that an officer must have an articulable and reasonable suspicion that the driver has committed a motor vehicle offense in order to conduct an investigatory stop. . . Defendant Perez does not argue that Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights in this case were not clearly established. Consequently, the Plaintiff's complaint satisfies the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis. Therefore, the court concludes it is inappropriate to dismiss this case on qualified immunity grounds at the pleading stage. Here, the immunity is not established on the face of the complaint. The Plaintiff adequately alleges a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights and these rights were clearly established at the time of the incident. . . . Therefore, since the law was clear at the time of the incident that reasonable suspicion was required to conduct an investigatory stop, Defendant Perez can be granted qualified immunity only if his conduct in stopping Plaintiff's car was a violation a reasonable officer could have committed. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff as the non-moving party, the court concludes a reasonable officer would not have conducted an investigatory stop of the Plaintiff in this situation and a jury could conclude reasonable suspicion did not exist.")

Zenquis v. City of Philadelphia, 861 F.Supp.2d 522, 529 (E.D. Pa. 2012) ("To support the inference of an agreement among the officer defendants and the private individuals who assaulted him, Zenquis relies principally on the allegation that the private individuals 'had spoken to at least one or more of the individual [police] defendants, and were told ... that they should detain [Zenquis] and that they would be permitted to use force against [Zenquis].'. . This is consistent with and buttressed by the allegations, earlier in the amended complaint, that at least some of the officer defendants were canvassing the Kensington neighborhood for several hours prior to the assault, advising private citizens (including both the perpetrators of the alleged assault and others) to use force to detain Zenquis. . . Finally, the amended complaint alleges that 'civilians who spoke with the individual defendants ... received the clear message from the officers that they would be free to assault the plaintiff with impunity.'. . .Taken together, these allegations are adequate to state a claim for conspiracy. According to the complaint, the private individuals who assaulted Zenquis were urged by the police to do so, were told they could use force to do so, and understood this to mean that they could assault Zenquis "with impunity." That is a sufficient basis, at the pleading stage, to ground an inference that there was an agreement between at least some of the officer defendants and the private actors to violate Zenquis's Fourth Amendment right against unreasonable seizure. In context, it is not implausible that the police would commit themselves to such an agreement during the frenetic search for a suspect wanted for a sensational crime; the plausibility of the conspiracy allegation is further bolstered by the allegation that the police licensed similar behavior in capturing the actual rapist the following day. At the very least, Zenquis has put the defendants on notice of the nature of the conspiracy claim with sufficiently detailed factual allegations to justify discovery.")

Morris v. Philadelphia Housing Authority, No. 10-5431, 2011 WL 1661506, at 3-5 (E.D. Pa. Apr. 28, 2011) ("District Court Judges have experienced difficulty in interpreting the Supreme Court's intent in Twombly and Iqbal. Particularly in the civil rights context, in Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence & Coordination Unit, the Supreme Court specifically held that notice pleading under Rule 8 was proper. . . The difficulty in following Leatherman is that its holding appears to be significantly undermined by Iqbal, yet Leatherman is not cited in either the majority or dissenting opinions of Iqbal. Further, before Twombly and Iqbal, the Third Circuit expressly held that the complaint in a civil rights case is subject to the liberal notice pleading standard of Rule 8(a). . . The Third Circuit has not yet issued a precedential opinion squaring its holding in Evancho with those of Twombly and Iqbal. but it did discuss the implications of Twomblv in Phillips, a § 1983 case. . . The undersigned, formerly a member of the Advisory Committee on Civil Rules, knows that many practitioners and judges share in the confusion resulting from *Iqbal'*s seemingly strong requirement of factual pleadings in the absence of any specific overruling of prior cases allowing traditional notice pleading. The Court concludes that notice pleading is still the rule, because Rule 8 is still in effect, but that the concept of notice pleading has changed and must be accompanied by either factual or legal assertions satisfying the elements of the claims made. . . In other words, 'notice pleading' now requires 'notice' of at least those facts necessary to raise an inference that Plaintiff has a claim. . . .The plausibility standard calls for enough facts to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence of the necessary elements of the claims. . . . Plaintiff's Complaint in its current form does not raise this reasonable expectation.")

RHJ Medical Center, Inc. v. City of DuBois, 754 F.Supp.2d 723, 731 -733 (W.D. Pa. 2010) ("While the Third Circuit has not definitively resolved this issue, a number of district courts within the Third Circuit, . . . as well as other Courts of Appeals . . . have applied the Iqbal standard to motions filed under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c). This Court is inclined to agree, though this decision will have several consequences that may not have been discussed elsewhere. For decades, granting a motion for judgment on the pleadings was only appropriate where the movant 'clearly establishes that no material issue of fact remains to be resolved and that he is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.'. . Generally, federal courts were reluctant to grant a Rule 12(c) Motion for Judgment on the Pleadings, because it provides for summary disposition of a party's claim on the merits before discovery. . . These prior standards mirrored the previous notice pleading standard articulated in Conley . . . but Iqbal changed the game. . . Iqbal effected not only motions to dismiss, but has also impacted motions for judgments on the pleading, and imported the higher burden of 'plausibility.' Applying the Iqbal standard will likely make it tougher for complaints to survive motions under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c). Yet, to do otherwise would frustrate Iqbal In many cases, motions filed under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c) and 12(b)(6) are complimentary and largely interchangeable–the key difference being that the right to file motions under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) is waived if an answer is filed. A plaintiff should not be able to benefit from a weaker standard and higher probability of success under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(c) than he would under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(6). The burden of proof on the Plaintiff should increase at each stage of litigation. . . . Iqbal has also impacted the manner in which courts must assess subject matter jurisdiction, even when considering a motion for judgment on the pleadings. Historically, when considering whether to dismiss a case for lack of subject matter jurisdiction under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(1), the Court generally 'must accept the allegations in the complaint as true and determine whether they are sufficient to invoke its jurisdiction.'. . Now, the Plaintiff 'has the burden of establishing that subject matter jurisdiction exists within the parameters of the "plausibility" standard established by Twombly and Iqbal when confronted with Defendant's 12(b)(1) motion to dismiss.'").

Major Tours, Inc. v. Colorel, 720 F.Supp.2d 587, 605, 606 (D.N.J. 2010) ("The Complaint contains abundant allegations of racially-motivated discrimination, which are summarized at the beginning at the first paragraph: 'Because of Plaintiffs' race, Defendants and their associates have targeted their buses for improper, illegal, and unreasonably burdensome stops, inspections, and seizures.' (Compl.¶ 1) Plaintiffs allege, among other things, that Defendants and their agents gathered near certain casinos known to have primarily African American clienteles in order to stop buses in a racially discriminatory manner (Id. ¶ 26); that Defendants exercised their discretion with racially discriminatory intentions, targeting Plaintiffs' buses for towing because of Plaintiffs' race (Id. ¶ 30); and that Defendants often require Plaintiffs–on account of their race–to have their buses towed away (Id. ¶ 34). Each of these is a specific allegation of a discriminatory act taken for racially discriminatory reasons, and supported by further allegations of white owned buses being subjected to differential treatment. Defendants maintain that these statements are too conclusory, but they are not. . . . Unlike the defendants in *Iqbal, Defendants in this case have offered no nondiscriminatory reason for any of the racially discriminatory behavior specifically alleged in the Complaint, nor is there any obvious nondiscriminatory explanation for the disparate treatment alleged by Plaintiffs. There is no obvious and lawful purpose that explains, for example, why inspectors would target casinos frequented by African Americans for bus safety inspections, or why they would permit white operated buses to repair violations on-site while requiring Plaintiffs to be towed. Rule 8 does not require plaintiffs who are pleading a pattern of racially discriminatory conduct to include all of the evidence that suggests that the conduct was a result of racially discriminatory intentions rather than the byproduct of some legitimate purpose. . . . Instead, they must simply allege enough facts to nudge the claim into the realm of the plausible. Therefore, the factual allegations in the current complaint regarding racially discriminatory purpose are sufficiently concrete with respect to the investigator defendants.")

Southersby Development Corp. v. Borough of Jefferson Hills, No. 09-208, 2010 WL 1576465, at *4 (W.D. Pa. Apr. 20, 2010) ("The Defendants initially challenged the sufficiency of the substantive due process claim made in Southersby's original Complaint. Before those first Motions to Dismiss could be considered, Southersby filed the Amended Complaint (Doc. 21), adding four paragraphs clearly intended to rectify any deficiencies in pleading the 'shocks the conscience' requirement: 22. Defendants' unequal and unlawful actions ... were motivated by bias against the plaintiff as a non-resident developer and intended to financially injure plaintiff in retaliation for exercising its constitutionally-protected right to contest Jefferson Hill's [sic] attempts to charge and collect certain legal escrow fees and storm and sanitary sewer tap fees relative to the development of Patriot Pointe. 23. Upon information and belief, McVicker and other agents of Jefferson Hills have personal or business relationships with land developers or individuals who reside in the Borough and who stand to gain a profit or benefit from the failure of the Patriot Pointe development or from the plaintiff [halting] further land development. 24. The defendants engaged in corruption and self-dealing such that their unlawful actions ... were motivated by an intent to harm the plaintiff and interfere with the development of Patriot for the purpose of benefitting, financially or otherwise, the defendants or resident land developers or individuals associated with the defendants, by deterring the plaintiff from seeking to develop other land within the Borough and causing the failure or foreclosure of Patriot Pointe. 38. Defendants' arbitrary and irrational actions ... involve corruption, self-dealing, gross abuse of official power, and interference with constitutionally protected activities of the plaintiff, and are so egregious that it shocks the conscience.The Defendants contend that these modifications, even considered against the background of the remaining allegations, constitute unsubstantiated conclusions that do not meet the Twombly/ Iqbal / Fowler plausibility standard. Thus, they say, Southersby has failed to allege conduct sufficiently egregious to shock the conscience, and its substantive due process claim fails. The Court agrees. Surviving a motion to dismiss requires more than raising a possibility of unlawful action. 'Where a complaint pleads facts that are merely consistent with a defendant's liability, it stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility of entitlement to relief.'. . Though Fed.R.Civ.P. 8 'makes a notable and generous departure from the hyper-technical, code-pleading regime of a prior era, ... it does not unlock the doors of discovery for a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions.'. . Measured against this standard, Southersby's allegations fall short. It is as though Southersby had stated that it is a cold day in Pittsburgh, without providing a basis for its conclusion. How do we know it is cold? Are passersby wearing heavy coats and turning up their collars? Is there snow in the air or frost on the windows? Similarly, here, Southersby states, without supporting facts, that the Defendants engaged in 'corruption' and 'self dealing,' two of the factors identified in Eichenlaub that may amount to 'conscience shocking' behavior. The allegations in the Amended Complaint raise, at most, the possibility of corruption and self dealing. The same is true with respect to facts regarding the Defendants' interference with other of Southersby's constitutional rights. . . As a result, it is impossible for the Court to find plausible the assertion of conscience shocking behavior. . . . Here, just as in Eichenlaub, the facts alleged support a claim based on improper motive, but are insufficient to state a substantive due process claim.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Clatterbuck v. City of Charlottesville, 708 F.3d 549, 560 (4th Cir. 2013) ("It is not implausible that the City singled out requests for immediate donations in an attempt to target the particular nuisance of beggars' speech but allow other types of solicitation to continue. We find Appellants' allegation a reasonable one, and must accept it as true at this stage. . . Thus, we find that Appellants have nudged their claim that the City enacted a content-based regulation, which is not the least restrictive means of furthering a compelling government interest, across the line from conceivable to plausible.")

De'lonta v. Johnson, 708 F.3d 520, 524-26 (4th Cir. 2013) ("De'lonta contends she has stated a valid constitutional claim because the Appellees' 'denial of consideration for sex reassignment surgery, when viewed against the backdrop of her medical history and circumstances, constitutes a deliberate indifference to her serious medical needs in violation of the Eighth Amendment.'. .Appellees counter that De'lonta's complaint fails to satisfy Twombly's plausibility requirement. While conceding that De'lonta's need for protection from self-mutilation is a serious medical need, Appellees assert that because De'lonta has never been prescribed sex reassignment surgery, she cannot allege that sex reassignment surgery is a serious medical need for the purposes of the Eighth Amendment. . . .Applying this two-prong Eighth Amendment standard, we first resolve that De'lonta has alleged an objectively serious medical need for protection against continued self-mutilation. . . .Next, we conclude that De'lonta's complaint sufficiently alleges Appellees' deliberate indifference to her serious medical need, and consequently, that the district court's dismissal was in error. . . .De'lonta alleges that, despite her repeated complaints to Appellees alerting them to the persistence of her symptoms and the inefficacy of her existing treatment, she has never been evaluated concerning her suitability for surgery. Instead, despite their knowledge that De'lonta's therapy sessions with Psychologist Lang actually provoked her 'overwhelming' urges to self-castrate, VDOC's medical staff's only response to De'lonta's requests for surgery was a 'request that you continue to work with Ms. Lang in individual therapy at this time.' These factual allegations, taken as true, state a plausible claim that Appellees 'actually kn[e]w of and disregard[ed]' De'lonta's serious medical need in contravention of the Eighth Amendment. . . .We wish to be clear about our holding. We hold only that De'lonta's Eighth Amendment claim is sufficiently plausible to survive screening pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1915A. We do not decide today the merits of De'lonta's claim. Nor, for that matter, do we mean to suggest what remedy De'lonta would be entitled to should she prevail. In our view, the answers to those questions have no bearing on whether De'lonta has stated a claim that Appellees have been deliberately indifferent to her serious medical need by refusing to evaluate her for surgery, consistent with the Standards of Care.")

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 385, 386 (4th Cir. 2013) ("The district court opined that Mr. Tobey's complaint 'is devoid of any facts suggesting that [Appellants]—neither of whom are law enforcement officers with the power of arrest—made any such assertion or otherwise indicated to the RIC police that Plaintiff should be arrested.'. . The district court further noted that 'Plaintiff's counsel conceded that the Complaint "doesn't say directly that [Plaintiff's arrest] was at the instruction of the TSA."'. . Fortunately for Mr. Tobey, he was not required to state these precise magical words in order to plausibly plead that Appellants caused his arrest. The Supreme Court reiterated in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly that a 'formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do.'. . Allegations have facial plausibility 'when the plaintiff pleads factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.'. .As the Supreme Court explained, Section 1983 (and by association Bivens) anticipates that a government official will be 'responsible for the natural consequences of his actions.'. . It is an undoubtedly natural consequence of reporting a person to the police that the person will be arrested; especially in the scenario we have here, where TSA and RIC police act in close concert. So long as Mr. Tobey's complaint rendered it plausible that Appellants helped effectuate his arrest, the district court should have factored the arrest into its decision as to whether Mr. Tobey alleged plausible Bivens claims against Appellants. When looking at Mr. Tobey's complaint and drawing all reasonable inferences in his favor, it is logical to assume that Appellants had a hand in his arrest. Mr. Tobey announced to Appellants his desire to peacefully protest TSA screening measures, and at that point, Appellants 'radioed for assistance.' Immediately thereafter, RIC police 'seized and handcuffed' Mr. Tobey from behind without further inquiry. It is reasonable to infer that whatever Appellants told RIC police caused Mr. Tobey's arrest. This inference is bolstered by the fact that Appellants silently stood by and watched RIC police arrest Mr. Tobey. The fact that Appellants do not have the power of arrest does not hurt Mr. Tobey, but helps him, as one can infer that Appellants radioed RIC police to arrest Mr. Tobey as they could not do it themselves. It may bear out after further discovery that Appellants radioed for assistance for innocuous reasons. It may also bear out that Appellants indicated to RIC police that they should arrest Mr. Tobey. Mr. Tobey's complaint raises a plausible inference that Appellants caused his arrest, and thus it was improper for the district court to find otherwise at the 12(b)(6) phase of litigation. The district court should have considered the entire course of events up to arrest when deciding whether to dismiss Mr. Tobey's Bivens actions against Appellants.")

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 402, 403 (4th Cir. 2013) (Wilkinson, J., dissenting) ("Tobey's suit fails for another, independent reason, and in rejecting this reason, the majority manages to flout a second body of Supreme Court precedent. In a recent line of decisions, the Court has held that a plaintiff must allege enough factual content in his complaint to render his legal claim for relief 'plausible on its face' in order to survive a motion to dismiss under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6). . . Tobey's complaint falls well short of this requirement, for it conclusorily asserts that defendants engaged in viewpoint discrimination without pleading so much as a single factual allegation that supports this conclusion. In short, by announcing a near-categorical rule that every complaint survives a motion to dismiss, the majority proceeds as if Twombly and Iqbal were purely advisory. The rules of pleading assume particular importance in the context of a damages action against a public official, especially one alleging that the official acted with an impermissible motive. The doctrine of qualified immunity and the rules of pleading are therefore mutually reinforcing: the former ensures that officials cannot be subjected to damages suits for making close judgment calls where the governing law was unclear, while the latter ensure that this defense cannot be defeated by a bare allegation of impermissible motive. . . . In light of these principles, it becomes clear that Tobey's complaint fails to allege a 'plausible' claim of viewpoint discrimination against defendants. . . . Tobey's allegation of viewpoint discrimination is barely distinguishable from the allegation of religious and racial discrimination that the Supreme Court rejected as conclusory in Iqbal. . . . Stripped of the conclusory allegation of viewpoint discrimination, Tobey's First Amendment claim 'stops well short of the line between possible and plausible.'")

Brown v. North Carolina Dept. of Corrections, 612 F.3d 720, 722-24 (4th Cir. 2010) ("Brown's complaint alleges the following facts. On May 9, 2008, an ACI staff member instructed him to enter the 'Housing Block' to retrieve a number of cleaning supplies. The staff member gave the instruction despite having knowledge that another inmate in the Housing Block harbored a grudge against Brown. While gathering the cleaning supplies, Brown was assaulted and brutally beaten by that inmate. As a result of that assault, a steel plate was inserted into Brown's jaw and he received 'ongoing' medical care for 'permanent' injuries. Brown's complaint further alleges that Officer Simms was in 'the Block' when the assault occurred, that Officer Teague observed the assault, and that the 'staff officers in question were [n]egligent and placed [Brown] in a dangerous and vulnerable position.' In an administrative grievance form attached to his complaint, Brown specified that Officer Winkler was the staff member who was aware of the other inmate's grudge against Brown but nonetheless sent him to pick up cleaning supplies. The administrative grievance form also alleges that Officer Teague admitted to Brown that he witnessed the assault but chose not to intervene. . . . The state contends that no reasonable person could infer from the complaint that Officer Simms knew of the assault in time to intervene, yet deliberately and indifferently failed to do so. We disagree with that reading of the record. Brown's complaint alleges that Officer Simms was in 'the Block' when the assault occurred. A reasonable person could infer from that statement that Officer Simms was aware of the attack, and that his failure to intervene represented deliberate indifference to a serious risk of harm. Similarly, Brown's complaint states that 'staff members' were aware of the other inmate's grudge, that the staff members knew there were prior problems between that inmate and Brown, and that they placed Brown 'in a [d]angerous and vulnerable position.' Because there were only three ACI correction officers designated in the complaint, it is reasonable to assume that Brown was naming Officer Simms when he described the staff members who were deliberately indifferent to the serious harm posed by his fellow inmate. Accordingly, the district court should not have dismissed Brown's claim against Officer Simms.")

Francis v. Giacomelli, 588 F.3d 186, 192 n.1 (4th Cir. 2009) ("The standard that the plaintiffs quoted from Swierkiewicz . . . was explicitly overruled in Twombly.")

Francis v. Giacomelli, 588 F.3d 186, 192-94 (4th Cir. 2009) ("[T]he 'notice pleading' characterization may itself be too simplistic, failing to recognize the many other provisions imposing requirements that permit courts to evaluate a complaint for sufficiency early in the process. Rule 8 itself requires a showing of entitlement to relief. Rule 9 requires that allegations of fraud, mistake, time, place, and special damages be specific. Rule 11 requires that the pleading be signed and provides that the signature 'certifies' (1) that the claims in the complaint are not asserted for collateral purposes; (2) that the claims asserted are 'warranted'; and (3) that the factual contentions 'have evidentiary support.' And Rule 12(b)(6) authorizes a court to dismiss any complaint that does not state a claim 'upon which relief can be granted.' The aggregation of these specific requirements reveals the countervailing policy that plaintiffs may proceed into the litigation process only when their complaints are justified by both law and fact. In recent years, with the recognized problems created by 'strike suits,'. . . and the high costs of frivolous litigation, the Supreme Court has brought to the forefront the Federal Rules' requirements that permit courts to evaluate complaints early in the process. [discussing Twombly and Iqbal] With these principles in hand, we now turn to the complaint in this case to determine whether, on its face, it states a plausible claim for relief. . . . Count I of the complaint, where the plaintiffs most fully articulate a claim, alleges that members of the Baltimore City Police Department, under the direction of Mayor O'Malley and City Solicitor Tyler, 'broke into and entered' the Police Commissioner's offices, seized personal property, and 'detained, held in custody and seized' the Police Commissioner and his deputies while ordering them to 'surrender their weapons, badges, identification cards' and similar property–all without the benefit of criminal charges or a warrant. The complaint concludes that this conduct violated the plaintiffs' Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment rights against unreasonable searches and seizures. Considered in their context, these allegations describe the conduct of Mayor O'Malley taken in furtherance of his decision to terminate the plaintiffs' employment, directing members of the Baltimore City Police Department to seize police department property and escort the plaintiffs from the police building. . . . Taking the facts in the complaint as true, we agree with the district court that Count I nonetheless fails to set forth a plausible claim for relief. While the Commissioner and his deputies conclusorily alleged that the searches and seizures violated their constitutional rights because no charges had been filed against them, nor had any warrant issued, their complaint did not allege that the defendants were engaged in a law-enforcement effort. Indeed, the facts show to the contrary, that the defendants' actions against the plaintiffs were employment actions based on the Mayor's perceived right to fire the Police Commissioner without cause, as stated in the Memorandum of Understanding between Commissioner Clark and Baltimore City.).

McLean v. U.S., 566 F.3d 391, 399, 400 (4th Cir. 2009) ("Although the Supreme Court has subsequently made clear that the factual allegations in a complaint must make entitlement to relief plausible and not merely possible, see Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 554-63 (2007), '[w]hat Rule 12(b)(6) does not countenance are dismissals based on a judge's disbelief of a complaint's factual allegations,' Neitzke, 490 U .S. at 327; see also Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556. 'District court judges looking to dismiss claims on such grounds must look elsewhere for legal support.' Neitzke, 490 U.S. at 327. '[A] well-pleaded complaint may proceed even if it strikes a savvy judge that actual proof of the facts alleged is improbable and that a recovery is very remote and unlikely.' Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556. . . Neitzke makes clear that a dismissal for frivolousness is of a qualitatively different character than a dismissal for failure to state a claim. As a result, our holding today should not be read to indicate that a dismissal for frivolousness that is rendered without prejudice should avoid a strike designation.").

Ray v. Amelia County Sheriff's Office, 302 F. App'x 209, 2008 WL 5155257, at *1 (4th Cir. Dec. 9, 2008) ("The district court erred in dismissing Ray's ADEA claim based upon its finding that her own complaint produced a legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for the defendants' termination of her employment that rebutted her prima facie case, while failing to demonstrate that the reasons stated in her own complaint were a pretext for discrimination. Ray was not required to plead specific facts establishing a prima facie case of discrimination in her complaint, let alone to plead facts showing that the non-discriminatory reason for termination suggested by her own complaint was pretextual. Ray was required only to state her claim so as to give the defendants fair notice of its nature and the grounds upon which it rests, with enough factual allegations to state a claim to relief that is plausible, not merely speculative. Ray alleges in her complaint that she is a member of a protected class (she is forty-five years old), she suffered an adverse employment action (her employment was terminated), and she was replaced by a substantially younger employee who is less qualified for the position than Ray. Ray states several possible reasons for the termination of her employment that are related to her age: Sheriff Jimmy E. Weaver's desire to have younger-looking employees at the front of the Amelia County Sheriff's Office; Weaver's desire to hire a replacement who was less familiar with official policies and procedures; and a problem with Ray's desire to utilize her accrued annual leave benefits. Taken together, these allegations provide the defendants with fair notice of the nature of her claim and the grounds upon which it rests, and state a claim to relief that is plausible, not merely speculative. Although Ray's complaint indicates that there were other ostensible reasons why her employment was terminated, the inclusion of those stated reasons in her complaint does not establish at the pleadings stage that she is not entitled to relief on her stated discrimination claim.").

In re Mills, 287 F. App'x 273, 2008 WL 2937850, at *6 (4th Cir. July 29, 2008) ("Mills' argument on appeal is simply that the allegations in the complaint, even if taken as true, are too vague and conclusory to demonstrate the violation of constitutional rights. . . We disagree. A complaint need only give 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.' Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(2). . . There is no heightened pleading standard for qualified-immunity cases.").

Giarratano v. Johnson, 521 F.2d 298, 304, 305 (4th Cir. 2008) ("Giarratano's complaint alleges that '[t]he exclusion of inmates from the protections of the Freedom of Information Act is not rationally related to any legitimate government interest.' This conclusory assertion is insufficient to overcome the presumption of rationality that applies to the VFOIA prisoner exclusion. . . Thus, the district court's dismissal of the facial challenge was appropriate. The conclusion that dismissal is appropriate comports with Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1955 (2007), which requires pleading 'enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'. . In Twombly, the Supreme Court, noting that 'a plaintiff's obligation to provide the Agrounds" of his Aentitlement to relief" requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do,' id. at 1964-65, upheld the dismissal of a complaint where the plaintiffs did not 'nudge [ ] their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.'. . Here, Giarratano's conclusory allegation about the lack of a rational relationship between VFOIA's prisoner exclusion and any legitimate state interest is insufficient . . . to plausibly state a claim for relief in light of the strong presumption in favor of the legislation's rationality and the readily apparent justification for the legislation. . . . In holding that Giarratano could not meet his burden, the district court cited a variety of rational reasons for the VFOIA prisoner exclusion. . . . Giarratano, on the other hand, failed to allege any set of facts that would indicate the classification at issue violated any fundamental rights, was irrational, or otherwise failed to serve a legitimate state interest. Simply put, Giarratano has alleged no facts to support a claim much less a 'plausible' claim.").

Mitchell v. Lewis, C/A No. 0:11–2860–CMC–PJG, 2012 WL 137471, at *5 n.4 (D.S.C. Jan. 4, 2012) ("The Supreme Court in Iqbal, and the Fourth Circuit in Trulock, addressed pleading standards in the procedural context of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. However, this court finds that those standards also apply in the court's initial screening of a complaint pursuant to §§ 1915(e)(2) and 1915A, since Iqbal discusses the general pleading standards of Rule 8, which apply in all civil actions. . . Moreover, §§ 1915(e)(2) and 1915A(b) permit sua sponte dismissal of a complaint that fails to state a claim upon which relief can be granted, which is essentially the same standard found in Rule 12(b)(6).")

Williams v. Family Service of Roanoke Valley, No. 7:09cv00227, 2009 WL 3806333, at *5, *6 (W.D. Va. Nov. 13, 2009) ("Ms. Williams believes that her supervisors intended for her reassignment to be permanent and an effort to force her to retire, and she believes that they were motivated to discriminate against her on account of her age and race. Her personal beliefs and speculation, however, are no substitute for proof. At the pleading stage, it is necessary to state a plausible claim for relief that raises the right to recover beyond the speculative level. Stripped of its speculation and personal belief, Ms. Williams' complaint shows only this: she was performing satisfactorily, her supervisors asked her to work temporarily as a receptionist with no loss of pay or benefits because of a legitimate need, a younger white female was to cover for her temporarily, and another employee that was approximately Williams' age voluntarily resigned. These facts fall far short of raising a plausible claim for relief that discriminatory animus motivated an adverse employment action. In short, nothing Ms. Williams has said in her pleadings, or in open court in support of her pleadings, and ultimately her claim, raises her right to relief above the speculative level. In reaching this conclusion, the court notes that it does not view this as a technical pleading failure that disadvantages a pro se plaintiff. To the contrary, the Court has assumed the veracity of her relevant factual allegations, including her amplification of them in open court, and concluded that they do not 'plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1950.")

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Lincoln v. Turner, 874 F.3d 833, 839 n.11 (5th Cir. 2017) ("Many difficulties of determining the adequacy of pleadings could be avoided by the district court's ordering a plaintiff to 'file a reply tailored to an answer pleading the defense of qualified immunity.' Schultea v. Wood, 47 F.3d 1427, 1433–34 (5th Cir. 1995). See also Anderson v. Valdez, 845 F.3d 580, 590 (5th Cir. 2016) (noting that when a defendant asserts a qualified immunity defense, the court must first "apply[ ] [the] general pleading standard to the complaint" and "may [then], in its discretion, insist that a plaintiff file a reply"). The district court may require particularized pleading of facts responsive to the defendant's plea of immunity. Officer Turner filed a Motion to Dismiss and, in the Alternative, for a Rule 7(a) Reply to Immunity Defense. The district court granted the motion to dismiss without ordering a Rule 7 reply.")

Doe v. United States, 831 F.3d 309, 321 (5th Cir. 2016) ("In this appeal, we set aside the objective 'clearly established law' requirement, which is traditionally confined to the qualified immunity context. The analytical task before us today is to determine whether the complaint contains sufficient factual information showing that the same ICE officials under scrutiny in Robertson acted with deliberate indifference in relation to the transport policy violations and detainees' safety. . . We are mindful of our prior conclusion that the plaintiffs sufficiently pled that these officials 'had actual knowledge' of transport policy violations and of the transport policy's 'assault-preventing objective.'. . Thus, the specific question is whether that information alone renders the officials' alleged culpability greater than 'gross negligence,' or whether more is required to make a plausible assertion that the officials knew of a 'substantial risk of serious harm' and consciously disregarded it. . . A complaint must include 'facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face' to survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. . . We agree with the Government that some of our other conclusions in Robertson are relevant to that determination. For example, we discussed that the plaintiffs' complaint did not include 'any concrete facts betray[ing] a heightened risk of sexual assault during ... transports ....' Robertson, 751 F.3d at 391. The plaintiffs do not allege that ICE officials knew of prior incidents of sexual assaults connected with detainee transports, of detainee 'fears' of sexual assault during transport, or of Dunn's crimes '(in time to prevent them).'. . There also is no claim that ICE officials knew 'of Dunn's dangerous proclivities.'. . The detention center's history of sexual assault, moreover, consists primarily of the 2007 incident between a detainee and guard which was unrelated to detainee transport. . . The guard's employment was terminated. . . In short, the plaintiffs failed to plead that ICE officials were aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that known violations of the transport policy created a 'substantial risk' that detainees would be sexually assaulted. . . Our ruling should not be interpreted as setting a standard that requires 'a completed attack or confirmed potential victims or aggressors' to make a successful deliberate indifference claim. . . Still, mere knowledge of another party's contractual violation is not enough to allege culpability beyond gross negligence in this case. . . We have held that 'observ[ing] questionable behavior' and an awareness of lack of 'compliance' with the terms of a settlement agreement were not enough to show deliberate indifference. . . The plaintiffs have not plausibly asserted that ICE officials acted with deliberate indifference. We affirm the district court's dismissal of the plaintiffs' FTCA claims against the United States.")

Williams-Boldware v. Denton County, Tex., 741 F.3d 635, 643, 644 (5th Cir. 2014) ("Williams–Boldware did not plead this cause of action with the requisite specificity to defeat a motion to dismiss based upon qualified immunity. 'One of the most salient benefits of qualified immunity is protection from pretrial discovery, which is costly, time consuming, and intrusive.' . . Before allowing discovery in a matter where qualified immunity is alleged, the district court must first find 'that the plaintiff's pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome' a qualified immunity defense. . . Here, Williams–Boldware's failure to promote claim did not plead facts that would overcome a qualified immunity defense because her allegations are conclusory statements based almost wholly upon speculation. . .Williams–Boldware speculates that Susan declined to recommend or approve her for more challenging assignments, but provides no facts to support her allegation. She also speculates that Cary Piel and Ryan Calvert were involved in selecting misdemeanor prosecutors for coveted assignments, but provides no factual support for that allegation. Most notably, Williams–Boldware failed to even allege that she applied for a promotion and was rejected. Under certain circumstances, a failure to promote claim is viable even when the employee never applied for a position. . . However, the employee must demonstrate that applying 'would have been a futile gesture.' . . Williams–Boldware made no such showing. Because Williams–Boldware failed to plead facts sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss on her failure to promote claim, the district court did not err by denying discovery and dismissing the suit against the Individual Defendants.")

Rogers v. Boatright, 709 F.3d 403, 408, 409 (5th Cir. 2013) ("The district court erred in sua sponte dismissing at the initial screening stage Rogers's claim that Jose Garcia acted with deliberate indifference to his safety. Rogers alleged in his complaint that he was not provided with a seatbelt and that he could not protect himself when the prison van stopped abruptly because he was shackled in leg irons and handcuffs. He alleged that Jose Garcia knew that other prisoners had been injured when the prison van in which they were riding stopped abruptly. Notwithstanding that knowledge, Garcia drove the van recklessly and Rogers sustained serious injuries when Garcia had to brake suddenly to avoid hitting another vehicle. . . .Rogers alleged that he sustained a serious injury because Jose Garcia operated the prison van recklessly, knowing that there was a substantial risk that Rogers would be injured if the van stopped abruptly because Rogers was shackled in leg irons and handcuffs and was not provided with a seatbelt. Rogers's allegation that Jose Garcia told another officer that other inmates similarly had been injured the prior week and during other incidents, which 'happen [ ] all the time,' states more than mere negligence. Garcia's alleged statement, if true, is sufficient to demonstrate that he knew of the risk to Rogers. . . Rogers has a nonfrivolous argument that Jose Garcia violated his Eighth Amendment right to freedom from cruel and unusual punishment by acting with deliberate indifference to his safety. . . Thus, the district court abused its discretion in sua sponte dismissing this claim against Jose Garcia at the initial screening stage and before the filing of any responsive pleadings, and we remand for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.")

Rogers v. Boatright, 709 F.3d 403, 411, 412 (5th Cir. 2013) (Edith H. Jones, J., dissenting) ("With due respect to my colleagues, I dissent from the holding that Rogers' conclusory statements about reckless driving by Officer Jose Garcia suffice to plead an Eighth Amendment claim for deliberate indifference. My concerns may be easily listed. First, there is no constitutional requirement that inmates be buckled with seatbelts during transportation. Nearly all courts have rejected such claims, because the use of seatbelts on shackled prisoners presents inevitable, non-trivial security concerns for other passengers and the guards. . .Second, this prisoner's allegations of 'reckless driving' are factually insufficient to meet the demanding constitutional standard and pleading requirements. To establish deliberate indifference, the prisoner must show that the prison official knew of and disregarded an excessive risk to inmate health or safety. . . The prisoner must show both that the official was aware of facts from which the inference could be drawn that a substantial risk of serious harm existed and that the official actually drew the inference. . . The prisoner's pleadings, moreover, must allege 'sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to state a claim for relief that is plausible on its face.'. . Rogers' allegations of Garcia's excessive speed, reckless driving, and darting in and out of traffic are conclusory, because he was seated in the back of a prison van, where his view of surrounding traffic had to be obstructed: the majority explain that he was seated perpendicular to oncoming traffic. Unlike the prisoner in the Brown case, relied on by the majority, he neither requested a seatbelt nor urged Jose Garcia to drive slower or more carefully. That Garcia 'recklessly' caused the collision is even more doubtful, as Rogers states in his appellate brief that 'Garcia was forced to slam on the transport van's brakes to avoid rear-ending a vehicle stopped in the freeway early morning traffic.' Taking this statement as an addendum to Rogers's pleadings, two implications are possible. Either Garcia, even though negligent in his driving, responded to an unusual, unanticipated situation, negating the inference that he knew a serious risk of substantial harm to Rogers existed; or Rogers's allegations lack sufficient factual detail from which an inference of recklessness can fairly be drawn. Similarly lacking are factual allegations that Garcia was actually aware of a substantial risk of serious harm to Rogers in these circumstances. The only alleged corroboration to Rogers' conclusion is Garcia's statement that prisoners have been injured during transportation in other instances. This statement, however, says nothing about whether Garcia was the driver on those occasions, nothing about whether actual reckless driving occurred, nothing about the type or extent of injuries sustained, nothing about driving conditions, and nothing about the use of seatbelts. Thus, I disagree that Garcia's statement can be taken to indicate the heightened state of culpability inherent in a constitutional violation. . . . Lack of seatbelts alone, as the majority concede, does not pose 'an excessive risk to inmate health or safety.' Further, because all driving in the congested and unpredictable traffic of the Houston metropolitan area poses some risk, the line between negligence and unconstitutional deliberate indifference must be securely drawn so that the Constitution does not simply become a 'font of tort law.'. . The only way to preserve this distinction is to insist on careful factual allegations. Third, the majority's reliance on Brown is misplaced for two reasons. First, allegations of reckless driving were supported in that case by facts. The facts were that the convoy drove at speeds up to 75 miles per hour; the guards had refused multiple requests for seatbelts as the prisoners were being loaded into the vans; the guards 'taunted' the inmates about safety concerns; the vans followed each other too closely; the vans were passing other cars when road signs 'suggested otherwise.'. . No such facts are pled by Rogers. . . . The majority's decision to allow this complainant to proceed is unfortunate, but Rogers must prove far more to overcome Garcia's likely defense of qualified immunity and actually sustain his assertions of a constitutional violation.")

Wilson v. Birnberg, 667 F.3d 591, 599, 600 (5th Cir. 2012) ("Wilson alleged that Birnberg intentionally deprived him of ballot access by, as the complaint states, 'rejecting Wilson's application out of retaliation for Wilson's exercise of free speech.' Specifically, Wilson claimed that during a prior election he had distributed flyers critical of the successful Democratic mayoral candidate, Annise Parker. This is 'factual content' supporting Birnberg's liability 'for the misconduct alleged.'. . The election for which Wilson was denied a place on the ballot was a primary to select the Democratic Party's nominee for Harris County Commissioner's Court, Precinct No. 4. Birnberg chairs the Harris County Democratic Party and the county seat is Houston. There were no other Democratic candidates. Wilson filed his application for candidacy in the last hour of the last possible day, which meant that had his filing been accepted, he would have become the Democratic Party nominee by default. The facts pled are that a political-party chairman denied an application on an improper basis in order to prevent a critic of the mayor from receiving her party's nomination. 'The plausibility standard [for a complaint] is not akin to a "probability requirement"....' . . . Rule 12(b)(6) does not permit us to affirm the district court's dismissal of this claim unless we determine 'it is beyond doubt' that Wilson 'cannot prove a plausible set of facts' to support his allegations.")

Rhodes v. Prince, 360 F. App'x 555, 559, 560 (5th Cir. 2010) ("Our inquiry 'is an objective one, asking whether a reasonable person in the position of [Rhodes] would believe he was the subject of a criminal or an administrative investigation by the department.'. . The question is fact-intensive. . . Rhodes points us to the events of December 9, 2003 to establish a Fourth Amendment violation. We must first, however, identify the allegations in his complaint that are entitled to a presumption of truth. . . Rhodes alleges that Defendant Roach 'intentionally and falsely arrested' him, 'when he knew such conduct was a violation of [his] Fourth Amendment right to be free from unlawful search and seizures,' and that Defendant Roach did so with the support of the other Defendants. Because an 'arrest' is a legal conclusion under the Fourth Amendment and a necessary element of a false arrest claim, . . .Rhodes's allegation of 'arrest' is 'nothing more than a Aformulaic recitation of the elements" of a constitutional ... claim .... and [is] not entitled to be assumed true.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1951 (quoting Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555). Rhodes describes Defendant Roach's questioning as an 'interrogation.' 'Interrogation' is a word with mixed connotations in the law, typically used to describe the questioning of a person while in custody. . . . Rhodes's use of 'interrogation' to describe the questioning by Defendant Roach does not necessarily equate to an arrest because, absent facts indicative of a Fourth Amendment seizure, Rhodes's description amounts to little more than a matter of word choice, without additional legal weight. Cf. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1951. Some of the alleged facts in Rhodes's Rule 7(a) reply are, however, entitled to a presumption of truth. Rhodes alleges that on December 4, 2003, Defendants Krohn, Carroll, and Roach notified him that he was a suspect in the burglary, and that he asserted his Fifth Amendment right to remain silent. Defendant Roach advised Rhodes that he would head a criminal investigation into the matter. The Department then informed Rhodes that he was subject to an internal affairs investigation, placed him on administrative leave and conducted an interview on the matter. Rhodes further alleges that he was fingerprinted and palm printed 'without consent' before Defendant Roach questioned him. Rhodes alleges that the questioning lasted approximately two hours. Although it is not clear from the Rule 7(a) reply, Rhodes's counsel appears to have been present during the questioning. Viewing the pleadings in the light most favorable to Rhodes, we find that he has not sufficiently pled that he was 'seized' under the Fourth Amendment. The district court required Rhodes to come forward with sufficient factual allegations in his Rule 7(a) reply to overcome the Defendants' claim to qualified immunity. . . Rhodes thus had the burden to demonstrate that an objective person would not have felt free to leave the exchange with Defendant Roach. . . Rhodes has not carried his burden. Significantly, Rhodes never alleged that he appeared at the Eastside Police Station involuntarily or felt that he was being detained. Rhodes also does not allege any show of force by the police. The taking of fingerprints and palm prints traditionally accompany an arrest, but standing alone, they do not suffice to establish an arrest. Rhodes was aware of both the criminal and administrative investigations and, in his Rule 7(a) reply, Rhodes had the burden to distinguish between his compliance with workplace obligations and a show of police force sufficient to demonstrate a Fourth Amendment arrest. . . Rhodes failed to do so. Even viewing the pleadings in the light most favorable to Rhodes, we find that a reasonable person would have felt free to leave the encounter. Thus, Rhodes has not sufficiently alleged that he was 'seized' under the Fourth Amendment.").

Floyd v. City of Kenner, La., No. 08-30637, 2009 WL 3490278, at *2 & n.2, *4 (5th Cir. Oct. 29, 2009) (unpublished) ("Caraway, Congemi, Cunningham, and Deroche have asserted a qualified immunity defense. In reviewing those claims, we are guided both by the ordinary pleading standard and by a heightened one. . . We emphasize that this heightened pleading standard applies only to claims against public officials in their individual capacities. The Supreme Court's decision in Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics and Intelligence Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163 (1993), made clear that a heightened pleading standard was inapplicable to suits against municipalities. Further, the heightened standard is inapplicable to claims against public officials in their official capacity, for we have 'explained that official-capacity lawsuits are typically an alternative means of pleading an action against the governmental entity involved....' Baker v. Putnal, 75 F.3d 190, 195 (5th Cir.1996). . . . Schultea explained that, once a defendant asserts the defense of qualified immunity, a district court may order the plaintiff to submit a reply after evaluating the complaint under the ordinary pleading standard. . . We held that more than mere conclusions must be alleged, stating specifically that 'a plaintiff cannot be allowed to rest on general characterizations, but must speak to the factual particulars of the alleged actions, at least when those facts are known to the plaintiff and are not peculiarly within the knowledge of defendants.'. . 'Heightened pleading requires allegations of fact focusing specifically on the conduct of the individual who caused the plaintiff's injury.'. . . In Schultea, we adopted the rationale that, 'in some cases, such as in search cases, probable cause and exigent circumstances will often turn on facts peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants. And if there are conflicts in the allegations regarding the actions taken by the police officers, discovery may be necessary.'. . Here, the Defendants ask us to accept that Deroche entered the property for the sole purpose of determining if relief items were present. At the time, Deroche alleged he entered because of the alarm. Floyd asserts that Deroche knew that Floyd was not misappropriating relief items; instead, the entry into the property was all about embarrassing Floyd because of his past run-ins with then-Chief of Police Congemi. This is the type of conflict that warrants discovery. The district court should not have dismissed the claim.").

Floyd v. City of Kenner, La., No. 08-30637, 2009 WL 3490278, at *6 (5th Cir. Oct. 29, 2009) ("Floyd does not complain that Caraway himself filed the alleged unlawful affidavit in support of the warrants. Instead, he claims that Caraway, in his capacity as chief investigator, directed and approved the applications filed by Cunningham. This is an alleged Fourth Amendment violation under Franks, as we stated in addressing the claim against Cunningham. 'Because vicarious liability is inapplicable to ... § 1983 suits, a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948. Liability under Section 1983 for a supervisor may exist based either on personal involvement in the constitutional deprivation or 'a sufficient causal connection between the supervisor's wrongful conduct and the constitutional violation.' Thompkins v. Belt, 828 F.2d 298, 304 (5th Cir.1987). We must determine whether Floyd alleged the 'factual particulars' necessary to state a valid Fourth Amendment claim against Caraway. . .The relevant allegation is that Caraway 'participated in, approved and directed' the filing of false and misleading affidavits. In analyzing the issue, we turn to the Supreme Court's recent decision in Iqbal. . . . Certainly our precedents have acknowledged that some limited discovery may at times be needed before a ruling on immunity is proper. As an example, we referred to 'search cases, [because] probable cause and exigent circumstances will often turn on facts peculiarly within the knowledge of the defendants.'. . In such a case, 'if there are conflicts in the allegations regarding the actions taken by the police officers, discovery may be necessary.'. . The importance of discovery in such a situation is not to allow the plaintiff to discover if his or her pure speculations were true, for pure speculation is not a basis on which pleadings may be filed. Rule 11 requires that any factual statements be supported by evidence known to the pleader, or, when specifically so identified, 'will likely have evidentiary support' after discovery. Fed.R.Civ.P. 11(b)(3) (emphasis added). There has to be more underlying a complaint than a hope that events happened in a certain way. Instead, in the 'short and plain' claim against a public official, 'a plaintiff must at least chart a factual path to the defeat of the defendant's immunity, free of conclusion.' Schultea, 47 F.3d at 1430. Once that path has been charted with something more than conclusory statements, limited discovery might be allowed to fill in the remaining detail necessary to comply with Schultea. . . Under these standards, Floyd's allegations against Caraway amount to nothing more than speculation. The conclusory assertion that Caraway 'participated in, approved and directed' the filing of false and misleading affidavits is consistent with finding a constitutional violation, but it needed further factual amplification. See Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949. Floyd might not know everything about what occurred, but the bare allegation does not make it plausible that he knows anything. Unlike his allegations against Cunningham, this bare assertion does not provide any detail about what Caraway, as chief of investigations, did to seek to control Cunningham's filing of an affidavit. Put differently, the conclusion presents nothing more than hope and a prayer for relief. An example of a situation that falls squarely within the kind of case justifying limited discovery is discussed in a recently released but non- precedential opinion by a panel of this court. Morgan v. Hubert, No. 08- 30388, 2009 WL 1884605 (5th Cir. July 1, 2009). In Morgan, a plaintiff who was in protective custody before Hurricane Katrina was transferred to a general prison population following the storm. . . After being beaten and stabbed, the plaintiff filed a Section 1983 suit against the prison warden. . . The complaint presented sufficient detail to demonstrate a highly plausible allegation of an Eighth Amendment violation. . . The events cited were so clear, the practical effects of such conduct so obvious, that the defendants' responsibility under Section 1983 for the plaintiff's harm simply needed the detail that limited discovery would either provide or deny. . . Unlike in Morgan, Floyd has shown nothing in his complaint to indicate a basic plausibility to the allegation. His Section 1983 claim premised on a Fourth Amendment violation therefore fails.").

Morgan v. Hubert, 335 F. App'x 466, No. 08-30388, 2009 WL 1884605, at *5, *6 (5th Cir. July 1, 2009) ("In his amended complaint and reply, Morgan alleges the following facts regarding Hubert's personal actions: (1) that Hubert created policies that placed Morgan in substantial risk of harm; (2) that he failed adequately to house, feed, and provide medical care for inmates evacuated from OPP, and particularly failed to provide protection to inmates in protective custody and to provide medical care to those assaulted; (3) that Hubert knew or should have known that transfers from OPP would include prisoners in protective custody; (4) that Hubert knew or should have known of the need to segregate these prisoners; (5) that Hubert failed to follow the policies he had in place for the segregation and protection of prisoners, and that he failed to ensure that his staff followed the policies; (6) in the alternative that Hubert failed to enact any policies and was thus deliberately indifferent to Morgan's rights; and (7) that Hubert had a personal duty to create and implement these policies or to oversee those who created and implemented the policies. The difficulty with these allegations is that they fail to state specifically such important facts as when Hubert knew of the transfers and what his policies were regarding them, including the handling of prisoners in protective custody. See Schultea, 47 F .3d at 1434 (requiring the plaintiff to support a Aclaim with sufficient precision and factual specificity to raise a genuine issue as to the illegality of defendant's conduct at the time of the alleged acts" (emphasis added)). The time line from Hubert's planning for the hurricane to Morgan's arrival at EHCC is crucial to the deliberate indifference analysis, directly bearing on Hubert's knowledge of the events. The failure of specificity is no fault of Morgan's, however, because he has not yet had the benefit of discovery, and is bound by Rule 11 to allege only those facts for which he has or will likely have evidentiary support. As we said in Schultea, we do not require a plaintiff to plead facts 'peculiarly within the knowledge of defendants,' id. at 1432, and the facts omitted fall squarely within that category. We are mindful that the protection afforded by qualified immunity applies to the lawsuit itself, and not merely to liability, and thus the issue should be resolved as early as possible. . .Thus, we are reluctant to allow the case to proceed to full discovery with important questions regarding qualified immunity left unanswered. Schultea points the way forward. We noted there the district court's ability to tailor discovery to the defense of qualified immunity: 'The district court may ... limit any necessary discovery to the defense of qualified immunity.' 47 F.3d at 1434. Such a course is called for here. Because key facts are unknown, and because these facts are solely within Hubert's possession, we do not consider the parties' remaining arguments regarding deliberate indifference. Instead, we vacate the district court's denial of qualified immunity and remand for discovery limited to that issue. We instruct the district court to carry the issue of qualified immunity and decide it anew once that discovery is complete. Additional facts establishing the time line are particularly important when evaluating the second prong of the qualified immunity test-the reasonableness of Hubert's actions in light of the clearly established constitutional right. While the fact of Hurricane Katrina is unquestionably relevant to this inquiry, so too are the facts noting when Hubert learned of impending transfers and what steps he took to prepare for them. Several days of notice versus hours or even minutes of notice greatly changes the reasonableness calculus. Under such circumstances, remand for limited discovery is appropriate."). [See also Morgan v. Hubert, 459 F. App'x 321 (5th Cir. 2012) (holding that because warden was not deliberately indifferent, warden was entitled to qualified immunity with respect to inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim.]

Mohamed for A.M. v. Irving Indep. Sch. Dist., 252 F.Supp.3d 602, ___ (N.D. Tex. 2017) ("The threshold question that the court must decide is whether, viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the Complaint sufficiently alleges that Principal Cummings violated A.M.'s constitutional right to equal protection of the laws under the Fourteenth Amendment. If the allegations fail to state a claim for an underlying constitutional violation, Principal Cummings is entitled to qualified immunity without the necessity that the court reach the other aspects of the qualified immunity inquiry. . . .Viewing all well-pleaded allegations as true and drawing all reasonable inferences in favor of Plaintiff, the court determines that the Complaint fails to plead facts from which the court can reasonably infer that Principal Cummings's complained-of conduct was motivated by unlawful racial or religious animus. To the extent the Complaint alleges that Principal Cummings intentionally discriminated against A.M. based on his race or religion, the allegations are wholly conclusory and fail to 'raise a right to relief above the speculative level...[even] on the assumption that all the allegations in the complaint are true (even if doubtful in fact).'. . The Complaint contains no factual allegation that supports a showing that Principal Cummings removed A.M. from the classroom, ordered him to write a statement, or decided to temporarily suspend him from McArthur, based on his religion or race. Plaintiff's reliance on nothing more than conclusory, speculative, and sweeping allegations of constitutional violations and intent is insufficient to overcome Principal Cummings's qualified immunity defense. . . .Further, the Complaint fails to state an equal protection violation against Principal Cummings because it does not allege that he treated A.M. differently than other similarly situated students, and that the unequal treatment was based on religion or race. . . .Finally, allegations that the IISD has a pattern of disciplining African–American students more harshly than other students, that the IISD generally had an anti-Muslim bias, that Principal Cummings was aware of TEA reports reflecting such disparity, or that other school officials displayed racial animus, are insufficient as a matter of law to impute liability to Principal Cummings. To overcome Principal Cummings's qualified immunity defense, Plaintiff must, at a minimum, allege facts from which the court may infer that Principal Cummings was himself personally motivated by discriminatory animus. . . . Even assuming that Plaintiff had met the threshold requirement of alleging an underlying constitutional violation, the court concludes that Principal Cummings is, nevertheless, entitled to qualified immunity because Plaintiff has failed to allege facts from which the court can conclude that Principal Cummings acted in an objectively unreasonable manner. Principals are responsible for the safety of students and others on campus and, as part of that responsibility, often have to make decisions quickly and with little information. The court acknowledges that A.M. repeatedly stated that the device in question was an alarm clock and not a bomb; however, in light of well-documented incidents in this country of students bringing weapons and other prohibited devices to school, one in Principal Cummings's position cannot rely on or accept such assertions without at least conducting some level of investigation or sufficient inquiry to ensure that the device does not pose a risk to the safety of students and others on campus. . . .A principal's fate is not so hapless that, on the one hand, by not taking action he is faced with the gruesome prospect of death or serious injury of persons had the device actually been a bomb and exploded; and, on the other hand, he is faced with a federal lawsuit for denial of a student's constitutional rights because the device turned out not to be a bomb. Woe unto the principal who fails to act on a potential threat that later becomes a reality! To hold Principal Cummings, or any other administrator, to this standard places him between the dreaded Scylla and Charybdis. . . As earlier stated, qualified immunity is designed to protect from civil liability 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law.'. . Principal Cummings's alleged conduct falls into neither category. The court simply cannot go so far as to say, based on the allegations presented, that Principal Cummings was 'plainly incompetent' or 'knowingly violate[d] the law' or A.M.'s constitutional rights. Moreover, the Complaint contains no allegations from which the court can reasonably infer that Principal Cummings would have acted differently if the student bringing the device to school and showing it to others in violation of a teacher's orders had been non-African American or non-Islamic. For these reasons, the allegations in the Complaint regarding Principal Cummings are inadequate to overcome his defense of qualified immunity. Accordingly, the court will grant Principal Cummings's Motion to Dismiss based on qualified immunity.")

Huff v. Refugio County Sheriff's Dept., No. 6:13–CV–00032, 2013 WL 5574901, *2, *3 (S.D. Tex. Oct. 9, 2013) ("Defendants take the principle requiring a plaintiff to identify individual conduct attributable to each public official too far. That rule typically results in dismissals when individual policymakers are named as defendants without any allegation about their specific role in formulating the challenged policy. . . .Here we are not dealing with allegations against policymakers, but allegations that two individuals had direct involvement in applying excessive force. The allegation is that both were present in the cell when the force was applied. This is more than sufficient at the pleading stage, even under the heightened standard applied to public officials sued in their individual capacity. . . Discovery can flesh out the remaining detail of which officer slammed Huff to the floor and which officer brought his arm behind his back.")

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Johnson v. Moseley, 790 F.3d 649, 654-57 (6th Cir. 2015) ("There can be no doubt that the Sixth Circuit recognizes a 'constitutionally cognizable claim of malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment.'. . 'Yet, that is not enough.'. . To avoid the qualified immunity defense, plaintiff was required to plead facts making out a violation of a constitutional right clearly established in a 'particularized sense.' That is, the right said to have been violated must be defined 'in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.'. . Although neither plaintiff nor the district court has defined the right to freedom from malicious prosecution in such a particularized sense, both have relied on our analysis in Sykes v. Anderson. Indeed, Sykes is instructive. In Sykes, we recognized that a showing of 'malice' is not necessarily essential to a malicious prosecution claim under the Fourth Amendment. . . But we also observed that the requisite participation in the decision to prosecute after probable cause has ceased to exist must amount to 'aiding' the decision in more than a passive or neutral way. . . And there must be some element of blameworthiness or culpability in the participation—albeit less than 'malice.' That is, truthful participation in the prosecution decision is not actionable. . . The requisite blameworthiness was made out in Sykes by evidence that both defendant officers testified for the prosecution and each made false statements, made flagrant misrepresentations, or failed to disclose key items of evidence. . .We further clarified the point in Robertson, 753 F.3d at 617, holding that even false testimony is not actionable as malicious prosecution unless deliberate-i.e., given with knowledge of, or reckless disregard for, its falsity. . . Even more recently, the rule was succinctly stated in Newman v. Township of Hamburg, 773 F.3d 769 (6th Cir.2014). A police officer violates a suspect's clearly established right to freedom from malicious prosecution under the Fourth Amendment 'only when his deliberate or reckless falsehoods result in arrest and prosecution without probable cause.'. . Again, we see that a defendant's participation must be marked by some kind of blameworthiness, something beyond mere negligence or innocent mistake, to satisfy the elements of a malicious prosecution claim under the Fourth Amendment. . . . [A]lthough the district court noted that plaintiff's allegations lacked details, it accepted them as sufficient to meet the notice pleading requirements of Rule 8(a) and warrant further discovery proceedings. Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a). Despite the insufficiency of plaintiff's allegations, the court withheld dismissal based on the possibility that discovery might disclose specific facts substantiating the claim. This ignores the fact that plaintiff, having sued defendant officers for violation of his civil rights, to overcome their assertion of qualified immunity, was obliged to allege facts describing how each defendant's conduct violated a federally protected right under clearly established law. . . Because, as explained above, plaintiff's complaint does not set forth facts meeting this requirement, the claim is subject to dismissal. To be clear, we are not enforcing a 'heightened pleading requirement' that would run afoul of Crawford–El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998); see Goad v. Mitchell, 297 F.3d 497, 501–04 (6th Cir.2002). Rather, consistent with Crawford–El's admonition that 'firm application of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure is fully warranted' where qualified immunity is asserted, we enforce the non-controversial requirement that plaintiff 'put forward specific, nonconclusory factual allegations' establishing a cognizable injury in order to withstand a prediscovery motion to dismiss. . . The district court's ruling that plaintiff is entitled to discovery notwithstanding his conclusory allegations flies in the face of qualified immunity's purpose of resolving insubstantial claims as early as possible so as to avoid unnecessarily subjecting government officials to the disruptive burdens of litigation. . . The court's ruling, allowing plaintiff to conduct discovery that may uncover substantiating facts, also undercuts counsel's Rule 11 obligation to conduct a reasonable investigation and uncover evidentiary support for fact allegations before filing the complaint. Fed.R.Civ.P. 11(b)(3). Had counsel undertaken such an investigation and uncovered facts facially substantiating the malicious prosecution claims—facts inadvertently omitted from the original complaint—counsel would naturally have moved the district court for leave to amend the complaint so as to augment the allegations. That counsel made no such motion is telling. And no less telling is it that plaintiff's appellate briefing is also devoid even of argument attempting to put flesh on his 'bare bones' allegations. He maintains simply that his allegations, conclusory though they be, are sufficient. We are not persuaded.")

Shively v. Green Local Sch. Dist. Bd. of Educ., 579 F. App'x 348, 354 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Given the number and variety of ways the Shivelys allege they contacted school officials, the Shivelys notification of police, medical care professionals, and the guidance counselor, and the Superintendent's knowledge of the ongoing harassment, the complaint plausibly alleges that Brown, Miller, and Wells, as the Principals and Assistant Principal of schools attended by T.S., knew about the ongoing student-on-student bullying and, given their positions of authority, were involved in making decisions regarding how it would be addressed. This conclusion is also supported by the procedural posture of this case, where litigation has continued during the pendency of this appeal and Brown, Miller, and Wells are proper Defendants before this court on the Shivelys' state-law claims. We conclude that the district court did not err in finding that the Shivelys' complaint meets the standard necessary to comply with Rule 8. See Iqbal, 556 U.S at 683–84.")

LaFountain v. Harry, 716 F.3d 944, 951(6th Cir. 2013) ("Under Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a), '[a] party may amend its pleading once as a matter of course within 21 days after serving it' and, '[i]n all other cases, ... [t]he court should freely give leave [to amend] when justice so requires.' In McGore, however, we held that, when the Prison Litigation Reform Act requires dismissal of a prisoner's claim, a district court cannot grant leave to amend. . . .Every other circuit to have reached the issue disagrees.[collecting cases] Meanwhile, in Jones v. Bock, 549 U.S. 199, 127 S.Ct. 910, 166 L.Ed.2d 798 (2007), the Supreme Court held that 'the PLRA's screening requirement does not—explicitly or implicitly—justify deviating from the usual procedural practice beyond the departures specified by the PLRA itself.'. . The Court reasoned that, 'when Congress meant to depart from the usual procedural requirements, it did so expressly.'. . Jones controls here. The PLRA's screening requirements—28 U.S.C. §§ 1915A(b)(1) & 1915(e)(2)(B); 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(c)(1)—say nothing about whether a district court can allow a prisoner to amend his complaint. Thus, McGore is flatly inconsistent with Jones. We therefore overrule McGore; and we hold, like every other circuit to have reached the issue, that under Rule 15(a) a district court can allow a plaintiff to amend his complaint even when the complaint is subject to dismissal under the PLRA.")

Marcilis v. Township of Redford, 693 F.3d 589, 596, 597 (6th Cir. 2012) ("Though we have not yet addressed this issue in a published opinion, we have found, in an unpublished opinion, that a complaint failed where a plaintiff 'did not allege that particular defendants performed the acts that resulted in a deprivation of [plaintiff's] constitutional rights. This is a requirement in Bivens actions such as this one.'. . .The complaint mentions Doyle and Livingston only in paragraph six, for the purposes of identifying them as employees of the Drug Enforcement Administration. Otherwise, the complaint makes only categorical references to 'Defendants.' We conclude that the district court did not err in dismissing the claims against Doyle and Livingston for failing to 'allege, with particularity, facts that demonstrate what each defendant did to violate the asserted constitutional right.'")

Davis v. Prison Health Services, 679 F.3d 433, 439, 440 (6th Cir. 2012) ("[E]ven if Davis had failed to include allegations about similarly-situated prisoners, his complaint still should not have been dismissed at the pleadings stage. [citing Swierkiewicz] Davis's complaint. . .contains allegations that, if accepted as true, would constitute direct evidence that his removal from the public-works program was improperly motivated by anti-gay animus. By dismissing his claim because he had purportedly failed to identify any similarly situated prisoners, the district court mistakenly required Davis 'to plead more facts than he may ultimately need to prove to succeed on the merits if direct evidence of discrimination is discovered.' . . In sum, Davis has alleged sufficient facts that, accepted as true, state a plausible claim for relief. Accordingly, Davis 'deserves a shot at additional factual development, which is what discovery is designed to give him.' Fabian v. Fulmer Helmets, Inc., 628 F.3d 278, 281 (6th Cir.2010). Dismissal under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1915(e)(2), 1915A and 42 U.S.C. § 1997e(c) for failure to state a claim was improper.")

Center for Bio-Ethical Reform, Inc. v. Napolitano, 648 F.3d 365, 378, 379 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Plaintiffs have failed to state a claim against Defendants, in either their official or individual capacities, under the First Amendment. To the extent Plaintiffs seek to challenge the constitutionality of the alleged RWE Policy, Plaintiffs have failed to plausibly allege the existence of such a policy. And to the extent Plaintiffs seek to challenge the alleged retaliation by Defendants on account of Plaintiffs' protected activities, Plaintiffs' allegations are likewise deficient. Plaintiffs have failed to plausibly allege that any actions by Defendants injured Plaintiffs in a way that would deter a person of ordinary firmness from further participation in constitutionally protected activity. Nor have Plaintiffs plausibly alleged that any adverse action by Defendants was motivated at least in part by Plaintiffs' constitutionally protected activity.")

New Albany Tractor, Inc. v. Louisville Tractor, Inc., 650 F.3d 1046, 1050, 1051, 1053 (6th Cir. 2011) ("This new 'plausibility' pleading standard causes a considerable problem for plaintiff here because defendants Scag and Louisville Tractor are apparently the only entities with the information about the price at which Scag sells its equipment to Louisville Tractor. This pricing information is necessary in order for New Albany to allege that it pays a discriminatory price for the same Scag equipment, as required by the language of the Act. This type of exclusive distribution structure makes it particularly difficult to determine whether discriminatory pricing exists. Before Twombly and Iqbal, courts would probably have allowed this case to proceed so that plaintiff could conduct discovery in order to gather the pricing information that is solely retained within the accounting system of Scag and Louisville Tractor. It may be that only Scag and Louisville Tractor have knowledge of whether Scag exercises control over the terms and conditions of Louisville Tractor's sales to retailers, including the retail operations of Louisville Tractor. The plaintiff apparently can no longer obtain the factual detail necessary because the language of Iqbal specifically directs that no discovery may be conducted in cases such as this, even when the information needed to establish a claim of discriminatory pricing is solely within the purview of the defendant or a third party, as it is here. . . .By foreclosing discovery to obtain pricing information, the combined effect of Twombly and Iqbal require plaintiff to have greater knowledge now of factual details in order to draft a 'plausible complaint.'. . Without discovery, pricing information or any fact that would support an allegation of illegal economic collusion becomes far harder to obtain. Under the new Twombly standard set forth by the Supreme Court in an antitrust case, even though a complaint need not contain detailed factual allegations, its '[f]actual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level on the assumption that all the allegations in the complaint are true.'. . In this case that means, as the district court held, that plaintiff must allege specific facts of price discrimination even if those facts are only within the head or hands of the defendants. The plaintiff may not use the discovery process to obtain these facts after filing suit. The language of Iqbal, 'not entitled to discovery,' is binding on the lower federal courts. . . . Without discovery, the plaintiff may have no way to find out the facts in the hands of competitors, but Iqbal specifically orders courts, as quoted above, to refuse to order further discovery. If the plaintiff should be able to find out the facts it needs to state a claim, it will have to file another complaint. For the foregoing reasons, we affirm the judgment of the district court.")

Frank v. Dana Corp., 646 F.3d 954, 961 (6th Cir. 2011) ("In the past, we have conducted our scienter analysis in section 10(b) cases by sorting through each allegation individually before concluding with a collective approach. . . However, we decline to follow that approach in light of the Supreme Court's recent decision in Matrixx Initiatives, Inc. v. Siracusano, __ U.S. __, 131 S.Ct. 1309, __ L.Ed.2d __ (2011). There, the Court provided for us a post-Tellabs example of how to consider scienter pleadings 'holistically' in section 10(b) cases. . . Writing for the Court, Justice Sotomayor expertly addressed the allegations collectively, did so quickly, and, importantly, did not parse out the allegations for individual analysis. . . This is the only appropriate approach following Tellabs's mandate to review scienter pleadings based on the collective view of the facts, not the facts individually. . . Our former method of reviewing each allegation individually before reviewing them holistically risks losing the forest for the trees. Furthermore, after Tellabs, conducting an individual review of myriad allegations is an unnecessary inefficiency. Consequently, we will address the Plaintiffs' claims holistically.")

Rondigo, L.L.C. v. Township of Richmond, 641 F.3d 673, 683, 684 (6th Cir. 2011) ("Although plaintiffs' amended complaint contains 250 paragraphs and occupies 54 pages, it contains precious little factual support for the theory that the state defendants' more favorable treatment of Minard demonstrates they were victims of unlawful discrimination. Although plaintiffs conclusorily allege that Minard is similarly situated, exhibits attached to their complaint substantiate undisputed and facially legitimate reasons for the state defendants' complained-of actions in regulating plaintiffs' compost operation at 32 Mile Road–reasons that appear to be unique to that property. Although plaintiffs make various allegations that the state defendants, acting in concert with Richmond Township and its residents, have been unfairly demanding in their enforcement of agricultural and environmental standards, no inference of unlawful discrimination can legitimately arise where the only asserted comparable, Minard, is shown by plaintiffs' own pleadings to be dissimilarly situated in several relevant respects. In short, plaintiffs' allegations that Minard is similarly situated and that his more favorable treatment by defendants evidences unlawful discrimination are exposed as little more than 'legal conclusions couched as factual allegations' and need not be accepted as true under Rule 12(b)(6) scrutiny. . . Plaintiffs' factual allegations fail to 'raise the right to relief above the speculative level.'. . They fail to warrant a 'reasonable inference that [defendants are] liable for the misconduct alleged.'. . When the allegations are viewed in light of the exhibits attached to the complaint, they fall far short of making out a 'plausible claim of entitlement to relief' under either equal protection theory. . . As such, plaintiffs' 'insubstantial' equal protection claim was ripe for dismissal under the doctrine of qualified immunity at the earliest possible stage in the litigation. . . The district court's contrary ruling is based in part on a failure to apply the Supreme Court's teaching in Twombly and Iqbal. The district court expressly recognized the applicability of Twombly, recognized that legal conclusions need not be accepted as true, and recognized that the complaint must set forth 'some factual basis' for the claims asserted. Yet, the court accepted plaintiffs' alleged legal conclusions that Minard was similarly situated and that they were treated differently because of gender-based discrimination without requiring supporting factual allegations. . . . Nothing but legal conclusions suggests that the state defendants acted with unlawful discriminatory animus. . . . Based on the foregoing analysis, we conclude the district court erred by denying the state defendants' motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity. The factual allegations in the complaint, viewed in conjunction with the exhibits attached to the complaint, are insufficient to make out a valid equal protection claim under the 'plausibility standard' prescribed by the Supreme Court in Twombly and Iqbal.")

Hill v. Lappin, 630 F.3d 468 (6th Cir. 2010) (holding that the Twombly/ Iqbal plausibility standard applies to dismissals of prisoner cases for failure to state claim under 28 U.S.C. §§ 1915A(b)(1) and 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii)).)

Nali v. Ekman, 355 F. App'x 909, 2009 WL 4641737, at *3 (6th Cir. Dec. 9, 2009) ("In order to plead a cognizable § 1985 claim, Nali must allege specific facts that, taken together, plausibly suggest that (1) two or more individuals 'conspire[d] ... for the purpose of depriving [him] of the equal protection of the laws,' (2) they acted to further that conspiracy and (3) he was injured as a result. . . As the magistrate and district court recognized, Nali failed to plead sufficient facts to state a cognizable Equal Protection Clause claim. In connection with this requirement, he alleged that '[d]efendants' motives were racially based [and] supported by animosity towards plaintiff.' But, as the Supreme Court recently held, a complaint that includes conclusory allegations of discriminatory intent without additional supporting details does not sufficiently show that the pleader is entitled to relief. See Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1950-51 (2009). Nali's claim can survive only if he pleaded facts supporting that conclusion. He has not done so. The fact that 'defendants are caucasian' and that Nali 'is non-caucasian' does not by itself show that defendants were motivated to discriminate against him on the basis of his race or ethnicity. Although Nali adds that 'no one else was ticketed' for similar conduct (being in the chow hall at the wrong time), that fact does not show discrimination unless accompanied by some evidence that the people not disciplined were similarly situated and of a different race, see Coker v. Summit County Sheriff's Dept., 90 F. App'x 782, 790 (6th Cir.2003) (unpublished disposition)–facts he does not allege in his complaint. The district court properly dismissed this claim.").

In re Travel Agent Com'n Antitrust Litigation, 583 F.3d 896, 912-15 (6th Cir. 2009)(Merritt, J., dissenting) ("The Supreme Court majority has made clear that it is not making a major change in the law of pleading with Twombly and its progeny. . . As with any other new, general legal standard, the nature and meaning of the newly modified standard can be understood and followed only by analyzing how the standard is applied in actual cases like this case. Here my colleagues have seriously misapplied the new standard by requiring not simple 'plausibility,' but by requiring the plaintiff to present at the pleading stage a strong probability of winning the case and excluding any possibility that the defendants acted independently and not in unison. My colleagues are requiring the plaintiff to offer detailed facts that if true would create a clear and convincing case of antitrust liability at trial without allowing the plaintiff the normal right to conduct discovery and have the jury draw reasonable inferences of liability from strong direct and circumstantial evidence. . . . The antitrust cases decided in both courts of appeals and district courts since Twombly and Iqbal are few, and most of the cases decided by district courts have yet to reach the courts of appeals. . . The uniformity needed for the rule of law and equal justice to prevail is lacking. This irregularity may be attributed to the desire of some courts, like my colleagues here, to use the pleading rules to keep the market unregulated, while others refuse to use the pleading rules as a cover for knocking out antitrust claims. . . . There are many, including my colleagues, whose preference for an unregulated laissez faire market place is so strong that they would eliminate market regulation through private antitrust enforcement. Using the new Twombly pleading rule, it is possible to do away with price fixing cases based on reasonable inferences from strong circumstantial evidence.").

Hensley Mfg. v. ProPride, Inc., 579 F.3d 603, 609 n.4 (6th Cir. 2009) ("The Supreme Court has recently clarified that its decision in Twombly'expounded the pleading standard for Aall civil actions,"' despite the fact that Twombly itself arose in the context of an antitrust suit. . . The Court's decision in Iqbal made clear that the Twombly standard is not limited to 'sprawling, costly, and hugely time-consuming' litigation, Twombly, 550 U.S. at 560 n. 6,dispelling such speculation by courts both within and outside this circuit.").

Gunasekera v. Irwin, 551 F.3d 461, 466 (6th Cir. 2009) ("Courts in and out of the Total Benefits Planning Agency, Inc. v. Anthem Blue Cross and Blue Shield, 552 F.3d 430, 434 n.2 (6th Cir. 2008) ("This Court has cited the heightened pleading of Twombly in a wide variety of cases, not simply limiting its applicability to antitrust actions. See, e.g., Tucker v. Middleburg-Legacy Place, 539 F.3d 545 (6th Cir.2008) (Family & Medical Leave Act); Bassett v. Nat'l Collegiate Athletic Ass'n, 528 F.3d 426 (6th Cir.2008) (antitrust); McKnight v. Gates, 282 F. National Business Development Services, Inc. v. American Credit Educ. and Consulting, Inc.., 299 F. App'x 509, 2008 WL 4772074, at *2, *3 (6th Cir. Oct. 31, 2008) ("Plaintiff asked this court to determine whether Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 2200 (2007), rather than Bell Atlantic, should be used to determine the specificity with which a complaint must be filed. Plaintiff specifically asserted that Erickson, which was issued by the Supreme Court after Bell Atlantic, set forth a more liberal standard. The district court correctly applied Bell Atlantic, as the facts of the instant case are more akin to those at issue in Bell Atlantic. Erickson concerned a pro se litigant, 'and Aa pro se complaint, however inartfully pleaded, must be held to less stringent standards than formal pleadings drafted by lawyers."' . . Bell Atlantic, however, concerned an anti-trust matter, where the case emphasized the heightened possibility for abuse among lawsuits of this specie. . . . Copyright infringement, like anti-trust actions,lends itself readily to abusive litigation, since the high cost of trying such a case can force a defendant who might otherwise be successful in trial to settle in order to avoid the time and expenditure of a resource intensive case. Therefore, greater particularity in pleading , through showing 'plausible grounds,' is required.").

Back v. Hall, 537 F.3d 552, 558 (6th Cir. 2008) ("Hall and Schrader separately argue that Back has failed to establish a prima facie case of political-affiliation dismissal. Were this appeal before us in the context of the denial of a summary judgment motion, we might entertain their argument. But it is not. Because we are at the pleading stage of this case, and because there is no 'heightened pleading requirement ... for civil rights plaintiffs in cases in which the defendant raises the affirmative defense of qualified immunity,' . . . Back was not required to plead her prima facie case . . . . But for now, at the pleading stage, it suffices that Back alleged that she 'was terminated by defendants Hall and Schrader by reason of her political affiliation as a Democrat.'").

Lambert v. Hartman, 517 F.3d 433, at 439, 440, 442, 445, 446 (6th Cir. 2008) ("Although the factual allegations in a complaint need not be detailed, they 'must do more than create speculation or suspicion of a legally cognizable cause of action; they must show entitlement to relief.' League of United Latin Am. Citizens v. Bredesen, 500 F.3d 523, 527 (6th Cir.2007) (emphasis in original) (citing Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1964-65 (2007)). . . . [T]his court has recognized an informational-privacy interest of constitutional dimension in only two instances: (1) where the release of personal information could lead to bodily harm (Kallstrom), and (2) where the information released was of a sexual, personal, and humiliating nature (Bloch). . . . Lambert's first argument is a request for us to adopt a new approach to assessing informational privacy claims– one that does not require the court to first determine whether the privacy interest implicates a fundamental right. The reasonable-expectation-of-privacy standard that Lambert proposes is in many ways similar to the more fluid approach that other circuits have adopted for assessing claims of informational privacy. . . . Employing this standard, Lambert argues that she has a reasonable expectation of privacy in her Social Security number, and that the district court therefore erred in failing to balance that interest against the Defendants' interest in publishing unredacted public records on the internet. Lambert is of course correct in pointing out that both Congress and the courts have recognized the privacy interest in one's Social Security number. . . . The Sixth Circuit, however, has developed and applied a different approach to assessing informational privacy claims. As discussed above, that approach requires that the asserted privacy interest implicate a fundamental right. . . . We are bound by those decisions unless this court sitting en banc or the Supreme Court holds otherwise, and Lambert's argument must fail for that reason. . . . Lambert has undoubtedly shown that, as a policy matter, the Clerk's decision to provide unfettered internet access to people's Social Security numbers was unwise. This much is evidenced by the fact that the Defendants have subsequently removed the citations in question from the website and changed the local rules to better protect sensitive personal information. But to constitutionalize a harm of the type Lambert has suffered would be to open a Pandora's box of claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 , a step that we are unwilling to take. . . . Indeed, absent a showing of an infringement of a right that is 'fundamental or implicit in the concept of ordered liberty,' this court's precedents bar an action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 from proceeding any further.").

Midwest Media Property, L.L.C. v. Symmes Tp., Ohio, 503 F.3d 456, *472 & n.3 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Admittedly, the notice pleading requirement was amended slightly by the Supreme Court's recent decision in Bell Atlantic Co. v. Twombly, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007), which held that 'a plaintiff's obligation to provide the Agrounds" of his Aentitlement to relief" requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do....' . . . Twombly does not apply here, however, because Plaintiff has coupled its allegations with facts which suggest that Defendant has deprived it of its alleged right to post signs. . . . Twombly involved a claim under ' 1 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, which requires the plaintiff to prove that the defendants engaged in a 'contract, combination ... or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce.'. . Rather than alleging that such collusion existed, however, the Twombly plaintiff merely alleged that the defendants were operating their businesses in a manner which is consistent with collusion, and then invited the courts to conclude that a conspiracy must follow from this circumstantial evidence. . . . The Supreme Court held that, under ' 1 of the Sherman Act, a 'bare assertion of conspiracy' is not sufficient to state a claim. . . Instead, the Twombly plaintiff was also required to plead facts which 'raise[ ] a suggestion' of actual collusion. . . In other words, Twombly was a case where the plaintiff invoked a statute banning collusion, but failed to actually state any facts suggesting collusion. This stands in stark contrast to the instant case. Here, Plaintiff alleges a violation of the First Amendment's Free Speech Clause, and supports its allegation with specific examples of instances where the challenged regulations denied it the ability to speak freely. Plaintiff expressly states that it has been unable to post signs '[a]s a result of the Township's enforcement of its Sign Regulations.'. . It cites nine specific examples where it was denied its alleged rights as a direct result of the Township's denial of Plaintiff's applications to post signs.").

Association of Cleveland Fire Fighters v. City of Cleveland, Ohio, 502 F.3d 545, 548 (6th Cir. 2007) ("The Supreme Court has recently clarified the law with respect to what a plaintiff must plead in order to survive a Rule 12(b)(6) motion. Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007). The Court stated that 'a plaintiff's obligation to provide the grounds of his entitlement to relief requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do.'. . Additionally, the Court emphasized that even though a complaint need not contain 'detailed' factual allegations, its '[f]actual allegations must be enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level on the assumption that all the allegations in the complaint are true.'. . In so holding, the Court disavowed the oft-quoted Rule 12(b)(6) standard of Conley v. Gibson, . . . characterizing that rule as one 'best forgotten as an incomplete, negative gloss on an accepted pleading standard.'").

Association of Cleveland Fire Fighters v. Twombly*, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007), but if there was any doubt whether Twombly altered the pleading requirements, the Supreme Court put that doubt to rest in *Erickson v. Lindsay v. Yates, 498 F.3d 434, 440 n.6 (6th Cir. 2007) ("Swierkiewicz was discussed extensively by the dissent in the Supreme Court's recent decision in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 1955, 167 L.Ed.2d 929 (2007). Twombly addressed requirements for pleading an antitrust claim under ' 1 of the Sherman Act. The dissent argued that the Twombly majority had devised a 'new pleading rule' that called into question the continued vitality of Swierkiewicz. 127 S.Ct. at 1974 (Stevens, J., dissenting). Because the Supreme Court majority distinguished Swierkiewicz and nowhere expressed an intent to overturn it, we have no basis for concluding that Swierkiewicz is no longer good law. Moreover, although this case does not present the question of if, or exactly how, Twombly has changed the pleading requirements of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a), we note that in Erickson v. Pardus, __ U.S. __, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 167 L.Ed.2d 1081 (2007), decided after Twombly, the Supreme Court reaffirmed that Rule 8(a) 'requires only a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.'").

Although these Forms 'illustrate the simplicity and brevity,' Fed.R.Civ.P. 84, that the Rules

Bell v. City of Cleveland, 548 F.Supp.2d 444, 448-50 (N.D. Ohio 2008) ("In an excessive force action, involving the question of qualified immunity , the officer's intent or motive is not determinative. . .Rather, the issue regarding Officer Delvecchio will be the objective legal reasonableness of his action in view of the circumstances he confronted, assessed in light of clearly established legal rules. . . Thus, Crawford-El and Goad are inapposite, and do not support the application of Rule 7(a) to require a reply in this case. . . Delvecchio's motion seeks to move the complaint beyond the 'short and plain statement' requirements of Civil Rule 8(a). . . He requests that the court order a reply which sets forth 'specific facts (not conclusory allegations) that demonstrate a genuine issue of fact regarding Officer Delvecchio's right to qualified immunity at this time.'. . Essentially, Delvecchio seeks to impose a summary judgment standard under Rule 56 onto the initial pleadings of this case. Moreover, Delvecchio implies that the complaint is insufficient in that it does not reflect the version of facts as set forth in his answer. . . The court reads the complaint as alleging specific facts, not merely conclusory allegations. . . While those alleged facts are (not surprisingly) contested at this early stage of the litigation, it is not accurate to say that the complaint contains merely 'conclusory allegations.'. . [T]he allegations of the complaint in this case are specific in setting forth a factual scenario (albeit contested) of the shooting. . . The Supreme Court has consistently rejected heightened pleading standards not required by the Federal Rules themselves. Last year, the Court rejected the Sixth Circuit's requirement that prisoners plead and demonstrate exhaustion in complaints under the Prison Litigation Reform Act. . . . Although the court must look to the complaint when evaluating an assertion of qualified immunity in an excessive force action, 'there is no heightened pleading requirement for such claims.' . . . In summary, Crawford-El and Goad do not support the application of Rule 7(a) to require a reply in this case.").

Rice v. Wells Fargo Home Mortg., 2007 WL 4126525, at *4 (E.D.Mich. Nov. 19, 2007)("The Sixth Circuit has not expressly ruled on the scope of Twombly, but several cases have mentioned it. Carrasquillo v. City of Cleveland, No. 1:10-CV-219, 2010 WL 3893616, at *2 (N.D. Ohio Sept. 27, 2010) ("Although the plaintiff's complaint sets forth sparse factual allegations, the Iqbal standard does not require more to survive a motion to dismiss. The facts Carrasquillo alleges sufficiently support his wrongful arrest and imprisonment claims at this stage of litigation. Carrasquillo correctly points out that much of the information demanded by the defendants' motion rests in their own hands. Without further discovery, this Court will not require the plaintiff to allege with detail the methodology the defendants used to conduct their investigation, the manner by which that investigation unfolded, or the precise role each defendant played in the investigation and arrest. Similarly, this Court will not require detailed factual allegations regarding the existence and validity of an arrest warrant still undisclosed to the plaintiff. Though Rule 8 'does not unlock the doors of discovery', neither does it require plaintiffs to allege facts that only discovery could reveal. In addition, if this Court accepts Carrasquillo's allegations as true, which it must in evaluating a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, it is plausible that the plaintiff has suffered false arrest and imprisonment. The plaintiff states that he was arrested, briefly jailed, and released without charge. All parties identify the plaintiff's 17-year-old son as the correct target of the arrest. According to the plaintiff, he was 44 years old at the time of his arrest. The plaintiff also says that he repeatedly asserted his innocence during the arrest. . . and that he repeatedly identified himself. . . . Taken as true, these facts could plausibly suggest either that probable cause did not support the arrest, or that the defendants incorrectly executed a warrant against someone they could not reasonably mistake for 17-year-old Nelson Carrasquillo, Jr.").

Felton v. City of Chicago, 827 F.3d 632, 635-37 (7th Cir. 2016) ("Felton's allegations—that when he fled officers along an expressway, they chased him, rammed his car, and used stun guns on him—were not frivolous. . . If the judge dismissed the suit as factually frivolous, he abused his discretion. A claim is legally frivolous if it is 'based on an indisputably meritless legal theory.'. . Felton's theory is familiar: he says officers used excessive force in arresting him, which violates the Fourth Amendment (applicable to the states through the Fourteenth). As an initial matter, Felton's suit would lack 'even an arguable basis in law' if his injuries were self-inflicted and the officers caused him no harm. That may be what the district judge concluded after reading the newspapers. But when screening for frivolousness, 'the complaint is the entire record of the case.'.

. The 'frivolousness determination, frequently made sua sponte before the defendant has even been asked to file an answer, cannot serve as a factfinding process for the resolution of disputed facts.'. . Felton says the judge relied on the newspapers to dismiss his suit. And though the City did not file a brief, it sent a letter to the court, agreeing with Felton that the district court dismissed the suit 'based on the court's independent research into newspaper accounts of the underlying incident.' If the judge did so, that is unjustifiable, no matter how deferential our review. In our analysis, we credit Felton's allegation that the officers caused his injuries. Felton argues that the legal viability of his suit depends on facts that could not have been determined at the screening stage. For example, he asks 'whether the police were justified in chasing [him] in the first place.' But that's irrelevant because 'pre-seizure conduct is not subject to Fourth Amendment scrutiny.' Carter v. Buscher, 973 F.2d 1328, 1332–33 (7th Cir. 1992); see also California v. Hodari D., 499 U.S. 621, 626–27 (1991). . . Felton also questions whether the officers had 'some other purpose,' aside from stopping his flight. But the Fourth Amendment analysis is objective, so the officers' intentions do not matter. . . Objectively, at least one part of Felton's complaint was legally viable: his allegation that he was shot by multiple stun guns. Nothing in the complaint says that this happened during the car chase. A reasonable inference is that it happened afterward. And nothing in the complaint says whether Felton was subdued, passively resisting, or actively resisting at the time. Discovery may reveal that he was actively resisting, but at the screening stage the judge was required to draw the reasonable inference that Felton was subdued or only passively resisting. In that case, shooting him with stun guns could violate clearly established law. . . Dismissing these allegations as frivolous was an abuse of discretion. As to the legal effect of Felton's allegations that officers rammed his car, the parties were correct to focus on the objective dangerousness of the car chase. Officers are allowed to end a highly dangerous car chase by ramming the fleeing car. . . But, as Felton stresses, the complaint does not say that the chase was dangerous. Felton's chase might have been like O.J. Simpson's: low-speed, on a deserted expressway, with officers following at a safe distance. If Felton posed no danger but officers rammed his car, a Fourth Amendment claim would not be frivolous. . . It might be fair to say that a car chase along an expressway is usually dangerous, so the inference that the chase was O.J.like is not reasonable. And if the chase in this case was not dangerous, Felton should have said that in his complaint. But even if that was the case, when a plaintiff—especially a pro se plaintiff—fails to state a claim in his first complaint, he should ordinarily be given a chance to amend. . . And because Felton's stun gun allegations stated a claim, the case must be returned to the district court. Because Felton did not name the specific officers involved in his arrest, he must amend his complaint, so he will have the opportunity to add detail to his car chase allegations. On remand, the parties should know that in Scott v. Harris, the Supreme Court refused to accept the non-movant's version of the facts at summary judgment because that version was clearly contradicted by a video of the chase. . . If video exists that clearly contradicts Felton's story, an early and cost-efficient motion for summary judgment might be appropriate. Of course, as the Scott dissent noted, . . . video may not tell the whole story and reasonable people can sometimes draw different conclusions from the same video. If the defendants move for summary judgment, the parties should know that Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56(d) allows non-movants to argue that further discovery is necessary to resolve the motion.")

Herron v. Meyer, 820 F.3d 860, 863-64 (7th Cir. 2016) ("If Meyer set out to punish Herron for his grievances, then a price has been attached to speech. The district court thought otherwise in part because Herron had not attached his grievances to the complaint, but that was not necessary; a complaint narrates a claim and need not supply the proof. That comes later. . . And if, as we doubt, an amendment to the complaint was required, the district court should have allowed it rather than dismissing the claim. . . Whether a penalty has been attached to protected speech is potentially more difficult. Many decisions assume that essentially everything a prisoner says in the grievance system—if not everything a prisoner says to a guard—is protected by the First Amendment. See, e.g., DeWalt v. Carter, 224 F.3d 607, 618 (7th Cir.2000); Pearson v. Welborn, 471 F.3d 732, 741 (7th Cir.2006). These decisions do not discuss a parallel line of cases about grievances that public workers make about the conditions of their employment. That line of cases attempts to distinguish statements on topics of public importance (protected) from personal gripes (unprotected) and statements that disrupt the workplace (also unprotected). . . The decisions in the prison-grievance line do not explain why the First Amendment offers greater protection to prisoners than to public employees. We do not get into that here, because the subject has not been addressed in the briefs. It is enough to flag the subject as worth attention, either in some future litigation or in this case if, contrary to our expectations, the First Amendment theory turns out to matter. The judgment of the district court is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Childress v. Walker, 787 F.3d 433, 440-41 (7th Cir. 2015) ("[A]llegations that a prison administrator knew that the conditions of a prisoner's mandatory release included a ban on computer-related material, but nevertheless instituted, condoned, or willfully turned a blind eye to a practice that placed computer-related material among prisoners' possessions, state a claim for relief under the Eighth Amendment. These are the precise allegations that Mr. Childress sets forth in his complaint. He alleges that there is a regular practice of placing computer disks with inmates' property. . . Moreover, he alleges that prison administrators knew of this practice and knew that this practice put at least some recently released prisoners in jeopardy of losing their freedom, but nevertheless did not alter, change, or otherwise intervene to prevent the harm. Specifically, on his return to BMRCC in November 2010, Assistant Warden Bates admitted to Mr. Childress that two other inmates had been re-incarcerated on the basis of 'the same policies, practice, and procedures regarding floppy disk[s] associated with institutional programs being placed in the outgoing property of inmates by IDOC Employees.'. . . To survive dismissal, a plaintiff's complaint 'need only "give the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests."'. . Here, Mr. Childress alerts Assistant Warden Bates to his claim and to the basis of that claim: Assistant Warden Bates, as 'Assistant Warden of Programs,'. . was familiar with the practices of the Lifestyle Redirection Program; he knew that the practices of the Lifestyle Redirection Program, or of similar programs, were causing recently released inmates to lose their freedom, but did nothing to prevent this harm; indeed he 'continued to adhere to[ ] and follow these same policies, practices, and procedures all to the detriment and deprivation of the plaintiff[']s Constitutional

Adams v. City of Indianapolis, 742 F.3d 720, 733 (7th Cir. 2014) ("For all its heft, the amended complaint alludes to disparate impact in wholly conclusory terms. In several places the complaint uses the words 'disproportionate' and 'impermissible impact' and other synonyms, but those are bare legal conclusions, not facts. We reiterate that '[t]hreadbare recitals of the elements of the cause of action, supported by mere conclusory statements, do not suffice' to state a plausible claim for relief. . . Moreover, '[t]his is a complex discrimination claim, and we have observed that under Iqbal and Twombly, "[t]he required level of factual specificity rises with the complexity of the claim."'. . In a complex disparate-impact case like this one, we would expect to see some factual content in the complaint tending to show that the City's testing process, or some particular part of it, caused a relevant and statistically significant disparity between black and white applicants for promotion. The amended complaint contains no factual allegations of this sort. We are told that the promotion-testing process during this period had several component parts, but the plaintiffs do not identify which part they are attacking. Perhaps they could try to demonstrate that the different elements of the testing process are not capable of separation for analysis, see 42 U.S.C. § 2000e–2(k)(1)(B)(i); this flaw alone might not be fatal. The far more serious problem is the complete lack of factual content directed at disparate-impact liability. There are no allegations about the number of applicants and the racial makeup of the applicant pool as compared to the candidates promoted or as compared to the police or fire department as a whole. There are no allegations about the racial makeup of the relevant workforce in the Indianapolis metropolitan area or the supervisory ranks in the police and fire departments. There are no factual allegations tending to show a causal link between the challenged testing protocols and a statistically significant racial imbalance in the ranks of sergeant, lieutenant, or captain in the police department or battalion chief, lieutenant, or captain in the fire department. Disparate-impact plaintiffs are permitted to rely on a variety of statistical methods and comparisons to support their claims. At the pleading stage, some basic allegations of this sort will suffice. But the amended complaint contains no allegations of the kind, nor any other factual material to move the disparate-impact claims over the plausibility threshold. Accordingly, these claims were properly dismissed on the pleadings.")

Turley v. Rednour, 729 F.3d 625, 651, 652 (7th Cir. 2013) ("Twombly and Iqbal direct us to consider whether the plaintiff's claims are plausible. However, it is important to keep in mind that even after Twombly and Iqbal, pro se complaints like Turley's are to be construed liberally. See, e.g., Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 93–94 (2007) (per curiam); Munson v. Gaetz, 673 F.3d 630, 632–33 (7th Cir.2012). Here, Turley survives dismissal because his claims are plausible and his complaint sets out more than conclusory statements. . . Turley argues that frequent lockdowns for substantial periods of time have deprived him of exercise and caused him various health issues. The State's response is that Turley has failed to allege a constitutionally sufficient injury, especially since no individual lockdown exceeded 90 days, and the defendants were not deliberately indifferent to Turley's or the other inmates' situation. The district court dismissed this claim because it thought that Turley had not listed specific periods of confinement, but this conclusion is incorrect. The State relies heavily on Pearson v. Ramos, 237 F.3d 881, 886 (7th Cir.2001), for the notion that there exists an ironclad rule that a denial of yard privileges shorter than 90 consecutive days cannot be the basis for an Eighth Amendment claim. However, the State has misconstrued this rule. In Pearson, we stated that we thought 'it a reasonable rule that a denial of yard privileges for no more than 90 days at a stretch is not cruel and unusual punishment.'. . However, we were careful to explain that the 'norm of proportionality' would guide the acceptable duration of lockdown. Even a lockdown not exceeding 90 days could violate that norm if it were 'impos [ed] ... for some utterly trivial infraction of the prison's disciplinary rules.'")

Luevano v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 722 F.3d 1014, 1021-25 & n.5, 1027, 1028 (7th Cir. 2013) ("IFP plaintiffs have the same right as other plaintiffs to amend a timely filed complaint at least once as a matter of course pursuant to Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 15(a) and to make further amendments with leave of court. The only difference regarding IFP and fee-paying plaintiffs arises in section 1915(e), which directs courts to screen all complaints filed with requests to proceed IFP and provides that 'the court shall dismiss the case at any time' if, among other things, the action is frivolous or malicious or 'fails to state a claim on which relief may be granted....' 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2). If a district court's sua sponte dismissal in such cases were without leave to amend, we would face serious questions about fair access to the courts. Without at least an opportunity to amend or to respond to an order to show cause, an IFP applicant's case could be tossed out of court without giving the applicant any timely notice or opportunity to be heard to clarify, contest, or simply request leave to amend. . . . District courts must allow IFP plaintiffs leave to amend at least once in all circumstances in which such leave would be granted to feepaying plaintiffs under Rule 15(a). . . . We therefore join the majority of other circuits in interpreting section 1915(e) not only to permit granting IFP plaintiffs leave to amend complaints dismissed for failure to state a claim but also to require granting IFP plaintiffs leave to amend their complaints at least once when Rule 15(a) would allow amendment in the case of fee-paying litigants. . . .We have previously recognized an additional interpretive question regarding section 1915's use of the word 'case,' leaving as an open question whether or not section '1915(e)(2)'s requirement that "the case" be dismissed necessitates the dismissal of the entire action or merely the complaint....' Furnace v. Bd. of Trustees of Southern Illinois Univ., 218 F.3d 666, 669 (7th Cir.2000). Today we also resolve that issue: Section 1915 requires the district court to dismiss only the complaint, not the entire action, and the court should grant leave to amend in all cases in which a fee-paying plaintiff would enjoy leave to amend under Rule 15(a). . . . On the merits, we conclude that the district court erred in dismissing Luevano's original complaint for failure to state a claim upon which relief may be granted. . . .The original complaint stated claims for relief. As a preliminary matter, the pleading standards for pro se plaintiffs are considerably relaxed, Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 94 (2007) (per curiam), even in the wake of Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). . . . Neither Iqbal nor Twombly overruled Swierkiewicz, and it is our duty to apply the Supreme Court's precedents unless and until the Supreme Court itself overrules them.")

Engel v. Buchan, 710 F.3d 698, 699, 708-10 (7th Cir. 2013) ("A Bivens cause of action is available for violations of Brady. Although the Supreme Court has cautioned against extending Bivens to new contexts, this case meets the Court's requirements for doing so and is materially indistinguishable from Bivens itself. And Engel's complaint contains enough factual specificity to state a plausible claim for violation of his due-process rights under Brady. Because the Brady obligation was well established at the time of the events at issue here (Buchan does not argue otherwise), qualified immunity does not apply. . . . [S]haky or no, Bivens remains the law, and we are not free to ignore it. As recently as last year, the Supreme Court reaffirmed the standards for resolving new Bivens questions. Minneci, 132 S.Ct. at 621. Applying those standards here, we conclude, consistent with our decision in Manning I, that a Bivens cause of action is available for a Brady violation committed by a federal law-enforcement agent in connection with a state criminal prosecution. . . . Buchan also argues that even if Engel has a cause of action under Bivens, qualified immunity applies because the complaint does not contain sufficiently specific factual allegations to plausibly state a claim for violation of Engel's due-process rights. . . . It is beyond dispute that the Brady right was well established at the time of the events set forth in Engel's complaint. . . Buchan does not argue otherwise. Instead, he maintains that Engel's complaint lacks sufficient factual content to state a claim for a Brady violation under the pleading standard announced in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662 (2009). . . .Buchan argues that Engel makes only conclusory allegations with respect to his central claim of wrongdoing—as, for example, when he alleges that '[a]ll of the evidence introduced against Plaintiff at his trial was the product of intentional misconduct by the Defendants, who fabricated evidence, manipulated witnesses, and withheld exculpatory evidence.' Were this the entirety of the factual allegations in the complaint, Buchan might have a point. . . .But Iqbal makes clear that 'legal conclusions can provide the framework of a complaint' so long as they are 'supported by factual allegations,'. . . and that is the case here. Read as a whole, Engel's complaint easily contains enough specific factual allegations to state a plausible claim for violation of his due-process rights under Brady. [court reviews factual allegations] These allegations, read in context with the rest of the complaint, surpass the plausibility threshold of Twombly and Iqbal.")

Richards v. Mitcheff, 696 F.3d 635, 638 (7th Cir. 2012) ("This suit. . . could not properly be dismissed under either Rule 12(b)(6) or Rule 12(c). The claim is sound in theory (see Farmer and Gamble); the complaint's allegations make an eighth-amendment recovery plausible. Indiana allows tolling because of physical incapacity—and, far from pleading that he was capable of suing throughout the two years after his first surgery, Richards pleaded incapacity, again plausibly. The district judge had this to say: 'Richards' explanations for the delay are unpersuasive.' That's it. No other analysis. The court did not identify a legal obstacle to the suit; the judge just deemed the allegations 'unpersuasive.' But a judge cannot reject a complaint's plausible allegations by calling them 'unpersuasive.' Only a trier of fact can do that, after a trial. For their part, defendants seem to be unaware that state law supplies the principles of tolling in litigation under § 1983; neither of the two briefs filed by appellees mentions Indiana's tolling rules. We appreciate the judicial desire to resolve cases as swiftly as possible. Litigation is costly for both sides, and a doomed suit should be brought to a conclusion before costs are needlessly run up. Twombly designed its plausibility requirement as a partial antidote to the high costs of discovery and trial. But neither Twombly nor Iqbal has changed the rule that judges must not make findings of fact at the pleading stage (or for that matter the summary-judgment stage). A complaint that invokes a recognized legal theory (as this one does) and contains plausible allegations on the material issues (as this one does) cannot be dismissed under Rule 12. See Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89 (2007). Judges should respect the norm that complaints need not anticipate or meet potential affirmative defenses. If the facts are uncontested (or the defendants accept plaintiffs' allegations for the sake of argument), it may be possible to decide under Rule 12(c); if the parties do not agree, but one side cannot substantiate its position with admissible evidence, the court may grant summary judgment under Rule 56. But this case has not reached the stage where Richards's allegations of physical incapacity are put to the test. Once Richards has had an opportunity to produce evidence material to the tolling question, its sufficiency under Indiana law can be tested by a motion for summary judgment. Before proceeding further, however, the district court should consider carefully whether to assist Richards in finding a lawyer who can muster the facts and, if necessary, secure medical experts.")

Norfleet v. Walker, 684 F.3d 688, 691 (7th Cir. 2012) ("There are unanswered questions about the statutory claim, and if the plaintiff were represented we might deem the complaint insufficient under the enhanced pleading standard imposed by Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 556 U.S. 662, 680–81 (2009). But as a pro se (as well as a prisoner and thus severely limited in his ability to conduct the kind of precomplaint investigation required by Iqbal), the plaintiff has pleaded enough to avert dismissal.")

Geinosky v. City of Chicago, 675 F.3d 743, 745 n.1, 748 n.3 (7th Cir. 2012) ("The defendants moved to dismiss for failure to state a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). A motion under Rule 12(b)(6) can be based only on the complaint itself, documents attached to the complaint, documents that are critical to the complaint and referred to in it, and information that is subject to proper judicial notice. . . .A plaintiff, however, has much more flexibility in opposing a Rule 12(b)(6) motion and in appealing a dismissal. A party appealing a Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal may elaborate on his factual allegations so long as the new elaborations are consistent with the pleadings. . . In the district court, too, a party opposing a Rule 12(b)(6) motion may submit materials outside the pleadings to illustrate the facts the party expects to be able to prove. . . . In the turmoil concerning civil pleading standards stirred up by Ashcroft v. Iqbal . . .and Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly . . . a plaintiff who is opposing a Rule 12(b)(6) or Rule 12(c) motion and who can provide such illustration may find it prudent to do so. (It may also be prudent to explain to the district court that the materials are being submitted for illustrative purposes and should not be used to convert the motion into a Rule 56 motion for summary judgment.) . . . . Even in a case where a plaintiff would need to identify a similarly situated person to prove his case, like the McDonald case cited by the district court on this point, we see no basis for requiring the plaintiff to identify the person in the complaint. McDonald was decided on summary judgment, not on the pleadings. . . Rule 8(a)(2) requires only 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that the pleader is entitled to relief.' Even the more demanding pleading requirements under Iqbal and Twombly do not require a plaintiff to identify specific comparators in a complaint.")

McCauley v. City of Chicago, 671 F.3d 611, 616-19 (7th Cir. 2011) ("Though the district court's analysis was faulty, the equal-protection claim against the City was properly dismissed. To state a Monell claim against the City for violation of Mersaides's right to equal protection, McCauley was required to 'plead[ ] factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference' that the City maintained a policy, custom, or practice of intentional discrimination against a class of persons to which Mersaides belonged. . . . He did not meet this burden. . . . We have interpreted Twombly and Iqbal to require the plaintiff to 'provid[e] some specific facts' to support the legal claims asserted in the complaint. . . The degree of specificity required is not easily quantified, but 'the plaintiff must give enough details about the subject-matter of the case to present a story that holds together.'. . The required level of factual specificity rises with the complexity of the claim. . . . This case is more like Brooks than Swanson. Many of the alleged 'facts' are actually legal conclusions or elements of the cause of action, which may be disregarded on a motion to dismiss. . . For example, McCauley alleges that the City 'has an unwritten custom, practice and policy to afford lesser protection or none at all to victims of domestic violence' and that '[t]here is no rational basis' for this purported policy. Similarly, McCauley alleged the following:
[The City], through its agents, employees and/or servants, acting under color of law, at the level of official policy, practice, and custom, with deliberate, callous, and conscious indifference to McCauley's constitutional rights, authorized, tolerated, and institutionalized the practices and ratified the illegal conduct herein detailed, and at all times material to this Complaint, [the City] had interrelated de facto policies, practices, and customs.
These are the legal elements of the various claims McCauley has asserted; they are not factual allegations and as such contribute nothing to the plausibility analysis under Twombly/Iqbal.Once the legal conclusions are disregarded, just one paragraph of factual allegations remains:
Defendant violated McCauley's constitutional rights under 42 U.S .C. § 1983 by:
a. failing to provide adequate security and promptly arrest Martinez;
b. failing to promulgate any policy to ensure the prompt arrest of individuals guilty of violating protective orders;
c. maintaining a policy or custom of failing to timely arrest violators of protective orders;
d. maintaining a custom and practice of failing to adequately train officers concerning the necessity of promptly arresting individuals guilty of violating protective orders;
e. maintaining a policy or custom of failing to have safeguards in place to ensure that violators of protective orders were timely arrested;
f. failing to have a custom, practice and policy in effect to verify whether someone who is arrested for domestic violence is on parole;
g. failing to have a custom, practice and policy to communicate with state officials and law enforcement officials regarding domestic violence arrests;
h. failing to have a custom, practice and policy in effect in order to communicate with parole agents on domestic violence arrests;
i. failing to have a custom, practice and policy in effect to verify whether an arrestee of a domestic violence offense is on parole prior to issuing an order of protection; and

j. maintaining a custom, practice and policy of ignoring the seriousness of domestic violence arrests.

McCauley maintains that these allegations are sufficient to state a Monell equal-protection claim against the City. We disagree. In order to state a facially plausible equal-protection claim under Monell, the factual allegations in McCauley's complaint must allow us to draw the reasonable inference that the City established a policy or practice of intentionally discriminating against female victims of domestic violence in the provision of police protection. That is, McCauley needed to allege enough 'by way of factual content to "nudg[e]" his claim of purposeful discrimination "across the line from conceivable to plausible."' Because the Equal Protection Clause is 'concerned ... with equal treatment rather than with establishing entitlements to some minimum of government services, [it] does not entitle a person to adequate, or indeed to any, police protection.'. . . 'On the other hand, selective withdrawal of police protection, as when the Southern states during the Reconstruction era refused to give police protection to their black citizens, is the prototypical denial of equal protection.'. . The allegations in the paragraph quoted above do not plausibly suggest that the City maintained a policy or practice of selective withdrawal of police protection. To the contrary, the complaint alleges that the City failed to have particularized practices in place for the special protection of domestic-violence victims. In essence, the complaint alleges that the City failed to promulgate specific policies for this particular class of crime victims, not that the City denied this class of victims equal protection. At most, the factual allegations in the complaint plausibly suggest the uneven allocation of limited police-protection services; they do not plausibly suggest that the City maintained an intentional policy or practice of omitting police protection from female domestic-violence victims as a class. Just as in Brooks, McCauley's factual allegations are entirely consistent with lawful conduct–here a lawful allocation of limited police resources. . . And the complexity of McCauley's equal-protection claim distinguishes this case from Swanson.")

McCauley v. City of Chicago, 671 F.3d 611, 620, 622-25, 627-29 (7th Cir. 2011) (Hamilton, J., dissenting in part) ("I agree with my colleagues that plaintiff has failed to state a claim against defendant Walker. I respectfully dissent from the rejection of plaintiff's equal protection claim against the City of Chicago. I am skeptical about plaintiff's ability to prove the claim, but his complaint should be sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim, even under the new and subjective pleading standards announced in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). I explain first my skepticism, then some of the problems raised by Iqbal, and finally why the complaint should survive the motion to dismiss. Mr. McCauley's suit seeks to enforce the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection requirements on the decisions of a major city police force about how to allocate its resources. Plaintiff's only viable equal protection theory is that the Chicago police department made a deliberate decision to minimize the police protection available to victims of domestic violence, and that the police did so because of an intentional animus against women, who make up the vast majority of adult victims of domestic violence. . . . As a subordinate federal court, it is our responsibility to do our best to apply the law as stated in Iqbal. My colleagues do so here, and the Iqbal standard is clearly decisive for the panel majority. The problem here is that it also our responsibility to do our best to apply other Supreme Court decisions involving pleading standards, including Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163 (1993); Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89 (2007); and Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506 (2002), as well as the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure as adopted by the Court and approved by Congress, and the form pleadings that are part of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and that were also approved by the Court and Congress. Iqbal is in serious tension with these other decisions, rules, and forms, and the Court's opinion fails to grapple with or resolve that tension. I do not believe it is an exaggeration to say that these decisions, rules, and forms simply conflict with Iqbal. As a result of this unresolved tension, since Iqbal was decided, the lower federal court decisions seeking to apply the new 'plausibility' standard are wildly inconsistent with each other, and with the conflicting decisions of the Supreme Court. . . .First, Iqbal's reasoning and holding conflict with Rule 9(b), which requires that a party alleging fraud or mistake 'state with particularity the circumstances constituting fraud or mistake.' As for other states of mind, however, the rule provides: 'Malice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind may be alleged generally.'. . . Second, Iqbal conflicts with other recent Supreme Court decisions. Iqbal did not overrule or question a number of the Court's prior cases on notice pleading. . . . Third, Iqbal conflicts with the form complaints approved by the Supreme Court and Congress as part of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Rule 84 provides that the forms in the appendix 'suffice under these rules and illustrate the simplicity and brevity that these rules contemplate.' Iqbal did not purport to overrule or amend Rule 84 or the forms, but it is difficult to reconcile the new 'plausibility' standard with those forms. Many of the approved forms require virtually no explanation of the underlying facts as long as the defendant is informed of the event or transaction that gave rise to the claim, according to the broad notice purpose of the rules. . . . Unless one can plausibly explain away the tension between Iqbal and Rule 9(b) and the Rule 84-endorsed form complaints, then Iqbal conflicts with the Rules Enabling Act, 28 U.S.C. § 2071 et seq., and the prescribed process for amending the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. . . . Fourth, Iqbal's reliance on the fact/conclusion dichotomy is highly subjective, and returns courts to the long disapproved methods of analysis under the regime of code pleading. . . . Iqbal's reliance on the fact/conclusion dichotomy makes the difference indeterminate. Application of the dichotomy is leading to judge-specific and case-specific differences in outcome that confuse everyone involved. . . . Fifth, Iqbal's reliance on 'judicial experience and common sense' invites the highly subjective and inconsistent results that have been observed. The Iqbal concept of plausibility is 'context-specific.'. . As a practical matter, the concept invites district judges to exercise their individual views of the likely merits of the case at the outset, when the only information available is the complaint. Worse still, an uncritical reading of the Court's 'obvious alternative explanation' reasoning seems to invite judges to weigh competing explanations for alleged conduct and dismiss cases merely because they believe one explanation over another. . . In application, this standard bears a striking resemblance to the most stringent pleading requirement in American civil law, for pleading scienter in securities fraud claims, pursuant to the specific direction of Congress in the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act. See 15 U.S.C. § 78u-4(b)(2) (requiring plaintiff to 'state with particularity facts giving rise to a strong inference that the defendant acted with the required state of mind'); accord, Tellabs, Inc. v. Makor Issues and Rights, Ltd., 551 U.S. 308, 323-24 (2007) (explaining that a 'strong inference' must be 'cogent and compelling, thus strong in light of other explanations' for the defendant's actions). Congress has not imposed such a demanding standard for pleading in any other context–including civil rights and employment discrimination cases, which often turn on whether a defendant's explanation for a decision is legitimate or merely a pretext covering for unlawful bias. Rule 9(b) and the Supreme Court decisions in Swierkiewicz and Leatherman permit plaintiffs to plead intent generally, meaning without the sort of specifics required under the PSLRA. But if the Iqbal pleading standard is applied in the district court, plaintiffs who already face the uphill battle of proving secret intent must now contend with the possibility of pre-discovery dismissal whenever the alleged pretext asserted by defendants in their motion to dismiss sounds plausible to the common sense of the particular judge. The potential harm of Iqbal in this context is that outcomes will vary based on how different judges view the plausibility of, for example, a police policymaker harboring and acting on improper motives toward women who complain of domestic violence. . . . In the face of all these problems, what are the lower federal courts to do? . . . . The first thing we can do is recognize the uncertainty that litigants, their lawyers, and district courts now face. As a result of that uncertainty, the courts of appeals should insist that in all but the most unusual situations, a party whose pleading is dismissed based on the Iqbal plausibility standard should be entitled to an opportunity to amend the pleading after the court has made its decision. . . . We should exercise caution to avoid punishing parties for imperfect predictions as to how the subjective and inconsistent Iqbal standard might be applied in their case. . . .But where that approach is not enough to resolve the case, I believe we must take care not to expand Iqbal too aggressively beyond its highly unusual context–allegations aimed at the nation's highest-ranking law enforcement officials based on their response to unprecedented terrorist attacks on the United States homeland–to cut off potentially viable claims. Iqbal exemplifies the old adage about hard cases. The failure of the Supreme Court to address all of the law that would conflict with broad application of the case should weigh heavily against that broad application, at least until the Supreme Court provides clearer guidance about how to reconcile Iqbal with its prior cases, the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and their accompanying forms. Reading the present complaint as a whole, plaintiff McCauley has alleged the particulars of a plausible Monell claim. As the majority points out, McCauley has alleged the elements of such a claim using the relevant legal language. While some of these statements are conclusory in nature, they serve to notify defendants and the court of the type of claim being brought. There can be no doubt that the complaint provides sufficient notice of the circumstances that gave rise to the claims. McCauley made factual allegations that Chicago police failed to arrest Martinez despite knowledge of his harassment and violations, ¶ 25, and that this failure resulted from a custom of untimeliness and indifference with regard to the seriousness of domestic violence, ¶ 125(c) and (j). McCauley alleges 'deliberate indifference' generally, see ¶ 126, but elsewhere describes numerous specific failures to act that are factually consistent with such an intent. See, e.g., ¶ 51. It is difficult to imagine what more McCauley might allege on the crucial question of intent without reciting a list of specific states of mind that Chicago police policy-makers might have. We did not require such a recital in Swanson and we should not do so here. By extending Iqbal to dismiss plaintiff McCauley's equal protection Monell claim against the City of Chicago, the majority runs afoul of Leatherman, Rule 9(b), and the form complaints approved by the Supreme Court and Congress as part of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Perhaps the Supreme Court majority intended Iqbal to work such a revolution in federal civil practice, but if so, the Court failed to grapple with the conflicts and did not express any direct rejection of these other governing sources of law. Under these circumstances, therefore, I would reverse the dismissal of plaintiff's equal protection claim against the City of Chicago and give him an opportunity to pursue discovery. Even if I agreed that the current version of the complaint failed to state a claim, I would remand with instructions to give plaintiff an opportunity to file an amended complaint to try to comply with the new and uncertain standards of Iqbal.")

In re Text Messaging Antitrust Litigation, 630 F.3d 622, 625-27, 629 (7th Cir. 2010) ("The interlocutory appeal that we are asked to authorize in this case does not seek to overturn any findings of fact. The defendants are arguing rather that even if all the factual allegations of the complaint are true, the complaint is insufficiently plausible to satisfy *Twombly. They are asking us to apply a legal standard–the pleading standard set forth in Twombly –to a set of factual allegations taken as true for purposes of the appeal. . . . [W]hen the question presented by an appeal is whether Twombly requires dismissal of a complaint, the concerns underlying that decision argue for empowering the district court and the court of appeals to authorize an interlocutory appeal. *Twombly, even more clearly than its successor, *Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009), is designed to spare defendants the expense of responding to bulky, burdensome discovery unless the complaint provides enough information to enable an inference that the suit has sufficient merit to warrant putting the defendant to the burden of responding to at least a limited discovery demand. When a district court by misapplying the Twombly standard allows a complex case of extremely dubious merit to proceed, it bids fair to immerse the parties in the discovery swamp–'that Serbonian bog ... where armies whole have sunk' (Paradise Lost ix 592-94)–and by doing so create irrevocable as well as unjustifiable harm to the defendant that only an immediate appeal can avert. Such appeals should not be routine, and won't be, because as we said both district court and court of appeals must agree to allow an appeal under section 1292(b); but they should not be precluded altogether by a narrow interpretation of 'question of law.'. . . [I]n this case there is no question of hunting through a record or immersing ourselves in a complicated contract, and moreover we do have a question of the meaning of a common law doctrine–namely the federal common law doctrine of pleading in complex cases, announced in *Twombly. Decisions holding that the application of a legal standard is a controlling question of law within the meaning of section 1292(b) are numerous. . . . Not that routine applications of well-settled legal standards to facts alleged in a complaint are appropriate for interlocutory appeal. But Twombly is a recent decision, and its scope unsettled (especially in light of its successor, Iqbal –from which the author of the majority opinion in Twombly dissented; and two of the Justices who participated in those cases have since retired). This court has only twice discussed the application of Twombly to antitrust violations, and in both cases only in passing. . . Pleading standards in federal litigation are in ferment after Twombly and *Iqbal, and therefore an appeal seeking a clarifying decision that might head off protracted litigation is within the scope of section 1292(b). . . The previous cases do not address the relation of Twombly to the standards for interlocutory appeals under that section, and that is a further novelty that justifies the conclusion that the appeal presents a genuine question of law. So we grant the application for interlocutory appeal, and, since the merits of the appeal have been fully briefed in the parties' submissions and would not, we think, be illuminated by oral argument, we proceed to the merits. . . . [W]e agree with the district judge that the complaint alleges a conspiracy with sufficient plausibility to satisfy the pleading standard of *Twombly. . . . The Court said in Iqbal that the 'plausibility standard is not akin to a "probability requirement," but it asks for more than a sheer possibility that a defendant has acted unlawfully.'. . This is a little unclear because plausibility, probability, and possibility overlap. Probability runs the gamut from a zero likelihood to a certainty. What is impossible has a zero likelihood of occurring and what is plausible has a moderately high likelihood of occurring. The fact that the allegations undergirding a claim could be true is no longer enough to save a complaint from being dismissed; the complaint must establish a nonnegligible probability that the claim is valid; but the probability need not be as great as such terms as 'preponderance of the evidence' connote. The plaintiffs have conducted no discovery. Discovery may reveal the smoking gun or bring to light additional circumstantial evidence that further tilts the balance in favor of liability. All that we conclude at this early stage in the litigation is that the district judge was right to rule that the second amended complaint provides a sufficiently plausible case of price fixing to warrant allowing the plaintiffs to proceed to discovery.")

Atkins v. City of Chicago, 631 F.3d 823, 832 (7th Cir. 2011) ("So suppose some of the plaintiff's factual allegations are unrealistic or nonsensical and others not, some contradict others, and some are 'speculative' in the sense of implausible and ungrounded. The district court has to consider all these features of a complaint en route to deciding whether it has enough substance to warrant putting the defendant to the expense of discovery. . . or, in a case such as this (like Iqbal itself), burdening a defense of immunity. . . We are left in darkness as to whether the plaintiff is actually alleging that Atkins was denied food or water for four days, or for a lesser, but still constitutionally significant, length of time. The plaintiff's lawyer has had four bites at the apple. Enough is enough. . . All this is apart from the futility of the suit. Atkins is the only witness for the plaintiff, and Atkins is dead. His widow would be happy to testify to what he told her had happened to him, but her testimony would be inadmissible hearsay. There is no other evidence to support the charge of unconstitutional conditions of confinement, and no suggestion that any defendants, or other members of the prison staff, are prepared to support the plaintiff's version of the facts–or, should we say, any one of the plaintiff's versions. The district court was correct to dismiss the suit.")

Bausch v. Stryker Corp., 630 F.3d 546, 558, 561 (7th Cir. 2010) ("There are no special pleading requirements for product liability claims in general, or for Class III medical device claims in particular. The federal standard of notice pleading applies, so long as the plaintiff alleges facts sufficient to meet the new 'plausibility' standard applied in Iqbal and *Twombly. . . In applying that standard to claims for defective manufacture of a medical device in violation of federal law, moreover, district courts must keep in mind that much of the product-specific information about manufacturing needed to investigate such a claim fully is kept confidential by federal law. Formal discovery is necessary before a plaintiff can fairly be expected to provide a detailed statement of the specific bases for her claim. Accordingly, the district court erred in this case by dismissing plaintiff's original complaint and by denying her leave to amend her complaint. . . . As Judge Melloy noted in Medtronic Leads: 'If plaintiffs must allege that the defendant violated a particular FDA-approved specification before discovery, then it is difficult to appreciate how any plaintiff will ever be able to defeat a Rule 12(b)(6) motion.' [In re Medtronic, Inc., Sprint Fidelis Leads Products Liability Litigation, 623 F.3d 1200, 1212 (8th Cir.2010) (Melloy, J., dissenting)] We think Judge Melloy said it well in suggesting that, in analyzing the sufficiency of pleadings , 'a plaintiff's pleading burden should be commensurate with the amount of information available to them.' Id. Here, Bausch pled sufficiently given the amount of information to which she had access.")

Swanson v. Citibank, N.A., 614 F.3d 400, 403-05 (7th Cir. 2010) ("The question with which courts are still struggling is how much higher the Supreme Court meant to set the bar, when it decided not only Twombly, but also Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89 (2007), and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). This is not an easy question to answer, as the thoughtful dissent from this opinion demonstrates. On the one hand, the Supreme Court has adopted a 'plausibility' standard, but on the other hand, it has insisted that it is not requiring fact pleading, nor is it adopting a single pleading standard to replace Rule 8, Rule 9, and specialized regimes like the one in the Private Securities Litigation Reform Act ("PSLRA"), 15 U.S.C. § 78u-4(b)(2). . . . As we understand it, the Court is saying . . . that the plaintiff must give enough details about the subject-matter of the case to present a story that holds together. In other words, the court will ask itself could these things have happened, not did they happen. For cases governed only by Rule 8, it is not necessary to stack up inferences side by side and allow the case to go forward only if the plaintiff's inferences seem more compelling than the opposing inferences. . . The Supreme Court's explicit decision to reaffirm the validity of Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506 (2002), which was cited with approval in Twombly, 550 U.S. at 556, indicates that in many straightforward cases, it will not be any more difficult today for a plaintiff to meet that burden than it was before the Court's recent decisions. A plaintiff who believes that she has been passed over for a promotion because of her sex will be able to plead that she was employed by Company X, that a promotion was offered, that she applied and was qualified for it, and that the job went to someone else. That is an entirely plausible scenario, whether or not it describes what 'really' went on in this plaintiff's case. A more complex case involving financial derivatives, or tax fraud that the parties tried hard to conceal, or antitrust violations, will require more detail, both to give the opposing party notice of what the case is all about and to show how, in the plaintiff's mind at least, the dots should be connected. . . . Swanson's complaint identifies the type of discrimination that she thinks occurs (racial), by whom (Citibank, through Skertich, the manager, and the outside appraisers it used), and when (in connection with her effort in early 2009 to obtain a home-equity loan). This is all that she needed to put in the complaint.")

Swanson v. Citibank, N.A., 614 F.3d 400, 407-12 (7th Cir. 2010) (Posner, J., dissenting in part) ("I join the majority opinion except with respect to reversing the dismissal of the plaintiff's claim of housing discrimination. I have difficulty squaring that reversal with Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009), unless Iqbal is limited to cases in which there is a defense of official immunity–especially if as in that case it is asserted by very high-ranking officials (the Attorney General of the United States and the Director of the FBI)– because the defense is compromised if the defendants have to respond to discovery demands in a case unlikely to have merit. . . . The majority opinion does not suggest that the Supreme Court would limit Iqbal to immunity cases. . . . There is language in my colleagues' opinion to suggest that discrimination cases are outside the scope of Iqbal, itself a discrimination case. The opinion says that 'a plaintiff who believes that she has been passed over for a promotion because of her sex will be able to plead that she was employed by Company X, that a promotion was offered, that she applied and was qualified for it, and that the job went to someone else.' Though this is not a promotion case, the opinion goes on to say that 'Swanson's complaint identifies the type of discrimination that she thinks occurs (racial), by whom (Citibank, through Skertich, the manager, and the outside appraisers it used), and when (in connection with her effort in early 2009 to obtain a home equity loan). This is all that she needed to put in the complaint.'. . . Suppose this were a promotion case, and several people were vying for a promotion, all were qualified, several were men and one was a woman, and one of the men received the promotion. No complexity; yet the district court would "draw on its judicial experience and common sense," Ashcroft v. Iqbal, supra, 129 S.Ct. at 1950, to conclude that discrimination would not be a plausible explanation of the hiring decision, without additional allegations. This case is even stronger for dismissal because it lacks the competitive situation–man and woman, or white and black, vying for the same job and the man, or the white, getting it. . . . There is no allegation that the plaintiff in this case was competing with a white person for a loan. It was the low appraisal of her home that killed her chances for the $50,000 loan that she was seeking. . . . The Supreme Court would consider error the plausible inference in this case, rather than discrimination. . . . The majority opinion relies heavily on Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N .A., 534 U.S. 506 (2002) [but] Swierkiewicz is distinguishable. . . . Title VII cases are not exempted by Swierkiewicz from the doctrine of the Iqbal case. Iqbal establishes a general requirement of 'plausibility' applicable to all civil cases in federal courts. . . . But when a bank turns down a loan applicant because the appraisal of the security for the loan indicates that the loan would not be adequately secured, the alternative hypothesis of racial discrimination does not have substantial merit; it is implausible. Behind both Twombly and Iqbal lurks a concern with asymmetric discovery burdens and the potential for extortionate litigation . . . . In most suits against corporations or other institutions, and in both Twombly and Iqbal–but also in the present case–the plaintiff wants or needs more discovery of the defendant than the defendant wants or needs of the plaintiff, because the plaintiff has to search the defendant's records (and, through depositions, the minds of the defendant's employees) to obtain evidence of wrongdoing. With the electronic archives of large corporations or other large organizations holding millions of emails and other electronic communications, the cost of discovery to a defendant has become in many cases astronomical. And the cost is not only monetary; it can include, as well, the disruption of the defendant's operations. If no similar costs are borne by the plaintiff in complying with the defendant's discovery demands, the costs to the defendant may induce it to agree early in the litigation to a settlement favorable to the plaintiff. It is true, as critics of Twombly and Iqbal point out, that district courts have authority to limit discovery. . . But especially in busy districts, which is where complex litigation is concentrated, the judges tend to delegate that authority to magistrate judges. And because the magistrate judge to whom a case is delegated for discovery only is not responsible for the trial or the decision and can have only an imperfect sense of how widely the district judge would want the factual inquiry in the case to roam to enable him to decide it, the magistrate judge is likely to err on the permissive side. "One common form of unnecessary discovery (and therefore a ready source of threatened discovery) is delving into ten issues when one will be dispositive. A magistrate lacks the authority to carve off the nine unnecessary issues; for all the magistrate knows, the judge may want evidence on any one of them. So the magistrate stands back and lets the parties have at it. . . . . This structural flaw helps to explain and justify the Supreme Court's new approach. It requires the plaintiff to conduct a more extensive precomplaint investigation than used to be required and so creates greater symmetry between the plaintiff's and the defendant's litigation costs, and by doing so reduces the scope for extortionate discovery. . . . The plaintiff has an implausible case of discrimination, but she will now be permitted to serve discovery demands that will compel elaborate document review by Citibank and require its executives to sit for many hours of depositions. . . . The threat of such an imposition will induce Citibank to consider settlement even if the suit has no merit at all. That is the pattern that the Supreme Court's recent decisions are aimed at disrupting. We should affirm the dismissal of the suit in its entirety.") Santiago v. Walls, 599 F.3d 749, 758, 759 (7th Cir. 2010) ("Mr. Santiago alleged that he submitted a grievance to Warden Walls's office, asking that the inmate with whom he was being housed be placed on his enemy list and that he be given a cell change. The grievance claimed that the prison officials were following a practice of placing him in cells with inmates with whom there was bound to be a confrontation. He further alleged that the Warden 'knew or should have known' that Castro was dangerous. We think that this allegation is sufficient, at the pleading stage, to state a claim that Warden Walls actually knew or consciously turned a blind eye toward an obvious risk. Mr. Santiago cannot know for certain what Warden Walls knew without discovery. Consequently, the district court should not have dismissed this count of the complaint. The dissent suggests two infirmities with Mr. Santiago's pro se complaint. First, it would require a much greater level of specificity in both the complaint and in the appended grievance form. With respect to the grievance, neither this court nor any other American court has imposed the requirements of fact or code pleading on such a document. The purpose of a grievance is, quite simply, to advise prison management of a situation that could harm the good order and discipline of the institution so that remedial steps can be taken by the officer who is responsible for such remedies. Here, the warden was informed that personnel under his command were undermining the good order and discipline of the institution by placing Mr. Santiago in situations where violence was inevitable. Although the dissent apparently takes the contrary view, we believe that any warden worth his or her salt would consider such an allegation sufficient to commence an aggressive investigation. Most wardens would not fail to meet their responsibilities simply because the complaining prisoner, while alleging retaliation, failed to name names. The maintaining of prison discipline does not depend on prisoners naming names. To the extent that the dissent is asserting that the complaint itself lacked sufficient specificity, it is asking for a return to the days before the Supreme Court eliminated that impermissible gloss on the Federal Rules in Leatherman v. Tarrant County Narcotics Intelligence and Coordination Unit, 507 U.S. 163, 113 S.Ct. 1160, 122 L.Ed.2d 517 (1993). It is clear that this complaint conforms to the standards set out by the Supreme Court in

Cooney v. Rossiter, 583 F.3d 967, 971 (7th Cir. 2009) ("The Court's specific concern in Bell Atlantic was with the burden of discovery imposed on a defendant by implausible allegations perhaps intended merely to extort a settlement that would spare the defendant that burden. In Iqbal it was with the inroads into the defense of official immunity–which is meant to protect the officer from the burden of trial and not merely from damages liability–that allowing implausible allegations to defeat a motion to dismiss would make. Smith v. Duffey, 576 F.3d 336, 339-40 (7th Cir.2009). Thus, as the Court said in Iqbal, 'determining whether a complaint states a plausible claim for relief will ... be a context-specific task that requires the reviewing court to draw on its judicial experience and common sense.' 129 S.Ct. at 1950 . . . In other words, the height of the pleading requirement is relative to circumstances. We have noted the circumstances (complexity and immunity) that raised the bar in the two Supreme Court cases. This case is not a complex litigation, and the two remaining defendants do not claim any immunity. But it may be paranoid pro se litigation, arising out of a bitter custody fight and alleging, as it does, a vast, encompassing conspiracy; and before defendants in such a case become entangled in discovery proceedings, the plaintiff must meet a high standard of plausibility.").

Brooks v. Ross, 578 F.3d 574, 581 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Any doubt that Twombly had repudiated the general notice-pleading regime of Rule 8 was put to rest two weeks later, when the Court issued Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 93 (2007). . . . This court took Twombly and Erickson together to mean that 'at some point the factual detail in a complaint may be so sketchy that the complaint does not provide the type of notice of the claim to which the defendant is entitled under Rule 8.'. . This continues to be the case after Iqbal. That case clarified that Twombly's plausibility requirement applies across the board, not just to antitrust cases. In addition, Iqbal gave further guidance to lower courts in evaluating complaints. . .We understand the Court in Iqbal to be admonishing those plaintiffs who merely parrot the statutory language of the claims that they are pleading (something that anyone could do, regardless of what may be prompting the lawsuit), rather than providing some specific facts to ground those legal claims, that they must do more. These are the plaintiffs who have not provided the 'showing' required by Rule 8. So, what do we take away from Twombly, Erickson, and Iqbal? First, a plaintiff must provide notice to defendants of her claims. Second, courts must accept a plaintiff's factual allegations as true, but some factual allegations will be so sketchy or implausible that they fail to provide sufficient notice to defendants of the plaintiff's claim. Third, in considering the plaintiff's factual allegations, courts should not accept as adequate abstract recitations of the elements of a cause of action or conclusory legal statements.").

Burks v. Raemisch, 555 F.3d 592, 593 (7th Cir. 2009) ("Plaintiffs need not lard their complaints with facts; the federal system uses notice pleading rather than fact pleading. See Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89 (2007). Knowledge and intent, in particular, need not be covered in detail; Fed.R.Civ.P. 9(b) provides that '[m]alice, intent, knowledge, and other conditions of a person's mind may be alleged generally.' It is enough to lay out a plausible grievance. A prisoner's statement that he repeatedly alerted medical personnel to a serious medical condition, that they did nothing in response, and that permanent injury ensued, is enough to state a claim on which relief may be granted–if it names the persons responsible for the problem. Doing nothing could be simple negligence, but it does not stretch the imagination to see that it might also amount to deliberate indifference.").

Tamayo v. Blagojevich, 526 F.3d 1074, 1082, 1083, 1085, 1090, 1091 (7th Cir. 2008) ("Since Bell Atlantic, we cautiously have attempted neither to over-read nor to under-read its holding. We have stated that the Supreme Court in Bell Atlantic 'retooled federal pleading standards,' and retired 'the oft-quoted Conley formulation.'. . We also have cautioned, however, that Bell Atlantic 'must not be overread.'. . Although the opinion contains some language that could be read to suggest otherwise, the Court in Bell Atlantic made clear that it did not, in fact, supplant the basic notice-pleading standard. . . . The task of applying Bell Atlantic to the different types of cases that come before us continues. In each context, we must determine what allegations are necessary to show that recovery is 'plausible.'. . For complaints involving complex litigation–for example, antitrust or RICO claims–a fuller set of factual allegations may be necessary to show that relief is plausible. . . The Court in Bell Atlantic wished to avoid the 'in terrorem' effect of allowing a plaintiff with a 'largely groundless claim' to force defendants into either costly discovery or an increased settlement value. . . . [W]e conclude that Ms. Tamayo's complaint included enough facts in support of a claim of sex discrimination under Title VII and the Equal Pay Act to survive dismissal at this stage of the proceedings. . . . Similarly, we conclude that Ms. Tamayo's complaint alleged enough facts to state a claim for retaliation. . . .The pleading standard is no different simply because qualified immunity may be raised as an affirmative defense. . . . In any event, the right to be free from sex discrimination is clearly established. Taking all facts pleaded in Ms. Tamayo's complaint as true, the defendants violated a clearly established constitutional right; therefore, a grant of qualified immunity is inappropriate at this point in the proceedings.").

Limestone Development Corp. v. Village of Lemont, Ill., 520 F.3d 797, 803, 804 (7th Cir. 2008) ("Under Bell Atlantic, the complaint in a potentially complex litigation, or one that by reason of the potential cost of a judgment to the defendant creates the 'in terrorem' effect against which Blue Chip warned, must have some degree of plausibility to survive dismissal. It is true that the narrowest holding in Bell Atlantic is merely that an antitrust complaint charging an agreement between firms not to compete must contain 'enough factual matter (taken as true) to suggest that an agreement was made.... An allegation of parallel conduct and a bare assertion of conspiracy will not suffice.'. .The Court was concerned lest a defendant be forced to conduct expensive pretrial discovery in order to demonstrate the groundlessness of the plaintiff's claim. . . But the concern is as applicable to a RICO case, which resembles an antitrust case in point of complexity and the availability of punitive damages and of attorneys' fees to the successful plaintiff. RICO cases, like antitrust cases, are 'big' cases and the defendant should not be put to the expense of big-case discovery on the basis of a threadbare claim. Bell Atlantic must not be overread. The Court denied 'requir[ing] heightened fact pleading of specifics,' 127 S.Ct. at 1974; 'a complaint ... does not need detailed factual allegations.' . . Within weeks after deciding Bell Atlantic, the Court reversed a Tenth Circuit decision for requiring fact pleading . Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197 (2007) (per curiam). A prisoner, proceeding pro se, had complained that he had Hepatitis C, that he was on a one-year treatment program for it, that shortly after the program began the prison officials withheld treatment, and that his life was in danger as a result. That was the context in which the Court said that 'specific facts' need not be pleaded. . . A complaint must always, however, allege 'enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face,'. . . and how many facts are enough will depend on the type of case. In a complex antitrust or RICO case a fuller set of factual allegations than found in the sample complaints in the civil rules' Appendix of Forms may be necessary to show that the plaintiff's claim is not 'largely groundless.' Phillips v. County of Allegheny, 515 F.3d 224, 231-32 (3d Cir.2008). If discovery is likely to be more than usually costly, the complaint must include as much factual detail and argument as may be required to show that the plaintiff has a plausible claim.")

Airborne Beepers & Video, Inc. v. AT&T Mobility LLC, 499 F.3d 663, 667 (7th Cir. 2007) ("In Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, . . . the Supreme Court wrote that '[w]hile a complaint attacked by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss does not need detailed factual allegations, ... a plaintiff's obligation to provide the Agrounds" of his Aentitle[ment] to relief" requires more than labels and conclusions, and a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action will not do....' . . . Two weeks later the Court clarified that Twombly did not signal a switch to fact- pleading in the federal courts. See Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197 (2007). To the contrary, Erickson reaffirmed that under Rule 8'[s]pecific facts are not necessary; the statement need only Agive the defendant fair notice of what the ... claim is and the grounds upon which it rests."'. . . Taking Erickson and Twombly together, we understand the Court to be saying only that at some point the factual detail in a complaint may be so sketchy that the complaint does not provide the type of notice of the claim to which the defendant is entitled under Rule 8.").

Padron v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., No. 10 C 6656, 2011 WL 1760229, at *4 (N.D. Ill. May 9, 2011) ("Notwithstanding the facial inadequacy of Counts I through III, Plaintiffs argue that those counts should not be dismissed because of 'informational asymmetry' favoring Defendant. Plaintiffs claim that Defendant possesses the facts that Plaintiffs need to plead their case and that Plaintiffs are powerless to obtain information without access to the discovery process. Plaintiffs contend that as pro se complainants who do not speak English and who are unfamiliar with the legal process, they have little choice but to rely on the EEOC's investigation and findings, much of which is redacted. According to Plaintiffs, if Defendant's motion to dismiss is granted, 'informational asymmetry' unfairly would protect the Defendant from liability. Plaintiffs also rely on In re Text Messaging to support their informational asymmetry argument. There, the court recognized that discovery could reveal 'the smoking gun or bring to light additional circumstantial evidence that further tilts the balance in favor of liability.' In re Text Messaging, 630 F.3d at 629 (emphasis added). However, the court made that statement after determining that the plaintiffs already had alleged sufficient circumstantial evidence to infer plausibly that the defendants engaged in price fixing. . . The court found that circumstantial evidence was sufficient at the pleading stage and noted that direct evidence could emerge during discovery. . . As discussed above, Plaintiffs have not already alleged circumstantial evidence that plausibly gives rise to an inference of discriminatory practices by Defendant. Therefore, In re Text Messaging is distinguished and does not support Plaintiffs' argument that discovery should be permitted. I also note that Plaintiffs have not established the existence or extent of any purported 'informational asymmetry.' Plaintiffs worked for Defendant for between five and six years. They had opportunity to observe Defendant's practices and discuss with other co-workers the terms and conditions of their employment. Presumably, such experiences prompted Plaintiffs to file EEOC charges in the first place. Yet, Plaintiffs allege few facts based on their tenure working for Defendant. Moreover, Plaintiffs could have performed an investigation to obtain additional information about Defendant's practices. Although Defendant may have exclusive access to certain types of evidence, Plaintiffs had their own ways of collecting information that could make their claims plausible. Yet, such facts are not pleaded in their complaint. Defendant argues that Plaintiffs' complaint is precisely what Twombly sought to guard against: conclusory allegations made in the hope of obtaining discovery that potentially could support Plaintiffs' claim. Defendant is correct that preventing meritless lawsuits and needless, costly discovery was an important concern in Twombly. . . The Court stated that 'it is no answer to say that a claim just shy of a plausible entitlement to relief can, if groundless, be weeded out early in the discovery process.'. . If courts granted discovery in those circumstances, risk-averse defendants would settle even weak claims before subsequent proceedings could dispose of them. . . Twombly discourages correcting perceived informational asymmetry through discovery, which is the approach advocated by Plaintiffs. Accordingly, Counts I through III are dismissed.")

Santana v. Cook County Bd. of Review, No. 09 C 5027, 2011 WL 1549240, at *7 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 25, 2011) ("Before Iqbal our own Court of Appeals, in Airborne Beepers & Video, Inc. v. AT & T Mobility LLC, 499 F.3d 663, 667 (7th Cir.2007) described Twombly and Erickson as establishing 'only that at some point the factual detail in a complaint may be so sketchy that the complaint does not provide the type of notice of the claim to which the defendant is entitled under Rule 8.' And more recently Brooks v. Ross, 578 F.3d 574, 581 (7th Cir.2009) has confirmed that the Airborne Beepers reading of pleading law post-Twombly and post-Erickson remains accurate after Iqbal. Brooks, id. describes Iqbal as 'admonishing those plaintiffs who merely parrot the statutory language of the claims that they are pleading (something that anyone can do, regardless of what may be prompting the lawsuit), rather than providing some specific facts to ground those legal claims, that they must do more.' Familiar Rule 12(b)(6) principles–still operative under the new pleading regime–require this Court to accept as true all of Santana's well-pleaded factual allegations, with all reasonable inferences drawn in his favor (Christensen v. County of Boone, 483 F.3d 454, 457 (7th Cir.2007)(per curiam)). . . . With no plausible claim having been alleged by Santana after his fifth effort to do so, the figurative severance of the 4AC and cauterization of the fatal wound, both accomplished by this opinion, have to preclude any hydra-like effort by his counsel to grow still another head through a fifth amended complaint. Enough is enough. Defendants are entitled to a judgment as a matter of law on all of Santana's claims. Their Rule

Kitchen v. Burge, 781 F.Supp.2d 721, 728, 734, 735, 738 (N.D. Ill. 2011) ("Bryne is not alleged to have directly participated in Kitchen's torture. Rather, the complaint simply alleges that Byrne was Burge's 'right hand man,' and that, like Burge, Bryne 'engaged in a pattern and practice of torture and brutality himself, and also supervised, encouraged, sanctioned, condoned and ratified brutality and torture by other detectives, including the Police Officer Defendants named herein.'. . These generic and conclusory allegations are not sufficient to assert a claim against Byrne. Accordingly, I grant the officer defendants' motion to dismiss Byrne from the complaint. . . . Given the nature of the information that the municipal defendants are alleged to have suppressed, the possibility of establishing a causal link with Kitchen's incarceration is at least minimally plausible. For example, Martin is alleged to have hindered OPS investigations into Burge's and others' use of torture at Area 2 and 3 Headquarters; and when findings of torture were made, Shines attempted to 'secret' or suppress them. Although none of the suppressed information had specifically to do with Kitchen's case, it is not unreasonable to infer that awareness of other instances of torture could have drawn attention to the problem more generally, causing Kitchen's case to come to light sooner. In Daley's case, however, judicial experience and common sense do not permit such a reasonable inference based on Daley's decision to promote Dignan, for example, or to provide Burge's legal defense. For these reasons, Daley's motion to dismiss Count I is granted. . . .The Seventh Circuit has made clear that conspiracy claims under § 1983 are not subject to a heightened pleading standard. See, e.g., Srivastava v. Cottey, 83 Fed. App' x. 807, 810 (7th Cir.2003). Rather, a complaint need only provide 'notice of time, scope, and parties involved.' Id. Kitchen's complaint easily satisfies this requirement. Defendants argue that Kitchen's § 1985 and § 1986 conspiracy claims fail because there must be an underlying predicate violation of constitutional rights. As already explained, Counts I and IV are sufficient to state a claim. Defendants also argue that plaintiff has failed to allege an 'underlying equal protection claim or any specific facts tying Defendant Officers to any racially motivated intent to deprive Plaintiff of his equal protection rights.' The complaint alleges that the conspiracy was formed 'with the knowledge and purpose of depriving Plaintiff, who is African-American, and numerous other African American torture victims of the equal protection of the laws and/or of equal privilege and immunities under the law, and with racial animus toward the Plaintiff and the other victims of this racially motivated conspiracy.'. . Accordingly, I deny the defendants' motions to dismiss Count V.")

Wiek v. Keane, No. 09 CV 920, 2010 WL 1976870, at *3 (N.D. Ill. May 12, 2010) ("Wiek's amended complaint sets forth the following well-pleaded facts: (i) that the officers entered his home without a warrant, (ii) conducted a search and (iii) placed him under arrest. Nevertheless, the Defendants contend that because Wiek did not allege that the officers entered his home without probable cause, exigent circumstances, or his consent, he failed to state a claim under § 1983. The Court is persuaded that Wiek's amended complaint rises above speculation and states more than naked assertions or conclusions of law. Unlike in his original complaint, Wiek now alleges that the officers entered his home without a warrant and conducted a search. . . He further alleges that the officers then placed him under arrest and transported him to the police station. . . The core of the Fourth Amendment is the fundamental concept that any governmental invasion into one's home or expectation of privacy must be strictly circumscribed. . . As a result, warrantless searches of one's home are presumptively unconstitutional, absent consent or exigent circumstances. . . Wiek does not bear the burden of showing a lack of probable cause or exigent circumstances. . . In addition, the circumstances of this case justify a relatively low pleading standard. This case is not as factually complex as Twombly or Iqbal. As a result, the pleading standard is not as high as what the courts used in those cases. . . Additionally, in a case such as this, Wiek may not be aware of any viable reasons that the officers had for their conduct. As such, Wiek may not be able to assert any more facts. Consequently, despite the fact that Wiek has set forth notably sparse allegations even in his amended complaint, the Court denies the Defendants' motion to dismiss Wiek's § 1983 claim against the officers.")

McDaniel v. Elgin, No. 209-CV-119, 2010 WL 339082, at *4 (N.D. Ind. Jan. 22, 2010) ("Here, Plaintiff has made specific factual allegations that he was subjected to repeated, consistent sexual harassment, including unwelcome touching of his person, by his supervisor, Harvey, and that this has created a 'hostile work environment.' McDaniel alleges that after refusing Harvey's advances, his work was 'scrutinized down to the letter,' he was threatened with 'work-ups', that he was looked over for raises and promotions, and that his employment was terminated. These factual allegations stand in contrast to the'[t] hreadbare recitals of the elements of a cause of action' that amount to 'legal conclusions' that concerned the Supreme Court in Iqbal. Rather than merely making bare-boned assertions that he was 'harassed' or suffered an 'adverse employment action,' McDaniel has provided specific factual detail that would support a plausible inference of unlawful discrimination. He noted that he was inappropriately touched and that he suffered adverse treatment as a result of his gender. This is all that is required by McDaniel at this early stage of the litigation. Similarly, McDaniel has provide sufficient factual material to support a plausible inference that he was improperly subjected to unlawful retaliation in response to his filing a complaint with the Indiana Human Rights Commission and giving his deposition in another matter where Elgin is the defendant. Again, these are specific, factual allegations, not mere legal conclusions. McDaniel has alleged that he was fired in retaliation for these activities and that is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of the Rule 8 pleading standard as described in Iqbal. This is not to say that McDaniel's allegations are to be believed or that there is sufficient evidence to successfully resist a motion for summary judgment. Rather, McDaniel has pleaded sufficient specific factual matter that satisfies the relatively low hurdle required by the Rule 8 liberal pleading standard and therefore dismissal of Plaintiff's claims is not warranted.").

Kyle v. Holina, 09-cv-90-slc, 2009 WL 1867671, at *1 (W.D. Wis. June 29, 2009) ("I agree with defendants that my conclusion must be revisited in light of Iqbal, which extended the pleading standard enunciated in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544 (2007), to encompass discrimination claims and implicitly overturned decades of circuit precedent in which the court of appeals had allowed discrimination claims to be pleaded in a conclusory fashion. . . . Under the Supreme Court's new standard, an allegation of discrimination needs to be more specific.")

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Whitney v. City of St. Louis, Missouri, 887 F.3d 857, 860 (8th Cir. 2018) ("The district court correctly concluded that the complaint fails to allege facts establishing the subjective prong of the deliberate indifference claim. The incorporated medical examiner's report mentions that an unnamed medical practitioner at the Justice Center knew that Whitney was having suicidal thoughts, but nowhere does the complaint allege that this information was relayed to Sharp. The complaint contains a legal conclusion that Sharp was deliberately indifferent but fails to make any allegation about Sharp's knowledge. This conclusory statement does not save the complaint absent any allegation of knowledge.")

Hager v. Arkansas Dept. of Health, 735 F.3d 1009, 1015 (8th Cir. 2013) ("Hager relies primarily on Swierkiewicz. However, her complaint has far fewer factual allegations than the complaint there. In Swierkiewicz, the complaint for age and nationality discrimination alleged: the plaintiff was demoted and replaced by a younger employee of the employer's nationality; the replacement was inexperienced; in promoting the younger, inexperienced employee, the employer wanted to 'energize' the department; the employer excluded and isolated plaintiff from business decisions and meetings; plaintiff sent a memo outlining his grievances and tried to meet with the employer to discuss his discontent; and plaintiff was fired. . .Hager makes only two conclusory allegations of gender discrimination: (1) she 'is a victim of gender discrimination;' and (2) she 'was discharged under circumstances summarily [sic] situated nondisabled males ... were not.' She does not allege any gender-related comments or conduct before her termination. . . She also does not allege facts showing that similarly situated employees were treated differently. . .In sum, Hager does not state a § 1983 claim for gender discrimination. Hager's allegation that she is the victim of gender discrimination fails to give Dr. Zohoori fair notice of the claim and the grounds upon which it rests. . . Hager's conclusory assertion that she was discharged under circumstances similarly situated men were not imports legal language couched as a factual allegation and fails to raise a right to relief above the speculative level. . . The district court erred in denying Dr. Zohoori's motion to dismiss the § 1983 claim.")

Hamilton v. Palm, 621 F.3d 816, 817, 818 (8th Cir. 2010) ("The only element of this claim here at issue is whether Hamilton's complaint sufficiently alleged that the Palms were his employers. Thus, we must consider how the general principles of Twombly and Iqbal apply to the pleading of a recurring common law issue–whether a party was an employee or an independent contractor at the time in question. We conclude that, to answer this question, we need look no further than Rule 84 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, which provides, 'The forms in the Appendix [to the Rules] suffice under these rules....' The rules referred to obviously include Rule 8(a)(2). The Appendix includes Forms 11-13, which set forth prototypes of various negligence complaints. Form 13, entitled 'Complaint for Negligence Under the Federal Employers' Liability Act,' includes the following allegation: '4. During this work, the defendant, as the employer, negligently put the plaintiff to work....' (Emphasis added.) The district court considered Form 13 irrelevant because it applies to F.E.L.A. claims by railroad workers. But that overlooks Form 13's broader significance. As incorporated by Rule 84, Form 13 makes clear that an allegation in any negligence claim that the defendant acted as plaintiff's 'employer' satisfies Rule 8(a)(2)'s notice pleading requirement for this element. Here, consistent with Form 13, Hamilton alleged that he was 'employed' by the Palms. Rule 84 and Form 13 may only be amended 'by the process of amending the Federal Rules, and not by judicial interpretation.' Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 515, 122 S.Ct. 992, 152 L.Ed.2d 1 (2002) (quotation omitted), distinguished in Twombly, 550 U.S. at 569-70. Therefore, the district court erred in concluding that Hamilton's allegation of employee status, however facially conclusory it might appear to be in the abstract, failed to satisfy Rule 8(a)(2).")

Gregory v. Dillard's, Inc., 565 F.3d 464, 473 (8th Cir. 2009) ("Even before the Supreme Court's recent decision in Bell Atlantic Corp. v. Twombly, 127 S.Ct. 1955 (2007), we held that a civil rights complaint 'must contain facts which state a claim as a matter of law and must not be conclusory.'. .Twombly confirmed this approach by overruling Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41 (1957), and establishing a plausibility standard for motions to dismiss. . . After Twombly, we have said that a plaintiff 'must assert facts that affirmatively and plausibly suggest that the pleader has the right he claims ..., rather than facts that are merely consistent with such a right.' Stalley v. Catholic Health Initiative, 509 F.3d 517, 521 (8th Cir.2007); see Wilkerson v. New Media Tech. Charter Sch., 522 F.3d 315, 321-22 (3d Cir.2008). While a plaintiff need not set forth 'detailed factual allegations,' Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1964,or 'specific facts' that describe the evidence to be presented, Erickson v. Pardus, 127 S.Ct. 2197, 2200 (2007) (per curiam), the complaint must include sufficient factual allegations to provide the grounds on which the claim rests. . . A district court, therefore, is not required 'to divine the litigant's intent and create claims that are not clearly raised,' Bediako, 354 F.3d at 840, and it need not 'conjure up unpled allegations' to save a complaint. Rios v. City of Del Rio, 444 F.3d 417, 421 (5th Cir.2006) (internal quotation omitted).").

Brown v. City of Ferguson, Mo., No. 4:15CV00831 ERW, 2015 WL 4393960, at *3 (E.D. Mo. July 16, 2015) ("Defendants' Motion to Dismiss regarding Plaintiffs' Equal Protection claims will be denied. The Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment protects against discrimination on the basis of race. . . Plaintiffs' must include allegations of intentional discrimination showing discriminatory racial purpose to establish a violation. . . 'When the claim is selective enforcement of traffic laws or a racially-motivated arrest, the plaintiff must normally prove that similarly situated individuals were not stopped or arrested in order to show the requisite discriminatory effect and purpose.'. . Plaintiffs included numerous allegations supporting their claims Defendant City violated the Equal Protection Clause. Although Plaintiffs did not use the exact phrase 'similarly situated individuals,' they did include several allegations stating African–Americans were treated differently than others. . . Additionally, Plaintiffs specifically alleged Defendant City's actions were driven by intentional discrimination. . . Plaintiffs have sufficiently pled a violation of the Equal Protection Clause; Defendants' Motion to Dismiss on this point will be denied. . . . In their complaint, Plaintiffs have included allegations Defendant Wilson deprived them of their right to a familial relationship with their son. . . Plaintiffs also alleged Defendant Wilson's conduct shocked the conscience of the community, and Defendant Wilson acted with deliberate indifference to the constitutional rights of Plaintiffs and their son. . . Although the Court may later determine Plaintiffs' claimed liberty interest is neither an interest deeply rooted in this Nation's history and tradition nor clearly established, and thus find qualified immunity to apply,[4] Plaintiffs have included sufficient allegations to satisfy the pleading standard in FRCP 8(a)(2).")

Zumwalt v. City of Wentzville, No. 4:10CV561RWS, 2010 WL 2710496, at *8, *9 (E.D.Mo. July 7, 2010) ("Defendants have apparently confused the plausibility standard of Twombly and Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009) with the fact pleading standard used in the Missouri state courts. . . . Neither Twombly nor Iqbal changed the Rule 8 pleading notice pleading requirement to fact pleading. Specific facts are not necessary; the plaintiff must only allege facts sufficient to give fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds upon which it rests. . . In this case, Zumwalt alleges he was elected to the Local 1032 bargaining unit team. On July 6, 2009, as a Local 1032 representative, Zumwalt met in the union's initial bargaining session with the City and its agents, servants and employees. On August 3, 2009, the bargaining team again met with the City. Zumwalt alleges that on August 6, 2009, he was notified in writing that an off-duty Foristell police officer had filed a complaint against him regarding an incident that occurred on August 1, 2009. Zumwalt also alleges that city personnel actively procured the filing of a formal complaint against him. He believes their decision to do so was based on his status as a "vocal advocate" for collective bargaining rights and his position as a member or Local 1032's bargaining team. Based on the timing of the complaint against Zumwalt in relation to his collective bargaining negotiation activities, I find it is plausible that the reason the city employees actively procured or solicited the off-duty officer to file a complaint against Zumwalt was his participation in the collective bargaining negotiations.")

Arias v. U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement Div. of Dept. of Homeland Sec, Civ. No. 07-1959 ADM/JSM, 2008 WL 1827604, at *14 (D. Minn. Apr. 23, 2008) (not reported) ("The Court rejects the City Defendants' argument that the potential availability of a qualified immunity defense imposes a heightened pleading requirement on Plaintiffs.").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Byrd v. Phoenix Police Dep't, 885 F.3d 639, 642 (9th Cir. 2018) ("We disagree with the district court that the allegation that the officers 'beat the crap out of" Byrd was 'too vague and conclusory' to support a legally cognizable claim. Byrd's use of a colloquial, shorthand phrase makes plain that Byrd is alleging that the officers' use of force was unreasonably excessive; this conclusion is reinforced by his allegations about the resulting injuries.")

Rosati v. Igbinoso, 791 F.3d 1037, 1039-40 (9th Cir. 2015) ("Rosati's complaint plausibly alleges that she has severe gender dysphoria, citing repeated episodes of attempted self-castration despite continued hormone treatment. . . Rosati also alleges that the medically accepted treatment for her dysphoria is SRS, supporting that allegation with copious citations to the World Professional Association for Transgender Health ("WPATH") Standards of Care. . . Rosati plausibly alleges that prison officials were aware of her medical history and need for treatment, but denied the surgery because of a blanket policy against SRS. Indeed, the state acknowledged at oral argument that no California prisoner has ever received SRS. . . .Even absent such a blanket policy, Rosati plausibly alleges her symptoms (including repeated efforts at self-castration) are so severe that prison officials recklessly disregarded an excessive risk to her health by denying SRS solely on the recommendation of a physician's assistant with no experience in transgender medicine. . . .Although Rosati lacks a medical opinion recommending SRS, she plausibly alleges that this is because the state has failed to provide her access to a physician competent to evaluate her. . . .We express no opinion on whether SRS is medically necessary for Rosati or whether prison officials have other legitimate reasons for denying her that treatment. But, like other courts that have considered similar actions, we hold that the allegations in Rosati's complaint are sufficient to state a claim.")

Knapp v. Hogan, 738 F.3d 1106, 1110, 1111 (9th Cir. 2013) ("We hold that dismissals following the repeated violation of Rule 8(a)'s 'short and plain statement' requirement, following leave to amend, are dismissals for failure to state a claim under § 1915(g). While past cases have found that this type of strike is accrued by a Rule 12(b)(6) dismissal, they do not hold that this is the only possible way. . . We find the reasoning of the Seventh Circuit to be persuasive: after an incomprehensible complaint is dismissed under Rule 8 and the plaintiff is given, but fails, to take advantage of the leave to amend, 'the judge [is] left with [ ] a complaint that, being irremediably unintelligible, [gives] rise to an inference that the plaintiff could not state a claim.' See Paul v. Marberry, F .3d 702, 705 (7th Cir. 2011). When a litigant knowingly and repeatedly refuses to conform his pleadings to the requirements of the Federal Rules, it is reasonable to conclude that the litigant simply cannot state a claim. Such a narrow expansion of the definition of 'failure to state a claim' beyond Rule 12(b)(6) dismissals is fully in harmony with the purposes of the Prison Litigation Reform Act. . . .Complaints that are filed in repeated and knowing violation of Federal Rule 8's pleading requirements are a great drain on the court system, and the reviewing court cannot be expected to 'fish a gold coin from a bucket of mud.'. .Knapp accrued two strikes for the Ninth Circuit dismissals, and three additional strikes for the district court dismissals. He has more than met the requirement for a revocation of in forma pauperis status under the Prison Litigation Reform Act.")

Panagacos v. Towery, Nos. 11–35527, 11–35538, 2012 WL 6573787, *1, *2 (9th Cir. Dec. 17, 2012) (not reported) ("The TAC alleges that Towery infiltrated plaintiffs' peaceful anti-war protest group in order to spy on and disrupt plaintiffs' activities. The TAC alleges, for example, that Towery identified plaintiffs to others in order to facilitate their arrest without probable cause. Rudd allegedly directed Towery's efforts and compiled Towery's intelligence in reports that he disseminated to other government actors. Both men allegedly coordinated with law-enforcement agencies to plan and implement strategies designed to silence the protestors. The district court correctly determined that these allegations are plausibly supported by sufficient factual detail and must be presumed true. See Iqbal, 556 U.S. at 678. The TAC gives examples of specific times and places that Towery spied on plaintiffs' meetings. It alleges that defendants met with specifically identified law-enforcement officers and agencies, and identifies specific time frames when these meetings occurred. These factual allegations are sufficient to 'give fair notice and to enable the opposing party to defend itself effectively.' Starr v.. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1216 (9th Cir.2011). As the district court noted, Towery and Rudd's direct involvement in information gathering and reporting distinguishes this case from Iqbal, where conclusory allegations about the high-level government defendants' involvement were 'not entitled to be assumed true.'. . Plaintiffs have pled a plausible violation of their clearly established First Amendment rights. Plaintiffs have alleged that defendants 'deterred or chilled the plaintiff's political speech' and that such deterrence motivated defendants' conduct. . . As a result of defendants' information sharing and coordination with local law enforcement, plaintiffs were allegedly arrested without probable cause. These arrests allegedly disrupted plaintiffs' peaceful protests and deterred their political speech. The TAC's allegations also support a plausible inference that defendants were motivated by an impermissible intent to disrupt plaintiffs' speech activities. Given plaintiffs' strong anti-war message and defendants' alleged illegal actions in purposefully facilitating a campaign of false arrests, it is plausible that Towery and Rudd were motivated by a desire to silence the protesters and not just by a desire to protect military shipments. . . Finally, it is clearly established that intentionally enabling arrests without probable cause in order to suppress speech violates the First Amendment. . .Plaintiffs have also pled plausible violations of their clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. It is clearly established that facilitating arrests without probable cause violates the Fourth Amendment. See, e.g., Beck, 527 F.3d at 863–64. The district court also correctly determined that the TAC's allegations that Towery coordinated with local police to covertly break into a private listserve plausibly describe an unconstitutional search.")

Lacey v. Maricopa County, 693 F.3d 896, 924 (9th Cir. 2012) (en banc) ("Given the detail in the complaint and the seriousness of the allegations, we are reluctant to dismiss the false arrest claim against Arpaio on the basis of the pleadings. Iqbal demands more of plaintiffs than bare notice pleading. . . , but it does not require us to flyspeck complaints looking for any gap in the facts. Lacey has spun a long and sometimes repetitive narration of Arpaio's determination to silence the New Times by any means necessary. It is a short step to infer that Arpaio was well aware of the flaws in Wilenchik's prosecution, but welcomed the excuse to have Lacey and Larkin arrested immediately, even if he lacked probable cause. We think this is all Iqbal requires at this stage.")

Wilhelm v. Rotman, 680 F.3d 1113, 1121, 1122 (9th Cir. 2012) ("Plaintiff filed his complaint pro se. 'We construe pro se complaints liberally and may only dismiss a pro se complaint for failure to state a claim if it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief.' Silva v. Di Vittorio, 658 F.3d 1090, 1101 (9th Cir.2011) (internal quotation marks omitted). Iqbal did not alter the rule that, 'where the petitioner is pro se, particularly in civil rights cases, [courts should] construe the pleadings liberally and ... afford the petitioner the benefit of any doubt.' Hebbe v. Pliler, 627 F.3d 338, 342 (9th Cir.2010) (internal quotation marks omitted).")

Henry A. v. Willden, 678 F.3d 991, 1003-05 (9th Cir. 2012) ("[T]he State defendants argue that plaintiffs have failed to state a claim against them for supervisory liability. We recently reaffirmed that a plaintiff may state a claim under § 1983 against a supervisor for deliberate indifference. Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202 (9th Cir.2011). . . . After thoroughly examining the plaintiffs' complaint, we agree that there are few specific allegations against the State defendants. Most of the allegations in the complaint simply reference 'Defendants,' without specifying whether the conduct at issue was committed by the named State officials, County officials, or the 'John Doe' supervisors or caseworkers. . . .The allegations that do expressly reference the State defendants are too general to state a claim for supervisory liability. In Starr v. Baca, the plaintiff alleged that Sheriff Baca himself had been given clear notice by the Department of Justice of the specific unconstitutional conditions in the jails; that the Sheriff received numerous reports documenting inmate violence caused by the unconstitutional conduct of his deputies; and that the Sheriff ultimately acquiesced in these constitutional violations. . . In contrast, the allegations here claim that the agencies directed by Willden and Comeaux have oversight responsibility for Clark County's foster care system and are required to ensure that Clark County is complying with state and federal law. The complaint also alleges that all of the defendants had knowledge of independent reports documenting the systemic failures of foster care in Nevada. But it does not allege that Willden or Comeaux had any personal knowledge of the specific constitutional violations that led to Plaintiffs' injuries, or that they had any direct responsibility to train or supervise the caseworkers employed by Clark County. The allegations that come closest to pleading personal involvement by Willden and Comeaux concern the failure to provide medical records to the children and their foster parents in order to facilitate their medical care. . . .When read together, these allegations suggest that there may be a causal connection between the State defendants' failure to share these medical records and the injuries suffered by plaintiffs such as Henry, who received a dangerous combination of prescription drugs because his medical records were not given to his treatment providers. But even if the complaint in its current form fails to state a claim against the State officials for substantive due process violations, the district court abused its discretion by failing to give the plaintiffs an opportunity to amend their complaint. . . . Here, Plaintiffs offered to amend their complaint if necessary in their response to the motion to dismiss, but the district court did not grant leave to amend and did not provide any reasons for its decision. As we have already concluded, the complaint adequately pleads violations of Plaintiffs' clearly established substantive due process rights, and it plausibly suggests an entitlement to relief from at least some of the defendants. Where the complaint falls short in some places is tying its factual allegations to particular defendants. But this type of deficiency can likely be cured by amending the complaint, and there is certainly no evidence to suggest that allowing amendment would be futile. Therefore, on remand, Plaintiffs should be given an opportunity to amend their substantive due process claims. We note that in any future proceedings in the district court, each defendant's liability must be analyzed individually using the proper standard, whether that individual is a line-level caseworker, a supervisory official, or a municipality.")

Cafasso, U.S. ex rel. v. General Dynamics C4 Systems, Nos. 09-16181, 09-16607, 09-177102011 WL 1053366, at *4 & n.6 (9th Cir. Mar. 24, 2011) ("Until now, we have not had occasion explicitly to confirm that Iqbal's plausibility requirement applies to claims subject to Rule 9(b). We have, however, said that 'complaints alleging fraud must comply with both [Federal Rules of Civil Procedure] 8(a) and 9(b).'. . Because Rule 8(a) requires the pleading of a plausible claim, Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949- 50, we hold that claims of fraud or mistake–including FCA claims–must, in addition to pleading with particularity, also plead plausible allegations. . . Iqbal and its 'plausibility' standard have been the subject of serious and thoughtful criticism. . . Also, at least one state court has disagreed with the wisdom of Iqbal and declined to adopt its plausibility standard for state court pleadings. McCurry v. Chevy Chase Bank, FSB, 233 P.3d 861, 863-64 (Wash. 2010). Nonetheless, pleading requirements for the federal courts have departed from the traditional Rule 8 standard under Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 47-48 (1957); under Iqbal, the pleading standard has changed and plausibility is required.")

Hydrick v. Hunter, 669 F.3d 937, 939-42 (9th Cir. 2012) (on remand from the Supreme Court for reconsideration in light of Ashcroft v. Iqbal) ("As discussed in more detail below, after reviewing the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal, the parties' supplemental briefs, and our court's recent decision in Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202 (9th Cir.2011), we now hold that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' claims for money damages. The conclusory allegations in Plaintiffs' Second Amended Complaint are insufficient to establish Defendants' individual liability for money damages. Our holding, however, is limited. Qualified immunity is only an immunity from a suit for money damages, and does not provide immunity from a suit seeking declaratory or injunctive relief. . . Accordingly, on remand, the Plaintiffs may proceed with their claims for declaratory and injunctive relief. . . .As discussed in greater detail below, in the case before us, the factual allegations in Plaintiffs' complaint resemble the 'bald' and 'conclusory' allegations in Iqbal, instead of the detailed factual allegations in Starr. . . Accordingly, Plaintiffs pleaded insufficient facts to establish 'plausible' claims against the Defendants in their individual capacities and the Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .The Plaintiffs' complaint proceeds under two theories of liability against the Defendants in their individual capacities. Plaintiffs allege that the Defendants are: (a) liable for their own conduct because they created policies and procedures that violated the Plaintiffs' constitutional rights; and, (b) liable because they were deliberately indifferent to their subordinates' constitutional violations. . . Plaintiffs' allegations fail to state claims against Defendants in their individual capacities under either theory of liability. Plaintiffs' complaint is based on conclusory allegations and generalities, without any allegation of the specific wrong-doing by each Defendant. For example, Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment claim alleges that Defendants' 'policies, practices and customs subject [Plaintiffs] to unreasonable searches; searches as a form of punishment; degrading public strip searches; improper seizures of personal belongings; and the use of unreasonable force and physical restraints.' But there is no allegation of a specific policy implemented by the Defendants or a specific event or events instigated by the Defendants that led to these purportedly unconstitutional searches. Plaintiffs' remaining claims suffer from the same infirmities. Plaintiffs' First Amendment retaliation claim alleges that 'Defendants have personal knowledge of retaliation against [the Plaintiffs] for participation in lawsuits, but Defendants' policies, practices and customs permit and encourage retaliation.' But there is no allegation of a specific policy or custom, nor are there specific allegations regarding each Defendant's purported knowledge of the retaliation. The remainder of Plaintiffs' claims are likewise devoid of specifics. The absence of specifics is significant because, to establish individual liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, 'a plaintiff must plead that each Government-official defendant, through the official's own individual actions, has violated the Constitution.' Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1948. Even under a 'deliberate indifference' theory of individual liability, the Plaintiffs must still allege sufficient facts to plausibly establish the defendant's 'knowledge of' and 'acquiescence in' the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates. Starr, 652 F.3d at 1206–07. In short, Plaintiffs' 'bald' and 'conclusory' allegations are insufficient to establish individual liability under 42 U.S.C. § 1983.")

Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1215-17 (9th Cir. 2011), reh'g en banc denied by Starr v. County of Los Angeles, 659 F.3d 850 (9th Cir. 2011) and cert. denied by Baca v. Starr, 132 S. Ct. 2101 (2012) ("The juxtaposition of Swierkiewicz and Erickson, on the one hand, and Dura, Twombly, and Iqbal, on the other, is perplexing. Even though the Court stated in all five cases that it was applying Rule 8(a), it is hard to avoid the conclusion that, in fact, the Court applied a higher pleading standard in Dura, Twombly and Iqbal. The Court in Dura and Twombly appeared concerned that in some complex commercial cases the usual lenient pleading standard under Rule 8(a) gave too much settlement leverage to plaintiffs. That is, if a non-specific complaint was enough to survive a motion to dismiss, plaintiffs would be able to extract undeservedly high settlements from deep-pocket companies. In Iqbal, by contrast, the Court was concerned that the usual lenient standard under Rule 8(a) would provide too little protection for high-level executive branch officials who allegedly engaged in misconduct in the aftermath of September 11, 2001. To the extent that we perceive a difference in the application of Rule 8(a) in the two groups of cases, it is difficult to know in cases that come before us whether we should apply the more lenient or the more demanding standard. But whatever the difference between these cases, we can at least state the following two principles common to all of them. First, allegations in a complaint or counterclaim must be sufficiently detailed to give fair notice to the opposing party of the nature of the claim so that the party may effectively defend against it. Second, the allegations must be sufficiently plausible that it is not unfair to require the opposing party to be subjected to the expense of discovery. . . . Viewed in the light of all of the Supreme Court's recent cases, we hold that the allegations of Starr's complaint satisfy the standard of Rule 8(a). We do not so hold merely because Starr's complaint, like the complaint in Erickson, alleges deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments. Rather, we so hold because his complaint complies with the two principles just stated. First, Starr's complaint specifically alleges numerous incidents in which inmates in Los Angeles County jails have been killed or injured because of the culpable actions of the subordinates of Sheriff Baca. The complaint specifically alleges that Sheriff Baca was given notice of all of these incidents. It specifically alleges, in addition, that Sheriff Baca was given notice, in several reports, of systematic problems in the county jails under his supervision that have resulted in these deaths and injuries. Finally, it alleges that Sheriff Baca did not take action to protect inmates under his care despite the dangers, created by the actions of his subordinates, of which he had been made aware. These allegations are neither 'bald' nor 'conclusory.'. . Rather, they are sufficiently detailed to give notice to Sheriff Baca of the nature of Starr's claim against him and to give him a fair opportunity to defend against it. . . . Second, the factual allegations in Starr's complaint plausibly suggest that Sheriff Baca acquiesced in the unconstitutional conduct of his subordinates, and was thereby deliberately indifferent to the danger posed to Starr. There is no 'obvious alternative explanation,' within the meaning of Iqbal, for why Sheriff Baca took no action to stop his subordinates' repeated violations of prisoners' constitutional rights despite being repeatedly confronted with those violations, such that the alternative explanation requires us to conclude that Starr's explanation 'is not a plausible conclusion.'. . If there are two alternative explanations, one advanced by defendant and the other advanced by plaintiff, both of which are plausible, plaintiff's complaint survives a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). Plaintiff's complaint may be dismissed only when defendant's plausible alternative explanation is so convincing that plaintiff's explanation is implausible. The standard at this stage of the litigation is not that plaintiff's explanation must be true or even probable. The factual allegations of the complaint need only 'plausibly suggest an entitlement to relief.'. . As the Court wrote in Twombly, Rule 8(a) 'does not impose a probability requirement at the pleading stage; it simply calls for enough fact to raise a reasonable expectation that discovery will reveal evidence' to support the allegations. . . Starr's complaint satisfies that standard. . . . We hold that the Supreme Court's decision in Iqbal did not alter the substantive requirements for supervisory liability claims in an unconstitutional conditions of confinement case under the Eighth and Fourteenth Amendments where deliberate indifference is alleged. We further hold that Starr has sufficiently alleged under Rule 8(a) a supervisory liability claim of deliberate indifference against Sheriff Baca. We therefore reverse the district court's dismissal of Starr's claim against Sheriff Baca and remand for further proceedings.")

Starr v. Baca, 652 F.3d 1202, 1218, 1219, 1221 (9th Cir. 2011) (Trott, J., dissenting), reh'g en banc denied by Starr v. County of Los Angeles, 659 F.3d 850 (9th Cir. 2011) and cert. denied by Baca v. Starr, 132 S. Ct. 2101 (2012) ("Alleging that the Sheriff 'could' have known, 'should' have known, and 'should' have become aware is tantamount to admitting that Starr had no facts to support his allegations. The test that governs this case consists of two words, not one. Indifference is not enough. For indifference to be actionable, it must be deliberate. Starr's conclusory allegations amount to no more than formulaic flak fired into the sky in an attempt to bring down the squadron leader. When we cease to look at the Los Angeles Sheriff's Department (LASD) as an abstraction and look at the reality, we see good reasons for requiring facts before permitting lawsuits against the Sheriff himself: the agency is gigantic. The LASD is the largest Sheriff's Department in the world. It covers 3,171 square miles, 2,557,754 residents, and by contract 42 of the 88 incorporated cities in Los Angeles County. The Department employs 8,400 law enforcement officers and 7,600 civilians and is responsible for 48 courthouses and 23 substations. The Men's Central Jail alone houses a revolving population of 5,000 inmates. In addition, the Department operates the Twin Towers Correctional Facility, the Mira Loma Detention Facility, the Pitchess Detention Center, and the North County Correctional Center. Persons charged with or convicted of crimes are in over one hundred different locations. The layers of administration and management between what happens in a jail are many and they are complex. To infer that specific incidents which occur in a jail are necessarily known by the Sheriff is to engage in fallacious logic.

This complexity does not absolve the Department of responsibility for respecting the constitutional rights and general well-being of its charges, but it does show how inappropriate it is to sue the Sheriff individually unless in terms of causation the Sheriff can be personally tied to the actionable behavior at issue. Just being a disappointing or even an insufficiently engaged public servant is not enough. Those issues are for the ballot box and the County Board of Supervisors, not the courts. . . . The days of pleading conclusions without factual support accompanied by the wishful hope of finding something juicy during discovery are over. Wisely, we have moved up judgment day to the complaint stage rather than bog down the courts and parties with pre-summary judgment combat. This conclusion, of course, does not leave Starr without redress. He may sue the Sheriff in his official capacity, which is the same as suing the County of Los Angeles and the Sheriff's Department, and he may pursue his lawsuit on the ground of official policy or longstanding custom and practice–but he may not sue the Sheriff individually just because he is the Sheriff.")

Hebbe v. Pliler, 627 F.3d 338, 342 & n.7 (9th Cir. 2010) ("Because Hebbe is an inmate who proceeded pro se, his complaint 'must be held to less stringent standards than formal pleadings drafted by lawyers,' as the Supreme Court has reaffirmed since *Twombly. See Erickson v. Pardus, 551 U.S. 89, 94 (2007) (per curiam). Iqbal incorporated the Twombly pleading standard and Twombly did not alter courts' treatment of pro se filings; accordingly, we continue to construe pro se filings liberally when evaluating them under Iqbal. . . . We therefore join the five other circuits that have determined that pro se complaints should continue to be liberally construed after Iqbal. See McGowan v. Hulick, 612 F.3d 636, 640-42 (7th Cir.2010); Bustos v. Martini Club Inc., 599 F.3d 458, 461-62 (5th Cir.2010); Casanova v. Ulibarri, 595 F.3d 1120, 1124 n. 2, 1125 (10th Cir.2010); Capogrosso v. Sup.Ct. of N.J., 588 F.3d 180, 184 & n. 1 (3d Cir.2009); Harris v. Mills, 572 F.3d 66, 71-72 (2d Cir.2009) (noting that even following Twombly and Iqbal, 'we remain obligated to construe a pro se complaint liberally'). . . . While the standard is higher, our 'obligation' remains, 'where the petitioner is pro se, particularly in civil rights cases, to construe the pleadings liberally and to afford the petitioner the benefit of any doubt.' Bretz v. Kelman, 773 F.2d 1026, 1027 n. 1 (9th Cir.1985) (en banc).").

Krainski v. Nevada ex rel. Board of Regents of Nevada System of Higher Educ., 616 F.3d 963, 969 (9th Cir. 2010) ("Krainski failed to allege in her complaint or at oral argument any facts suggesting that any of the officers had a reason to suspect the falsity of the statements made by the victim and two other university employees; instead, she merely alleged in a conclusory fashion that the officers 'knew, or should have known, that the allegations ... were false' and that they failed to conduct an adequate investigation. The record does not contain any information that would create a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the officers had facts sufficiently detailed to cause a reasonable person to believe a crime had been committed and that Krainski was the perpetrator. We conclude that qualified immunity applies, as 'a reasonable police officer could have believed that his or her conduct was lawful' when arresting a suspect following a report from two university employees and a student alleging an attack. We thus affirm the district court's dismissal of Krainski's Amendment Fourth cause of action against the UNLV Employees based on the defendants' entitlement to qualified immunity.").

Krainski v. Nevada ex rel. Board of Regents of Nevada System of Higher Educ., 616 F.3d 963, 972 (9th Cir. 2010) (B. Fletcher, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("The district court erred by dismissing Krainski's Fourth Amendment claim and abused its discretion by dismissing the complaint without leave to amend. I therefore respectfully dissent from the portion of the majority's opinion that affirms the district court's decision in those respects. If the UNLV police officers who arrested Krainski knew or should have known that the allegations against her were false, the police officers would have violated the Fourth Amendment's clearly established prohibitions. . .The majority, however, deems Krainski's Fourth Amendment claim too conclusory to survive. Krainski's complaint is more than 'legal conclusions' or a 'recital[ ] of the elements of a cause of action,' Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1949, 1950 (2009), because she alleges more than simply that UNLV police lacked probable cause to arrest her. She alleges in some detail the factual circumstances under which the arrest took place. . . She also alleges facts that explain why the police lacked probable cause– namely, that the police 'knew, or should have known, that the allegations [against her] were false.' That allegation is enough to satisfy Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a) and to survive a motion under Rule 12(b)(6). The Supreme Court has expressly approved as adequate an analogous complaint alleging negligence. Swierkiewicz v. Sorema N.A., 534 U.S. 506, 513 n. 4 (2002) (quoting Fed.R.Civ.P. app. Form 9 (2000)). . . . Krainski has adequately stated a claim for a violation of the Fourth Amendment.").

Alvarez v. Hill, 518 F.3d 1152, 1159 (9th Cir. 2008) ("Appellees' rigid insistence that RLUIPA claims must be specifically pled in the plaintiff's complaint is without support in our precedent and frankly puzzling in view of the lenience traditionally afforded pro se pleadings and of RLUIPA's manifest purpose of protecting 'institutionalized persons who are unable freely to attend to their religious needs.' . . The 'simplified pleading standard applies to all civil actions, with limited exceptions' provided for by rule or by statute. . . Accordingly, we hold that RLUIPA claims need satisfy only the ordinary requirements of notice pleading , and that a complaint's failure to cite RLUIPA does not preclude the plaintiff from subsequently asserting a claim based on that statute. Under this pleading standard, it is sufficient that the complaint, alone or supplemented by any subsequent filings before summary judgment, provide the defendant fair notice that the plaintiff is claiming relief under RLUIPA as well as the First Amendment.").

Walker v. Wechsler, No. 116CV01417JLTPC, 2016 WL 5930420, at *2 (E.D. Cal. Oct. 12, 2016) ("While 'plaintiffs [now] face a higher burden of pleadings facts ...,' . . . the pleadings of pro se inmates and detainees are still construed liberally and are afforded the benefit of any doubt. Hebbe v. Pliler, 627 F.3d 338, 342 (9th Cir. 2010). . . . If he chooses to file a first amended complaint, Plaintiff should endeavor to make it as concise as possible. He should merely state which of his constitutional rights he feels were violated by each named defendant and its factual basis. Plaintiff need not and should not cite legal authority for his claims in a first amended complaint. His factual allegations are accepted as true and need not be bolstered by legal authority at the pleading stage. If Plaintiff files a first amended complaint, his factual allegations will be screened under the legal standards and authorities stated in this order.")

Perez v. United States, 13CV1417-WQH-BGS, 2014 WL 4385473, *15 (S.D. Cal. Sept. 3, 2014) ("The conclusory allegation that the Rocking Policy was implemented and carried out on persons 'on the basis of their Hispanic descent and perceived Mexican origin' is not entitled to an assumption of truth. The same is true for the allegation that the Agents shot Yañez 'on the basis of his Hispanic descent and Mexican origin.' Although the FAC alleges that the Rocking Policy is only carried out along the Southern Border and only against Mexicans and persons of Hispanic descent, there is an 'obvious alternative explanation' for this perceived discrimination. . . On the facts alleged, '[i]t should come as no surprise that a ... policy directing [Border Patrol agents to treat instances of rock throwing at the Southern Border as deadly force] would produce a disparate, incidental impact on [Mexican nationals and persons of Hispanic descent], even though the purpose of the policy was to target neither [Mexican nationals or persons of Hispanic descent].'. . The Court concludes that Plaintiffs have failed to state an Equal Protection claim for intentional discrimination.")

Sablan v. A.B. Won Pat Intern. Airport Authority, Guam, Civil No. 10-00013, 2010 WL 5148202, at *4 (D. Guam Dec. 9, 2010) ("Now, when evaluating employment discrimination complaints in the context of a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, district courts in the Ninth Circuit are proceeding on the premise that although it may not be necessary that the complaint have facts constituting all the elements of a prima facie in order to survive the motion to dismiss, those elements are nonetheless relevant to the court's analysis of the sufficiency of the complaint. [collecting cases] Common to all these cases is the recognition that although the elements of a prima facie employment discrimination case constitute 'an evidentiary standard, not a pleading requirement' (Swierkiewicz, 534 U.S. at 514), Twombly and Iqbal have indisputably pushed pleading standards a bit back in the direction of fact pleading. Courts therefore must look at a complaint in light of the relevant 'evidentiary standard,' in order to decide whether it 'contain [s] sufficient factual matter, accepted as true, to "state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face."'. . The idea, then, is not that Swierkiewicz has been overruled, but rather that, after Twombly and Iqbal, an employment discrimination plaintiff must get closer to alleging a prima facie case than was necessary a few years ago.")

Microsoft Corp. v. Phoenix Solutions, Inc., 741 F.Supp.2d 1156, 1159 (C.D. Cal. 2010) ("This Court agrees with the Federal Circuit and those district courts that have held that a party alleging direct infringement need only comply with Form 18. A patentee 'need only plead facts sufficient to place the alleged infringer on notice as to what he must defend.'. . This Court additionally reasons that minimal pleading of direct infringement is sufficient because this Court requires the prompt filing of infringement contentions, which put the party accused of infringement on detailed notice of the basis for the allegations against it. Correspondingly, the Court finds that a declaratory judgment claim of no direct infringement need only plead facts to put the patentee on notice and need not be subject to the heightened pleading standards of Twombly and Iqbal. . . . All other claims, counterclaims and affirmative defenses in a patent case are subject to the requirements of Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 8(a) as interpreted by the Supreme Court in Twombly and Iqbal, except for inequitable conduct.")

Lucas v. City of Visalia, No. 1:09-CV-1015 AWI DLB, 2010 WL 2867287, at *4, *5 (E.D. Cal. July 21, 2010) ("If Lucas intends to allege a manufacturing defect, he must identify/explain how the taser weapon either deviated from Taser Int.'s intended result/design or how the taser weapon deviated from other seemingly identical taser models. . . A bare allegation that the taser weapon had 'a manufacturing defect' is an insufficient legal conclusion. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. at 1949-50. If Lucas intends to allege a design defect claim, he should identify which design defect theory he wishes to utilize. Under the consumer expectations test, Lucas 'should describe how the [taser weapon] failed to meet the minimum safety expectations of an ordinary consumer' of taser weapons… Under the risk-benefits test, Lucas should allege that the risks of the design outweigh the benefits, and then 'explain how the particular design of the [taser weapon] caused [Lucas] harm.'. .Again, a bare allegation that the taser weapon suffered from a 'design defect' is an insufficient legal conclusion…Dismissal of tenth cause of action is appropriate because the complaint contains no factual allegations that identify what aspect of the subject taser's design and manufacture made it defective. Since it is not clear that amendment would be futile, the Court will dismiss the SAC with leave to amend.")

Ernst v. Cate, No. 1:08-cv-01940-OWW-GSA, 2009 WL 3818227, at *4 (E.D. Cal. Nov. 13, 2009) ("Plaintiff's second cause of action is the only claim in which plaintiff contends that the defendants, including Cate, acted intentionally. First, plaintiff alleges, 'The defendants decided to punish [plaintiff] for the crime he was convicted of by placing him in his wheelchair, unrestrained, in a van traveling 70 miles per hour, and then applying the brakes' (doc. 16, & 33). Later, plaintiff claims, 'Defendants discriminated against plaintiff because of his disability-willfully and indifferently ignored his need to be restrained within the van transporting him to a facility he needed to visit for medical reasons' (doc. 16, & 36). Because plaintiff provides no factual support for these legal conclusions, he fails to satisfy the pleading standards set forth in Iqbal and Twombly. Although a court evaluating a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss is instructed to assume the truth of all factual allegations of the plaintiff and the reasonable inferences to be drawn from them, it need not accept as true unreasonable inferences or conclusory allegations masquerading as facts. . . .That the CDCR Secretary and Assistant Director acted in concert with two corrections officers 'to punish [plaintiff] for the crime he was convicted of by placing him in his wheelchair, unrestrained, in a van traveling 70 miles per hour, and then applying the brakes' strains credulity. Similarly, the underlying facts offer nothing to suggest that Cate 'discriminated against plaintiff because of his disability-willfully and indifferently ignored his need to be restrained within the van transporting him to a facility he needed to visit for medical reasons.'").

Doe ex rel. Gonzales v. Butte Valley Unified School Dist., No. CIV. 09-245 WBS CMK, 2009 WL 2424608, at *8, *9 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 6, 2009) ("Although Iqbal' s majority opinion itself did not intimate any seachange, jurists and legal commentators have observed that the decision marks a striking retreat from the highly permissive pleading standards often thought to distinguish the federal system from " 'the hyper-technical, code-pleading regime of a prior era,' 129 S.Ct. at 1949.

. .Prior to Iqbal, many courts–including this court and, apparently, the Supreme Court itself–read Rule 8 to express a 'willingness to Aallow [ ] lawsuits based on conclusory allegations ... to go forward,"'. . . . Indeed, for over half a century, district courts had been instructed that the 'short plain statement' required by Rule 8 'must simply Agive the defendant fair notice of what the plaintiff's claim is and the grounds upon which it rests."'. . . Now, however, even the official Federal Rules of Civil Procedure Forms, which were touted as 'sufficient under the rules and ... intended to indicate the simplicity and brevity of the statement which the rules contemplate,' Fed. R. Civ. Proc. 84, have been cast into doubt by Iqbal. . . Accordingly, although the court will grant in part defendants' motion to dismiss, the court will also permit plaintiff leave to amend. Plaintiff, however, is admonished to thoroughly and carefully set forth his allegations in any subsequent amended complaint, as both judicial resources and fairness to defendants preclude unlimited opportunities to amend the pleadings.").

Ibrahim v. Department of Homeland Sec., No. C 06-00545 WHA, 2009 WL 2246194, at *10 (N.D. Cal. July 27, 2009) ("Ibrahim has not pleaded that defendants took action because of and not merely in spite of her being Muslim and a Malaysian citizen. That plaintiff was Muslim and detained is not enough to draw an inference of discrimination under the Iqbal standard. No additional facts, such as derogatory statements, are alleged. Accordingly, as pled, the discrimination claims against San Francisco officers or Bondanella are insufficient. A good argument can be made that the Iqbal standard is too demanding. Victims of discrimination and profiling will often not have specific facts to plead without the benefit of discovery. District judges, however, must follow the law as laid down by the Supreme Court. Yet, the harshness is mitigated here. Counsel for the San Francisco defendants and Bondanella admit that plaintiff's Fourth Amendment claim can go forward. This means that discovery will go forward. During discovery, Ibrahim can inquire into facts that bear on the incident, including why her name was on the list. If enough facts emerge, then she can move to amend and to reassert her discrimination claims at that time.").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Matthews v. Bergdorf, 889 F.3d 1136, 1144-45, 1149-50 (10th Cir. 2018) ("In its order denying the caseworkers' motion to dismiss, the district court opined that the caseworkers, rather than making any individualized arguments, 'collectively' asserted the defense of qualified immunity. . . The caseworkers, according to the court, argued only that the complaint's factual allegations were not 'conscience shocking.'. . Therefore, instead of asking whether the complaint stated a claim under the special relationship exception as to each caseworker, the district court only asked whether the complaint alleged 'any possible claims' that shocked the conscience. . . .The district court's approach constituted error because it shifted the burden to the caseworkers to establish their entitlement to qualified immunity. Perhaps the advocacy of the caseworkers' trial counsel in the district court was less than stellar. But where multiple state actors raise a qualified immunity defense in a motion to dismiss, 'good as to one, good as to all' is never the proper approach to adjudicating the sufficiency of the complaint. . . . Before a court may undertake the proper analysis, the complaint must 'isolate the allegedly unconstitutional acts of each defendant'; otherwise the complaint does not 'provide adequate notice as to the nature of the claims against each' and fails for this reason. . . Here, the caseworkers' assertion of qualified immunity in their motion, an assertion they made multiple times therein, gave rise to a presumption that they were immune from suit. . . This presumption operated such that when the caseworkers raised the defense of qualified immunity, the burden shifted to Plaintiffs to demonstrate the complaints' factual allegations established their right to recover against each caseworker. . . If Plaintiffs then failed to establish either prong of the qualified immunity analysis as to any caseworker, that caseworker was entitled to prevail on his or her defense. . . In sum, the burden was on Plaintiffs to overcome the presumption of immunity that arose as to each individual caseworker once the caseworkers raised the qualified immunity defense. Pahls tells us exactly this. There we explained that to state a viable § 1983 claim and overcome a qualified immunity defense, plaintiffs 'must establish that each defendant ... [violated] plaintiffs' clearly established constitutional rights.... Plaintiffs must do more than show ... that "defendants," as a collective and undifferentiated whole, were responsible for those violations.'. . What this means for our purposes is that every named Plaintiff had the burden of adequately pleading every element of his or her claim under the special relationship exception—including the existence of a special relationship between himself or herself and the State—against one or more named caseworkers. Whether a plaintiff has adequately pled a special relationship with the State should be the first inquiry in cases like this. 'The existence of the special relationship is the pivotal issue.'. . In its absence, an ODHS caseworker cannot be held liable under the special relationship exception to a Plaintiff suffering injuries at the hands of Jerry and Deidre Matthews—no matter how shocking the complaint's factual allegations. . . .Discovery may proceed on Plaintiff M.S.'s claim against Defendant Bergdorf because in 2005 the law was well established such that a reasonable caseworker cognizant of the governing law would have understood Bergdorf's failure to protect M.S. in light of child abuse and neglect allegations might give rise to constitutional liability under the special relationship exception. . . Thus, the district court properly denied caseworker Bergdorf's defense of qualified immunity as to M.S.'s particular claim against her. To the extent the complaint otherwise purports to state any cause of action under the special relationship exception, however, the district court, for the reasons stated, erred in denying the caseworkers qualified immunity.") Ghailani v. Sessions, 859 F.3d 1295, 1304-06 (10th Cir. 2017) ("The district court dismissed Mr. Ghailani's religious freedom claim with prejudice on the basis that he failed to meet the requirements of Gee in his complaint, i.e., that he did not include facts showing the regulations restricting his ability to pray Jumu'ah were not related to a legitimate penological interest. We agree with this analysis as applied to Mr. Ghailani's First Amendment claim. However, Mr. Ghailani also pled that the restriction on his ability to pray was a violation of RFRA. The district court erred in applying the same pleading requirement to the RFRA claim as it did to the constitutional religious freedom claim. . . . Because the Turner standard does not apply to a RFRA claim, a prisoner-plaintiff clearly need not plead facts showing 'that the actions of which he complains were not reasonably related to legitimate penological interests,' as Gee required for

First Amendment claims. Accordingly, while the district court properly dismissed Mr. Ghailani's First Amendment claim alleging that the prison violated his free exercise rights by not allowing him to pray Jumu'ah, it erred in dismissing his RFRA claim. Moreover, just as Mr. Ghailani did not need to plead facts showing the government lacked a legitimate penological interest, he also did not need to plead facts showing that the restrictions were not in 'furtherance of a compelling governmental interest' and were not 'the least restrictive means of furthering that compelling governmental interest.' 42 U.S.C. § 2000bb-1(b)(1)-(2). Subsection (b) of RFRA is an 'affirmative defense,' and 'the burden is placed squarely on the Government by RFRA.'")

Vega v. Davis, 572 F. App'x 611, 618-19 (10th Cir. 2014) ("In his response brief, the plaintiff essentially argues that the warden could be liable for any suicide by a mentally ill person in the Control Unit because of his knowledge that there were mentally ill people in the Control Unit that were not receiving mental health services. However, the complaint's only non-conclusory fact supporting the inference that Davis knew about the lack of treatment in the Control Unit was his single visit there. Although it is certainly possible that on his tour he witnessed enough in the Control Unit to make it obvious that there was a systematic denial of mental health care, we conclude from our 'judicial experience and common sense' that a single visit does not 'plausibly suggest' that Davis knew enough to be deliberately indifferent to Control Unit inmates. . . . Certainly, there is much in this complaint that, if true, is deeply concerning. However, we are counseled by Iqbal to remember that 'each Government official, his or her title notwithstanding, is only liable for his or her own misconduct.'. . The fact that allegations in this complaint, if true, expose significant shortcomings in the treatment of mentally-ill prisoners at ADX cannot negate that requirement.")

Kansas Penn Gaming, LLC v. Collins, 656 F.3d 1210, 1219, 1220 (10th Cir. 2011) ("[I]n the wake of Twombly and Iqbal, and consistent with our cases establishing a more refined analytical framework for class-of-one claims, we must apply the plausibility standard with care. As at least one circuit has found, in light of Iqbal, a generalized pleading in the mold of Olech is no longer sufficient to state a class-of-one claim. Ruston v. Town Bd. for Town of Skaneateles, 610 F.3d 55 (2d Cir.2010), cert. denied, 131 S.Ct. 824 (2010). In that case, for example, the Second Circuit upheld the dismissal of plaintiffs' claim against the defendant town, for failure to set out specific examples of similarly situated individuals and differing treatment. . . We likewise dismissed a class-of-one claim on similar grounds in an unpublished but representative opinion. See Glover v. Mabrey, 384 F. App'x 763, 778 (10th Cir.2010) ("[Plaintiff] has failed to allege, as it must, the identity or characteristics of other, similarly situated contractors and how those similarly situated contractors were treated differently."). . . With these principles in mind, and consistent with our holdings in Robbins, 519 F.3d at 1247, 1253 and Smith, 561 F.3d at 1098, plaintiffs must offer enough specific factual allegations to 'nudge[ ] their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.'. . . As we discussed above, after Twombly and Iqbal, it is insufficient to simply allege that other, unidentified properties have 'comparable' or 'similar' conditions–the claim must be supported by specific facts plausibly suggesting the conditions on the properties and the properties themselves are similar in all material respects. These cursory allegations are inadequate to support any class-of-one claim. But they are particularly problematic here, where the complaint addresses the inherently subjective and individualized enforcement of health and safety regulations. Unlike Olech, this is not a case where the regulatory decision is a simple, one-dimensional inquiry, resolved with a tape measure. Rather, Kansas Penn challenges an act of regulatory enforcement that implicates a 'multiplicity of relevant (nondiscriminatory) variables,' 'from the relative culpability of the defendants to the optimal deployment of prosecutorial resources,' making it 'correspondingly more difficult to bring an equal protection claim.'. . Because Kansas Penn has failed to allege facts suggesting that other property owners were similarly situated in all material respects, the district court did not err in dismissing the complaint.")

Gee v. Pacheco, 627 F.3d 1178, 1185,1186 (10th Cir. 2010) ("Although the plausibility standard has been criticized by some as placing an improper burden on plaintiffs, denying them proper access to the courts, that criticism ordinarily would not apply to the restrictions on prisoner complaints described above. One of the chief concerns of critics is that plaintiffs will need discovery before they can satisfy plausibility requirements when there is asymmetry of information, with the defendants having all the evidence. But prisoners claiming constitutional violations by officers within the prison will rarely suffer from information asymmetry. Not only do prisoners ordinarily know what has happened to them; but they will have learned how the institution has defended the challenged conduct when they pursue the administrative claims that they must bring as a prerequisite to filing suit. . . Of course, if the complaint alleges that the prisoner received no explanation in the grievance process (or was coerced into not pursuing a grievance), the claim that an officer's conduct lacked justification may become plausible. To be sure, a pro se prisoner may fail to plead his allegations with the skill necessary to state a plausible claim even when the facts would support one. But ordinarily the dismissal of a pro se claim under Rule 12(b)(6) should be without prejudice, . . . and a careful judge will explain the pleading's deficiencies so that a prisoner with a meritorious claim can then submit an adequate complaint[.]")

Mink v. Knox, 613 F.3d 995, 1002 (10th Cir. 2010) (amended complaint "plausibly asserted the requisite casual connection between [prosecutor's] conduct and the search and seizure that occurred at [plaintiff's] home.")

Smith v. U.S., 561 F.3d 1090, 1104, 1105 (10th Cir. 2009) ("To state an Eighth Amendment Bivens claim, Smith had to allege that each defendant official. . . acted with deliberate indifference–that he or she both knew of and disregarded an excessive risk to inmate health or safety. . . . As the litigation progresses, it is possible the government will produce evidence showing that some or all of the individual defendants did not know that the 1994 Ramsey-Schilling survey disclosed the presence of asbestos in the closet, or more generally, that an individual defendant did not know of the presence of asbestos in the closet, based on simple lack of knowledge or intervening circumstances. However, these are matters to be determined at a later point in this case. Smith has satisfied the standard enunciated in Robbins–the defendants are on fair notice of who is alleged to have done what to whom, Robbins, 519 F.3d at 1249–as to all defendants named in their individual capacities other than Alberto Gonzales and H. Lappin (the director of the Federal Bureau of Prisons).").

Choate v. Lemmings, Nos. 07-7099, 07-7100, 08-7010, 2008 WL 4291199, at *5 (10th Cir. Sept. 22, 2008) (not reported) ("The Supreme Court made clear in Gomez that there is no basis for imposing on a § 1983 plaintiff the obligation to anticipate and plead around the qualified immunity defense. . . More recently, in the wake of Crawford-El v.. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998), this court specifically rejected a heightened pleading standard for civil rights plaintiffs facing the immunity defense. See Currier v. Doran, 242 F.3d 905, 916-917 (10th Cir.2001). A § 1983 complaint needs but two allegations to state a cause of action: (1) that the plaintiff was deprived of a federal right; and (2) that the person who deprived him acted under color of state law. . . Moreover, these allegations need not be pled with specificity. All that is required are 'sufficient facts, that when taken as true, provide plausible grounds that discovery will reveal evidence to support plaintiff's allegations.'").

Briggs v. Johnson, No. 07-6037, 2008 WL 1815721, at *4-*6(10th Cir. Apr. 23, 2008) (not published) ("Construing his complaint in the light most favorable to him, Briggs has alleged that Defendants, Jean Bonner, and Carla Lynch, acting in concert, instructed at least one person to cease reporting ongoing abuse perpetrated against Kelsey. Clearly, this conduct was directed specifically at Kelsey, not the public at large. Further, it is evident from a reading of the entire complaint that Kelsey's guardian, her paternal grandmother, was involved in reporting that Kelsey was being abused during her unsupervised visits with Smith. As we recognized in Currier, the act of instructing individuals to cease reporting abuse has the effect of impeding access to protective services or other sources of assistance otherwise promptly available to the victim at the time of the abuse. . . Thus, if true, Defendants' actions imposed an immediate threat of harm to Kelsey which was limited in range and duration. Accordingly, we conclude Briggs has sufficiently alleged that Defendants created or increased Kelsey's vulnerability to abuse by their alleged act of discouraging the reporting of additional incidents of abuse. . . . Briggs's complaint differs from the complaint we concluded was insufficient in a recent case also involving allegations of substantive due process violations by state employees. See Robbins, 2008 WL 747132, at *5-*8. In contrast to the complaint in Robbins, Briggs's allegation that Defendants discouraged the reporting of additional incidents of abuse is specific enough to give Defendants fair notice of the grounds on which he claims entitlement to relief. Based on this allegation, the district court had no difficulty applying Currier to determine that the constitutional right asserted was clearly established. . . . We affirm the denial of Defendants' motion to dismiss to the extent they assert an entitlement to qualified immunity on Briggs's danger creation claim predicated on their act of discouraging the reporting of additional incidents of abuse.")

VanZandt v. Oklahoma Dept. of Human Services, 276 F. App'x 843, 2008 WL 1945344, at *3 (10th Cir. May 5, 2008) ("This Court, in Robbins, stated that plausibility serves two purposes: (1) to weed out claims that, absent additional pleadings, do not have a reasonable prospect of success, and (2) to inform the defendants of the actual grounds of the claim against them. . . A court, therefore, must review a complaint with these purposes in mind. Not surprisingly, the Twombly Court is critical of complaints that do not mention specific times, places or people involved. . . This Court also acknowledged that the degree of specificity necessary to establish plausibility and fair notice is dependant on the context of the case involved. . . Although we apply the same standard in evaluating dismissals in qualified immunity cases as to dismissals generally, complaints in § 1983 cases against individual government actors pose a greater likelihood of failures in notice and plausibility because they typically include complex claims against multiple defendants. . . The Twombly standard has greater 'bite' in these contexts, 'reflecting the special interest in resolving the affirmative defense of qualified immunity Aat the earliest stage of a litigation.'". . Therefore, in § 1983 cases, a plaintiff must 'make clear exactly who is alleged to have done what to whom, to provide each individual with fair notice as to the basis of the claims against him or her....'. . . Of course, neither Twombly nor Robbins requires, and we do not demand, the sort of specificity required in claims subject to Fed.R.Civ.P. 9(b). . . . To carry their burden, plaintiffs under the Twombly standard must do more than generally use the collective term 'defendants.'. . This Court, in Robbins, placed great importance on the need for a plaintiff to differentiate between the actions of each individual defendant and the actions of the group as a whole. . . This is because the purposes of plausibility, notice and gatekeeping, are best served by requiring plaintiffs to directly link an actual individual with the alleged improper conduct.").

Robbins v. Oklahoma, 519 F.3d 1242, 1247-50 (10th Cir. 2008) ("We are not the first to acknowledge that the new formulation is less than pellucid. See Iqbal v. Hasty, 490 F.3d 143, 157 (2d Cir.2007) (referring to the 'conflicting signals' in the Twombly opinion); Phillips v. County of Allegheny, 2008 WL 305025, at *3 (3d Cir. Feb. 5, 2008) (calling the opinion 'confusing'). As best we understand it, however, the opinion seeks to find a middle ground between 'heightened fact pleading ,' which is expressly rejected . . . and allowing complaints that are no more than 'labels and conclusions'or 'a formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action,' which the Court stated 'will not do.' . . The most difficult question in interpreting Twombly is what the Court means by 'plausibility.' The Court states that the complaint must contain 'enough facts to state a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.' . . But it reiterates the bedrock principle that a judge ruling on a motion to dismiss must accept all allegations as true and may not dismiss on the ground that it appears unlikely the allegations can be proven. . . . Thus, 'plausible' cannot mean 'likely to be true.' Rather, 'plausibility' in this context must refer to the scope of the allegations in a complaint: if they are so general that they encompass a wide swath of conduct, much of it innocent, then the plaintiffs 'have not nudged their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.' . . The allegations must be enough that, if assumed to be true, the plaintiff plausibly (not just speculatively) has a claim for relief. . . This requirement of plausibility serves not only to weed out claims that do not (in the absence of additional allegations) have a reasonable prospect of success, but also to inform the defendants of the actual grounds of the claim against them. 'Without some factual allegation in the complaint, it is hard to see how a claimant could satisfy the requirement of providing not only 'fair notice' of the nature of the claim, but also 'grounds' on which the claim rests.' . . . The Twombly Court was particularly critical of complaints that 'mentioned no specific time, place, or person involved in the alleged conspiracies.' . . . The Third Circuit has noted, and we agree, that the degree of specificity necessary to establish plausibility and fair notice, and therefore the need to include sufficient factual allegations, depends on context: 'Context matters in notice pleading . Fair notice under Rule 8(a)(2) depends on the type of case....' [citing Phillips] . . . . The context of this case is a claim of qualified immunity by state officials or employees who were sued for damages in their personal capacity for injuries to a child inflicted by a third party. . . .To 'nudge their claims across the line from conceivable to plausible,' Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1974, in this context, plaintiffs must allege facts sufficient to show (assuming they are true) that the defendants plausibly violated their constitutional rights, and that those rights were clearly established at the time. . . . Although we apply 'the same standard in evaluating dismissals in qualified immunity cases as to dismissals generally,'. . . complaints in § 1983 cases against individual government actors pose a greater likelihood of failures in notice and plausibility because they typically include complex claims against multiple defendants. The Twombly standard may have greater bite in such contexts, appropriately reflecting the special interest in resolving the affirmative defense of qualified immunity 'at the earliest possible stage of a litigation.'. . . Given the complaint's use of either the collective term 'Defendants' or a list of the defendants named individually but with no distinction as to what acts are attributable to whom, it is impossible for any of these individuals to ascertain what particular unconstitutional acts they are alleged to have committed. . . . In addition to the failure of Count I to satisfy the standard of fair notice required by Rule 8, the plaintiffs do not allege facts sufficient to render their [state-created-danger and equal protection] claim[s] plausible.")

Dorf v. City of Evansville, No. 11–CV–351–S, 2012 WL 1440343, at *4, *5 & n.2 (D. Wyo. Apr. 22, 2012) ("In noting that Plaintiff's allegations are made 'upon information and belief,' the Court does not suggest that such allegations made are improper under Iqbal and Twombly. As the Sixth Circuit recently observed, the plausibility standard of Iqbal and Twombly:

> does not prevent a plaintiff from pleading facts alleged upon information and belief where the facts are peculiarly within the possession and control of the defendant or where the belief is based on factual information that makes the inference of culpability plausible.

Arista Records, LLC v. Doe 3, 604 F.3d 110, 120 (2d Cir.2010) (internal quotation marks and citations omitted). Here, however, even though Plaintiffs' allegations are made 'upon information and belief,' there is simply no 'factual content that allows the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.'. . Nor is the nature of Officer Pena's alleged prior misconduct a matter that is 'peculiarly within the possession and control' of defendants.")

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

McCullough v. Finley, No. 17-11554, 2018 WL 5318146, at *6-8 (11th Cir. Oct. 29, 2018) ("The jailees allege that the mayor and chiefs, government officials 'at the highest level,'. . . created and implemented an unlawful scheme and intentionally subjected them to that scheme, but Iqbal illustrates why the jailees are 'armed with nothing more than conclusions[.]. .Substitute the mayor for the attorney general and the chiefs for the FBI director in Iqbal, and the comparison is uncanny. Like the complaint in Iqbal, which labeled the attorney general as the 'principal architect' and the FBI director as the 'instrument[ ]' behind an unlawful detention policy, the jailees' complaint alleges that the mayor 'adopted' and the chiefs 'administered' an unlawful scheme to increase municipal revenue. The complaint in Iqbal alleged that the attorney general and the FBI director 'knew of, condoned, and willfully and maliciously agreed to subject [Iqbal] to harsh conditions of confinement as a matter of policy.'. . Similarly, the jailees allege that the mayor and chiefs 'adopted, ratified[,] and administered policies, practices[,] or customs' that were 'part of a scheme designed to increase municipal budgets ... through imprisonment for nonpayment [of fines] ... and the use of coerced jail labor.' And the jailees allege that the mayor and chiefs acted 'intentionally and unlawfully,' as well as 'recklessly, wantonly, willfully, maliciously, or in bad faith.' We must discard the conclusory allegations that the mayor and chiefs created and implemented a scheme. As the Supreme Court has explained, allegations that government officials were the 'principal architect' and instrument[ ]' behind an unlawful policy, without supporting allegations, are conclusory. The allegations that the mayor 'adopted' and the chiefs 'administered' an unlawful scheme to increase municipal revenue, without more, are 'not entitled to be assumed true.'. . And the allegations that the mayor and chiefs intended to subject jailees to the scheme are conclusory. The district court ruled that the jailees' allegations are 'very much tied to bad faith,' but it ignored that these allegations merely recite the legal elements that the jailees must establish to overcome state-agent immunity. . . The jailees cannot overcome the mayor's and chiefs' immunity with conclusory allegations that 'carry no weight.'. .The absence of allegations about any individual acts of the mayor or chiefs reinforces the conclusory nature of the jailees' complaint. The jailees allege that the mayor and chiefs are 'individually liable for their acts or omissions,' but the complaint fails to 'provid[e] the facts from which one could draw such a conclusion.'. . The complaint alleges the mayor's and chiefs' names and titles, but nothing about 'the significance of their titles, their individual roles in the [scheme], their personal interactions or familiarity with [jailees], their length of service, their management policies, or any other characteristics that would bear on whether they knew about' the scheme that they allegedly operated. . . We cannot even infer from the complaint when either chief was in office. Nor can we infer that the mayor or chiefs were ever present in a municipal courtroom when jailees were sentenced or in a municipal jail when jailees were forced to work. After we discard conclusory allegations, the second step in our evaluation of a complaint is to assume that any remaining factual allegations are true and determine whether those allegations state a plausible claim. . . To state a plausible claim, factual allegations must 'allow[ ] the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.'. . That is, a complaint must contain factual allegations that are 'enough to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.'. . Factual allegations, although consistent with a plaintiff's theory, may fail to state a plausible claim 'given more likely explanations.'. . The jailees argue that their complaint contains 'great factual detail,' but we disagree. After discarding their conclusory allegations, we struggle to find factual allegations left in the complaint, and the few factual allegations that remain do not state a plausible claim. The jailees allege that the City of Montgomery collected more fines and court costs than the City of Huntsville, which has a similar population, but even if true, the difference in municipal revenues does not 'nudge[ ] [the jailees'] claims across the line from conceivable to plausible.'. . Perhaps there is more crime in Montgomery. This lone factual allegation does not support a plausible inference of a scheme by the mayor and chiefs, 'given more likely explanations' for the difference in municipal revenues. . . The alleged difference in revenues fails to raise the jailees' 'right to relief above the speculative level.'. .The jailees' complaint contains factual allegations about misconduct in the municipal court, but as we explained, that misconduct concerns judicial acts. And any connection between the judicial acts and the mayor and chiefs is 'too chimerical to be maintained.'. . The jailees do not allege that the mayor or chiefs presided over any proceedings in which they could have informed a defendant of his rights, appointed counsel, or considered alternative sentences. And certainly, the mayor and chiefs did not sentence jailees to sit-out their fines. No factual allegations in the complaint plausibly connect the mayor or chiefs to these judicial acts, and without any 'factual enhancement,' the complaint 'stops short of the line between possibility and plausibility.'")

Carollo v. Boria, 833 F.3d 1322, 1330, 1332 (11th Cir. 2016) ("It is not appropriate at the motion to dismiss stage for us to interpret the Municipal Charter's ambiguous job description for the City Manager. . . Discovery will illuminate exactly which laws Carollo had the responsibility to enforce or administer and, in fact, enforced or administered in the ordinary course of his job responsibilities. Nonetheless, with respect to the only question before us under Rules 8(a) and 12(b)(6) — whether, taking the factual allegations in the complaint as true, the complaint states a claim — we find it plausible under Iqbal and Twombly that Carollo spoke as a citizen and not pursuant to his ordinary job duties as City Manager when he made statements to law enforcement and other agencies about how Boria and Ruiz violated Florida's campaign finance laws. . .Carollo's status as a supervising public official does not alter our conclusion that he has plausibly alleged that he spoke as a citizen about violations of Florida's campaign finance laws. . . . Under these circumstances, we believe that justice requires giving Carollo an opportunity to file an amended complaint that resurrects those portions of his complaint that we dismiss by pleading facts that support the claim — if true — that he spoke as a citizen and not pursuant to his ordinary job responsibilities. The district court should then proceed directly to discovery, which will reveal, among other things, what precisely were Carollo's ordinary job responsibilities. Indeed, each of the relevant cases from the Supreme Court and this Circuit to undertake Garcetti's 'practical inquiry' concerning whether a plaintiff spoke pursuant to ordinary job responsibilities or as a citizen did so at the summary judgment stage or later in the life of the case.")

Hoefling v. City of Miami, 811 F.3d 1271, 1276 (11th Cir. 2016) ("We expressly held in Randall, and reaffirm today, that 'whatever requirements our heightened pleading standard once imposed have since been replaced by those of the Twombly–Iqbal plausibility standard .... [which] applies to all civil actions....' . . . Accordingly, the district court should not have placed a 'heightened pleading' burden on Mr. Hoefling for his § 1983 claims.")

Weiland v. Palm Beach Cnty. Sheriff's Office, 792 F.3d 1313, 1321-28 (11th Cir. 2015) ("T.D.S. was this Court's first shot in what was to become a thirty-year salvo of criticism aimed at shotgun pleadings, and there is no ceasefire in sight. . .Some of our shooting, which has mostly been done with nonlethal dicta, has at times been nearly as lacking in precision as the target itself. At times we have used the term 'shotgun pleading' to mean little more than 'poorly drafted complaint.'. . In the hope that we could impose some clarity on what we have said and done about unclear complaints, we have examined more than sixty published decisions issued since the T.D.S. decision in 1985. One thing we looked for is how many types of shotgun pleadings have been used, wittingly or unwittingly, by attorneys and litigants. [court discusses four categories of shotgun pleadings] [W]e conclude that the district court abused its discretion when it dismissed Weiland's count one and count three claims against Fleming and Johnson on the ground that those counts did not comply with Rules 8(a)(2) and 10(b). In concluding that the court should not have dismissed those two counts, we are not retreating from this circuit's criticism of shotgun pleadings, but instead are deciding that, whatever their faults, these two counts are informative enough to permit a court to readily determine if they state a claim upon which relief can be granted. The district court implicitly recognized as much when it observed in the orders dismissing counts one and three that they actually do state claims upon which relief can be granted. Whether those observations are correct is a question to which we now turn. . . . Deputies Johnson and Fleming did not argue in their motion to dismiss Weiland's third amended complaint, or in their brief to this Court, that they are entitled to qualified immunity. We limit our analysis to whether the allegations in Weiland's complaint are sufficient to state a claim upon which relief can be granted without regard to the qualified immunity defense. . . .Construing the allegations in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, as we are required to do, count one alleges that Deputy Johnson shot Weiland without warning when he was not posing a threat to the deputies or anyone else; that while he was on the ground bleeding from the gunshot wound and not offering any resistance or threat, Deputy Fleming tasered Weiland; and that while he was on the ground seriously injured by both the shooting and the tasering and not offering any resistance or threat, both deputies beat him without cause. Count one states an excessive force claim upon which relief can be granted against both deputies. . . . Weiland claims that he was detained improperly and prosecuted for charges based on evidence fabricated by the deputies and lies contained in their police reports. . . . Because count three specifies a causal connection between the alleged cover up and the specific deprivation of Weiland's constitutional rights, it sufficiently alleges 'an underlying actual denial of his constitutional rights,' which is required to state a claim for conspiracy under § 1983. . . For these reasons, we will reverse the part of the district court's judgment dismissing count three as to Deputy Johnson and Deputy Fleming.") Franklin v. Curry, 738 F.3d 1246, 1251, 1252 (11th Cir. 2013) (per curiam) [Note Judge Ripple from 7th Cir. sitting by designation] ("Franklin's repeated allegations the Supervisory Defendants were deliberately indifferent or their actions constituted or resulted in deliberate indifference carry no weight. Similarly, by alleging Appellants 'knew or should have known' of a risk, Franklin has merely recited an element of a claim without providing the facts from which one could draw such a conclusion. The district court found these allegations sufficient. Had the district court followed the Supreme Court's 'twopronged approach' of first separating out the complaint's conclusory legal allegations and then determining whether the remaining well-pleaded factual allegations, accepted as true, 'plausibly give rise to an entitlement to relief,' the insufficiency of Franklin's allegations would have been obvious. . . .Stripping away Franklin's conclusory allegations leaves only a handful of properly pleaded facts—specifically, (1) that Gay verbally harassed Franklin and told her 'there is nothing you can do,' (2) that Gay sexually assaulted Franklin, (3) that Gay had previously sexually assaulted another female detainee, and (4) that Gay had previously had sexual relations with a third female detainee. Given only these facts, Franklin's complaint is insufficient to state a plausible claim that each of the Supervisory Defendants should have known of a substantial risk that Gay would sexually assault Franklin, much less that each defendant was subjectively aware of the risk and knowingly disregarded it. Franklin states that Sheriff Curry 'failed to promulgate, to adopt, to implement or to enforce policies, rules, or regulations to safeguard female inmates,' but she does not describe any of the policies that were in place, the sort of policies that should have been in place, or how those policies could have prevented Gay's harassment. Similarly, Franklin alleges the names and titles of the other Supervisory Defendants. . . but alleges nothing about the significance of their titles, their individual roles in the jail, their personal interactions or familiarity with Gay, their length of service, their management policies, or any other characteristics that would bear on whether they knew about but were deliberately indifferent to Gay's conduct and the risk he posed. . . From Franklin's allegations, a finder of fact could not even conclude that all of the Defendants were ever in the jail, much less that each of their individual actions constituted deliberate indifference to the risk Gay would abuse Franklin. Subjecting Appellants to the full 'panoply of expensive and time-consuming pretrial discovery devices,'. . . and forcing them to defend this action based on Franklin's inadequate allegations not only runs counter to the general rules of pleading, it also undermines qualified immunity's fundamental purpose of protecting 'all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law' from the costs of suit.")

AFL-CIO v. City of Miami, 637 F.3d 1178, 1186 (11th Cir. 2011) ("The plaintiffs have made conclusory statements that they were deprived of property without due process, but this is not even a 'formulaic recitation of the elements of a cause of action.'. . Nothing in the complaint–directly, inferentially, or otherwise–says how Florida's procedures for recovering wrongfully taken property violated due process, or that the plaintiffs even attempted to use those procedures. Nor do the plaintiffs allege that the defendants' pre-deprivation procedures, if they were even required, were somehow inadequate. Given the absence of any information in the complaint about a material element of their claim, the plaintiffs have failed to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.")

Randall v. Scott, 610 F.3d 701, 708 n.2, 709 (11th Cir. 2010) ("We now say explicitly what Keating implied: whatever requirements our heightened pleading standard once imposed have since been replaced by those of the Twombly-Iqbal plausibility standard. . . . Thus, like complaints in all other cases, complaints in § 1983 cases must now '"contain either direct or inferential allegations respecting all the material elements necessary to sustain a recovery under some viable legal theory."' . . . While Swann, GJR, and Danley reaffirm application of a heightened pleading standard for § 1983 cases involving defendants able to assert qualified immunity, we agree with Randall that those cases were effectively overturned by the Iqbal court. Pleadings for § 1983 cases involving defendants who are able to assert qualified immunity as a defense shall now be held to comply with the standards described in Iqbal.")

Harrison v. Benchmark Electronics Huntsville, Inc., 593 F.3d 1206, 1214, 1215 (11th Cir. 2010) ("The district court concluded that Harrison failed to plead his medical inquiry claim in his complaint, a determination Harrison contests on appeal. We only require that a plaintiff provide 'a short and plain statement of the claim showing that [he] is entitled to relief.' Fed.R.Civ.P. 8(a)(2). 'The point is to Agive the defendant fair notice of what the claim is and the grounds upon which it rests."'. . . Harrison satisfied our liberal pleading standard. His complaint alleged that BEHI questioned him about his seizures following a pre-employment drug test, and he claimed damages for these allegedly prohibited medical inquiries. Thus, BEHI had fair notice that Harrison sought relief under ' 12112(d)(2), and his allegations, which specifically referred to pre-employment medical inquiries, were more than speculative. . . To the extent that the district court concluded otherwise, it erred.")

Harper v. Lawrence County, Ala., 592 F.3d 1227, 1234, 1235 (11th Cir. 2010) ("Here, there are two main ways Plaintiff alleges Defendants knew of Harper's serious medical needs. First, Plaintiff claims that they 'had full knowledge that Harper was an alcoholic who would experience delirium tremens (DT's) due to alcohol withdrawal if left untreated,' because he had been arrested before and placed in the Lawrence County Jail on various alcohol-related charges. Compl. at 8. She also alleges that during the course of one or more of his prior arrests Harper 'informed the defendants that he had a history of seizures due to alcohol withdrawal.' Id. at 9. However, these allegations do not meet the Rule 8 standard, much less the heightened pleading standard. Plaintiff did not offer any facts to suggest why these Defendants in particular (a sheriff, two jail administrators, and two jailers) would know of Harper's specific medical history, nor did she offer any specific facts regarding Harper's past arrests. Moreover, even if those Defendants did know of Harper's history of alcoholism and/or past alcohol-related arrests, they would still have needed to know that Harper was in serious need of medical attention during the time period in question, April 24, 2007 to April 28, 2007. In our view, Plaintiff does not 'raise [her] right to relief above the speculative level' in this instance. Twombly, 550 U.S. at 555. Second, Plaintiff claims Defendants were aware of Harper's condition because of his symptoms and behavior at the jail. Specifically, Plaintiff alleges that several days after his initial incarceration Harper was hallucinating, slurring his words, physically weak, and incoherent. According to the Complaint, Reed and/or Robinson told both Taylor and Fike that Harper was displaying erratic and strange behavior. Compl. at 7-8. The Complaint also alleges that other inmates informed Reed and Robinson that Harper was acting strangely, losing his balance, and had urinated on himself. Id. at 9. Based on these allegations we hold that Plaintiff adequately alleged Reed and Robinson had 'actual knowledge' of the risk of serious harm to Harper if left untreated. However, the Complaint does not allege how the other three Defendants, Sheriff Gene Mitchell and administrators Kenneth Mitchell and Brown, could possibly have had such actual knowledge. Thus, the court should have dismissed the 'personal participation' claims as to those three Defendants based on qualified immunity, and we reverse the district court's order in that respect.").

Amnesty Intern., USA v. Battle, 559 F.3d 1170, 1179, 1180 (11th Cir. 2009) ("Since Leatherman, this court has determined that heightened pleading still applies where the defendants are individuals for whom qualified immunity may be available. . . .Here, the district court conflated the issues of satisfying the heightened pleading with the need to overcome qualified immunity. To satisfy even the heightened pleading standard for § 1983 claims, Amnesty need plead only 'some factual detail' from which the court may determine whether Defendants' alleged actions violated a clearly established constitutional right. . . The heightened pleading standard does not require a complaint to cite cases demonstrating that the defendant is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]he complaint makes clear Amnesty's allegation that its First and Fourteenth Amendment rights were violated because it was unable to have a successful protest rally and unable to pass out Amnesty literature as a result of Defendants' creation of a police cordon. These facts provide sufficient detail for Defendants to understand what alleged rights were violated (the right to hold a peaceful protest with an audience and the right to pass out leaflets) and which of their actions allegedly violated those rights (Defendants' actions ordering their subordinates to create a police cordon which interfered with the rally and the distribution of leaflets). These facts also provide enough information for the court to determine whether those facts indeed set out a violation of rights and whether those rights were clearly established when these incidents occurred.").

A.P. ex rel. Bazerman v. Feaver, 293 F. App'x 635, 2008 WL 3870697, at *10 (11th Cir. Aug. 21, 2008) ("While Rule 8 allows a plaintiff a great deal of latitude in the manner in which a complaint presents a claim, . . .this court has implemented more stringent pleading requirements in § 1983 actions in which qualified immunity is likely to be raised as a defense. . . . This heightened specificity is necessary so that the court has sufficient factual allegations to allow it to assess whether a defendant's actions violated a clearly established right. . . If it is impossible to make this determination from the face of the plaintiff's complaint, the purpose of the qualified immunity defense– shielding government officials from the demands of defending oneself from damages suits–may well be frustrated.").

Davis v. Coca Cola Bottling Co. Consol., 516 F.3d 955, 974 n.43 (11th Cir. 2008) ("We understand Twombly as a further articulation of the standard by which to evaluate the sufficiency of all claims brought pursuant to Rule 8(a). In that case, the Court retired the oft-cited standard that 'a complaint should not be dismissed for failure to state a claim unless it appears beyond a doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim which would entitle him to relief,' Conley v. Gibson, 355 U.S. 41, 45-46, 78 S.Ct. 99, 102, 2 L.Ed.2d 80 (1957), saying it 'is best forgotten as an incomplete, negative gloss on an accepted pleading standard: once a claim has been stated adequately, it may be supported by showing any set of facts consistent with the allegations in the complaint.' Twombly, 127 S.Ct. at 1969. The main Rule 8(a) standard now seems to be whether the 'allegations plausibly suggest[ ] ([and are] not merely consistent with)' a violation of the law.").

Weissman v. National Ass'n of Securities Dealers, Inc., 500 F.3d 1293, 1309 n.6 (11th Cir. 2007) (Tjoflat, J., dissenting) ("Although I believe Weissman's complaint is due to be dismissed on absolute immunity grounds under even the basic Rule 8 pleading standard, I would suggest that our explicit heightened pleading requirement for some § 1983 suits might properly be applied in the SRO [Self Regulating Organization] immunity context, as well. A few words about heightened pleading may be helpful here. The panel in Swann read the Supreme Court's decision in Leatherman as having abrogated two of our earlier decisions suggesting a broad application of the heightened pleading requirement in § 1983 cases. . . In describing the effect of Leatherman on our circuit's precedent, Swann purported to limit the application of heightened pleading to only those cases in which qualified immunity is a potential defense. . . To be sure, Leatherman abrogated our heightened pleading precedent to the extent that our cases applied the more stringent standard to claims against municipalities. I do not believe, however, that Leatherman precludes the application of a heightened pleading requirement in absolute immunity cases.").

Washington v. Albright, 814 F.Supp.2d 1317, 123, 1324 (M.D. Ala. 2011) (After setting out history of "heightened pleading standard" in Eleventh Circuit, court goes on : "Further muddying the waters, is the fact that decisions since Randall have not uniformly rejected heightened pleading in § 1983 cases. A number of courts within the Eleventh Circuit have relied upon Randall and held that there is no longer any heightened pleading standard for § 1983 claims against individuals entitled to qualified immunity. [collecting cases] However, at least one panel decision from the Eleventh Circuit decided after Randall makes no mention of it and employs the heightened pleading standard. See, e.g., Heflin v. Miami-Dade County, 393 F. App'x 658, 659-60 (11th Cir.2010). This Court is persuaded that the appropriate course is to follow the holding of Randall and reject heightened pleading. The Court notes that this may not be a case in which the applicable standard makes a difference. For the reasons set forth below, the Court finds that Washington's pleading fails to satisfy the pleading standards announced in Iqbal, Twombly, and their progeny. Logically, if the pleading is insufficient to me[e]t that lesser standard, it would also be insufficient under the heightened pleading standard which this Court declines to apply in this case.")

Pressley v. Madison, No. 2:08-CV-0157-RWS, 2009 WL 3878260, at *2, *3 (N.D. Ga. Nov. 17, 2009) ("Plaintiff sues Joel Robinson, a former Barrow County Sheriff, and three officials of the Barrow County Jail (the Jail)–Captain Mike Katsegianes, Sergeant M. Walker, and Officer Connor. ("m.Compl. & 3.) Plaintiff presents the following allegations. On January 2, 2007, she was transferred from state prison to the Jail, where Officer Connor removed her hijab in the presence of several men, in violation of Plaintiff's Muslim religious beliefs and practices. Officer Connor then told Plaintiff that 'she is not allowed to cover her hair in the jail, even for prayer.' Plaintiff claims that without her hij ab she cannot 'practice Islam through 5 daily obligatory prayers, for which her hair must be covered.' When Plaintiff grieved this alleged violation, Captain Katsegianes informed her that she did 'not have the right to wear anything that is or could be a safety or security issue.' Plaintiff's hij ab was not returned to her until she was transferred back to state prison on January 4, 2007. (Id. & IV.) Plaintiff alleges that the four named Defendants violated her rights under the Religious Land Use and Institutional Persons Act (RLUIPA), the First Amendment's Free Exercise Clause, and the Fourteenth Amendment's Equal Protection Clause. (Id.) Plaintiff seeks an injunction to prohibit Barrow County Jail from depriving Muslim women of their hij abs and also seeks several million dollars in damages. (Id. & V.) . . . . Court finds that Plaintiff has alleged a viable cause of action under § 1983 based on the deprivation of her hijab at the Barrow County Jail. That claim is ALLOWED TO PROCEED as in any other civil action. However, because Plaintiff has not set forth any action taken by Joel Robinson in violation of her legal rights, Mr. Robinson is DISMISSED from this action.").

Frye v. Escambia County Bd. of Educ., No. 08-0340-WS-N, 2009 WL 3336917, at *1 (S.D. Ala. Oct. 13, 2009) ("The plaintiff does not directly address this standard but instead insists the complaint satisfies Rule 8 as construed by the Supreme Court in Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937 (2009). . . The heightened pleading requirement, however, does not spring from Rule 8 but from the needs of individual governmental defendants for sufficient information to allow them to effectively assert qualified immunity (which is immunity from suit, not merely from judgment) at the outset of litigation. . . Although the Supreme Court has repeatedly questioned the imposition of pleading requirements in excess of those inherent in Rule 8, . . . the Eleventh Circuit continues to enforce its heightened pleading requirement. . .The plaintiff's invocation of Rule 8 is thus unresponsive to the defendants' challenge.").

Rhodes v. MacDonald, No. 4:09-CV-106 (CDL), 2009 WL 2997605, at *4 (M.D. Ga. Sept. 16, 2009) ("For a complaint to be facially plausible, the Court must be able 'to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged' based upon a review of the factual content pled by the Plaintiff. . . The factual allegations must be sufficient 'to raise a right to relief above the speculative level.' Bell Atl. Corp. v. Twombly, 550 U.S. 544, 555 (2007). Plaintiff's complaint is not plausible on its face. To the extent that it alleges any 'facts,' the Complaint does not connect those facts to any actual violation of Plaintiff's individual constitutional rights. Unlike in Alice in Wonderland, simply saying something is so does not make it so. The weakness of Plaintiff's claim certainly weighs heavily against judicial review of the deployment order, and in fact, would authorize dismissal of Plaintiff's complaint for failure to state a claim.").

Glenn v. Brumby, No. 1:08-CV-2360-RWS, 2009 WL 1849951, at *3 n. 2 (N.D. Ga. June 25, 2009) ("The Court notes that Defendants contend a higher pleading standard applies to § 1983 cases like the one before the Court, but Plaintiff is correct that the Eleventh Circuit has rejected such a pleading requirement and has clarified that to the extent that such a requirement still exists, it applies only in cases where qualified immunity is an available defense.")

Burge v. Ferguson, No. 8:07-cv-2217-T-23MSS, 2008 WL 5246306, at *3 (M.D. Fla. Dec. 16, 2008) ("Although controversial, the heightened pleading requirement permits a potentially immune defendant to frame a fact-specific qualified immunity defense at an early stage and enables the court to conduct the fact-specific inquiry contemplated by Saucier v. Katz, 533 U .S. 194 (2001). Absent a heightened pleading requirement, a meaningful Saucier inquiry is often impossible. Accordingly, some courts rejecting a heightened pleading requirement as inconsistent with Rule 8(a)'s notice pleading standard have adopted a rule that effectively reproduces the requirement. See, e.g., Thomas v. Independence Twp., 463 F.3d 285, 300-302 (3d Cir.2006); cf. Schultea v. Wood, 47 F.3d 1427, 1433-34 (5th Cir.1995).")

Pete's Towing Co. v. City of Tampa, Fla., No. 8:08-cv-209-T-23EAJ, 2008 WL 4791821, at 3 (M.D. Fla. Katz, 533 U.S. 194 (2001). Absent a heightened pleading requirement, a meaningful Saucier inquiry is often impossible. Accordingly, some courts rejecting a heightened pleading requirement as inconsistent with Rule 8(a)'s notice pleading standard have adopted a rule that effectively reproduces the requirement. See, e.g., Thomas v. Independence Twp., 463 F.3d 285, 300-302 (3d Cir.2006); cf. Schultea v. Wood, 47 F.3d 1427, 1433-34 (5th Cir.1995).").

Brown v. Pastrana, No. 08-20631-CIV., 2008 WL 4097615, at *5 n.2 (S.D. Fla. Sept. 4, 2008) ("The Jones v. Bock, Twombly and Erickson Courts have once again reiterated, as the Supreme Court unanimously held in Leatherman, Swierkiewicz, and Hill, that adopting a different and more onerous pleading standard in particular types of cases should be done through established rulemaking procedures, and not on a case-by-case basis by the courts. . . . Some district courts in the Eleventh Circuit continue to apply a 'heightened pleading' standard, justifying its use on the flawed premise that the Supreme Court specifically ruled that district courts may not impose a heightened pleading requirement for claims pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 against municipal entities but declined to reach the issue of whether a similar holding was warranted in such cases against individual government entities. . . The 'flaw' in this logic is the fact that the Supreme Court has not indicated that qualified immunity might warrant an exception to the general approach, the explicit disclaimer of a heightened pleading standard in Twombly, and Erickson's reversal of the Tenth Circuit's use of a heightened pleading standard in case against individual state actors who might be entitled to qualified immunity.")

Fleming v. Barber, No. 3:07cv279/MCR/MD, 2008 WL 2790194, at *3 (N.D. Fla. July 17, 2008) ("The Supreme Court has stated that a heightened pleading standard–which requires the facts of a claim to be alleged with some specificity–contravenes the notice pleading requirements set forth in Fed.R.Civ.P. 8. . . . Nonetheless, with respect to claims brought pursuant to § 1983, this circuit has recognized that a heightened pleading requirement in fact is applicable. . . In particular, this circuit has consistently held that the decision in Leatherman does not apply to defendants who may be entitled to qualified immunity . . . In such cases, 'more than mere conclusory notice pleading is required.... [A] complaint will be dismissed as insufficient where the allegations it contains are vague and conclusory.'")

Walling v. City of Largo 2008 WL 2782687, at *4 (M.D. Fla. July 16, 2008) ("Plaintiff alleges that Bell Atlantic raises a clear question of the Eleventh Circuit's position with regard to heightened pleading standards and that this question has not been addressed by the Eleventh Circuit subsequent to the Bell Atlantic ruling. . . Plaintiff relies primarily on Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 12(b)(6) as support for his argument that he has plead sufficient facts to state a claim. . . . This Court finds that it is not clear that the Eleventh Circuit has upheld a heightened pleading requirement for Section 1983 claims. Thus, this Court finds a heightened pleading standard an improper lense through which to analyze the First Amended Complaint.")

Bouyer v. Rounsoville, No. 1:08-CV-0856-RWS, 2008 WL 2787484, at *4 (N.D. Ga. July 15, 2008) ("Plaintiff's conclusory allegations regarding the City's policy fail to satisfy the pleading requirements under Twombly. Reyes v. City of Miami Beach, No. 07-22680-CIV, 2008 W.L. 686958, at *14 (S .D. Fla. March 13, 2008).")

Hawkins v. Eslinger, No. 6:07-cv-1261-Orl-19GJK, 2008 WL 2074409, at *1 n.4 (M.D. Fla. May 15, 2008) ("Plaintiff relies heavily on two cases from the Second Circuit which have rejected the position that 'class of one' claims are subject to a heightened pleading requirement. . . Although the Eleventh Circuit has not explicitly adopted a heightened pleading requirement, it does require a plaintiff to include 'key factual details' in alleging the existence of a similarly-situated person. . . To the extent the Second Circuit has determined otherwise, the Court must disregard its reasoning in favor of binding case law from the Eleventh Circuit.").

I. Note: Motion to Dismiss v. Summary Judgment Standard

SUPREME COURT

Sause v. Bauer, 138 S. Ct. 2561, 2563 (2018) (per curiam) ("As the case comes before us, it is unclear whether the police officers were in petitioner's apartment at the time in question based on her consent, whether they had some other ground consistent with the Fourth Amendment for entering and remaining there, or whether their entry or continued presence was unlawful. Petitioner's complaint contains no express allegations on these matters. Nor does her complaint state what, if anything, the officers wanted her to do at the time when she was allegedly told to stop praying. Without knowing the answers to these questions, it is impossible to analyze petitioner's free exercise claim. In considering the defendants' motion to dismiss, the District Court was required to interpret the pro se complaint liberally, and when the complaint is read that way, it may be understood to state Fourth Amendment claims that could not properly be dismissed for failure to state a claim. We appreciate that petitioner elected on appeal to raise only a First Amendment argument and not to pursue an independent Fourth Amendment claim, but under the circumstances, the First Amendment claim demanded consideration of the ground on which the officers were present in the apartment and the nature of any legitimate law enforcement interests that might have justified an order to stop praying at the specific time in question. Without considering these matters, neither the free exercise issue nor the officers' entitlement to qualified immunity can be resolved. Thus, petitioner's choice to abandon her Fourth Amendment claim on appeal did not obviate the need to address these matters.")

D.C. CIRCUIT

Moore v. Hartman, 388 F.3d 871, 876 (D.C. Cir. 2004) ("[A]lthough the inspectors conceded in the appeal from their motion to dismiss that Moore's claim stated a violation of clearly established law, they are free to assert qualified immunity now: the 'legally relevant factors bearing upon the [qualified immunity] question will be different on summary judgment than on an earlier motion to dismiss,' because the court now conducts the immunity inquiry based on 'the evidence before it,' rather than the pleadings."), rev'd on other grounds, 126 S. Ct. 1695 (2006).

FIRST CIRCUIT

Velez-Rivera v. Agosto-Alicea, 437 F.3d 145, 151 (1st Cir. 2006) ("Plaintiffs allege that the district court applied the heightened pleading standard in two separate instances. First, when it granted summary judgment for Agosto because Pena had failed to allege any material fact showing 'deliberate indifference,' an element of 'supervisory liability.'. . Second, when the district court found that Agosto was protected under the doctrine of qualified immunity because his actions with regard to Velez were 'objectively reasonable.' We see no evidence that the heightened pleading standard was applied. Under the overruled standard, the district court would have required heightened specificity at the pleading stage, which did not occur in this case. By contrast, the district court correctly applied the appropriate standard of review to defendants' summary judgment motion when it found no genuine issue as to any material fact. The court's analysis of supervisory liability and qualified immunity relied upon the appropriate standards because, although specificity is not required at the pleading stage, it is required at the summary judgment stage. Swierkiewicz specifically distinguished the two doctrines, explaining that '[t]his simplified notice pleading standard relies on liberal discovery rules and summary judgment motions to define disputed facts and issues and to dispose of unmeritorious claims.' . . In other words, notice pleading is sufficient for a claim to survive a motion to dismiss, but plaintiffs bear a heavier burden at the summary judgment stage.").

Jenkins v. City of Taunton, No. CV 15-10003-MBB, 2018 WL 326462, at *5 (D. Mass. Jan. 8, 2018) ("[A]lthough mindful that qualified immunity is an immunity from suit as well as monetary damages, the denial of qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage does not foreclose the responding officers from raising the defense in a post-trial motion based on the facts in evidence at trial. . . Thus, the responding officers retain the ability to move for judgment as a matter of law before the case is submitted to the jury and after a verdict based on qualified immunity in order to avoid any monetary damages. . . ' "[O]nce trial has been had, the availability of official immunity"' is ascertained based on ' "the trial record, not the pleadings nor the summary judgment record."'")

Garcia v. Does, 779 F.3d 84, 93-97 (2d Cir. 2015) ("Plaintiffs were part of a large group that had gathered on a vehicular ramp approaching the Bridge and on the street behind it, locations generally reserved for vehicular traffic, making it impossible for vehicles to proceed. They do not challenge the conclusion that it would be reasonable for a police officer to infer that plaintiffs either intended to block traffic on the Bridge as part of their protest, or at a minimum were aware of a 'substantial and unjustifiable risk' that they were doing so. . . Rather, they contend that reasonable officers in defendants' position would also have been aware, or should have been aware, that plaintiffs had a reasonable belief that they had been authorized to cross the Bridge on the vehicular roadway, based on the fact that police officers who had been blocking their progress subsequently retreated and 'led the march across the bridge,' which they construed as 'an actual and apparent grant of permission to follow.'. . We are not concerned with whether plaintiffs' asserted belief that the officers' behavior had given them implied permission to violate traffic laws otherwise banning pedestrians from the roadway would constitute a defense to the charge of disorderly conduct; that issue would be presented to a court adjudicating the criminal charges against plaintiffs. Instead, we are faced with the quite separate question of whether any such defense was so clearly established as a matter of law, and whether the facts establishing that defense were so clearly apparent to the officers on the scene as a matter of fact, that any reasonable officer would have appreciated that there was no legal basis for arresting plaintiffs. . .We cannot answer that question in the affirmative. . . .It cannot be said that the officers here disregarded known facts clearly establishing a defense. In the confused and boisterous situation confronting the officers, the police were aware that the demonstrators were blocking the roadway in violation of § 240.20(5). They were also certainly aware that no official had expressly authorized the protesters to cross the Bridge via the roadway. To the contrary, the officers would have known that a police official had attempted to advise the protestors through a bullhorn that they were required to disperse. While reasonable officers might perhaps have recognized that much or most of the crowd would be unable to hear the warning due to the noise created by the chanting protesters, it was also apparent that the front rank of demonstrators who presumably were able to hear exhibited no signs of dispersing. The Complaint and videotapes are devoid of any evidence that any police officer made any gesture or spoke any word that unambiguously authorized the protesters to continue to block traffic, and indeed the Complaint does not allege that any of the plaintiffs observed any such gesture. . . . Most importantly, no plaintiff alleges in the Complaint that he or she heard any statement from any police officer authorizing the protestors to cross the Bridge via the vehicular roadway, or observed any unambiguous indication from any police officer inviting the protesters to cross the Bridge in that manner. Nor is any such statement or gesture recorded in the videotapes submitted by the parties and incorporated into the Complaint by reference. Indeed, most of the plaintiffs allege that they did not see anything the police officers did, and simply 'followed the march' as it proceeded across the Bridge. . . Plaintiffs nevertheless insist that, by ceasing to block the demonstrators' advance and instead turning and walking toward the Brooklyn side of the Bridge, the officers implicitly gave them permission to proceed. That action, however, is inherently ambiguous. It is certainly true that, by removing themselves from the demonstrators' path, police 'allowed' the protesters to advance, in the sense that they stopped physically blocking them. But such an action does not convey, implicitly or explicitly, an invitation to 'go ahead.' The failure of a thin line of police officers to physically impede a large group that—based on the actions of those immediately on the front line—would reasonably be understood to be intent on advancing across the Bridge even absent permission does not suggest that those officers understood that the conduct they had ceased physically blocking was lawful, or had been affirmatively authorized by the police. . .Even conceding that a majority of police officers would not reasonably have understood the retreat as inviting the demonstrators to enter the roadway, plaintiffs suggest that we cannot dismiss the Complaint so long as any officer who participated in the arrests may reasonably have anticipated some protestors to reasonably interpret it as such. The essential flaw in plaintiffs' logic, and in that of the prior panel opinion, is the extent to which it requires police officers to engage in an essentially speculative inquiry into the potential state of mind of (at least some of) the demonstrators. Neither the law of probable cause nor the law of qualified immunity requires such speculation. Whether or not a suspect ultimately turns out to have a defense, or even whether a reasonable officer might have some idea that such a defense could exist, is not the question. . . An officer still has probable cause to arrest, and certainly is entitled to qualified immunity, so long as any such defense rests on facts that are so unclear, or a legal theory that is not so clearly established, that it cannot be said that any reasonable officer would understand that an arrest under the circumstances would be unlawful. . . On the face of the Complaint, the officers were confronted with ambiguities of fact and law. As a matter of fact, the most that is plausibly alleged by the Complaint and the supporting materials is that the police, having already permitted some minor traffic violations along the marchers' route, and after first attempting to block the protesters from obstructing the vehicular roadway, retreated before the demonstrators in a way that some of the demonstrators may have interpreted as affirmatively permitting their advance. Whether or not such an interpretation was reasonable on their part, it cannot be said that the police's behavior was anything more than—at best for plaintiffs—ambiguous, or that a reasonable officer would necessarily have understood that the demonstrators would reasonably interpret the retreat as permission to use the roadway. As a matter of law, Cox establishes that, under some circumstances, demonstrators or others who have been advised by the police that their behavior is lawful may not be punished for that behavior. The extent of that principle is less than clear, and we need not decide here how far it might extend. It is enough to say that no clearly established law would make it 'clear to a reasonable officer,'. . .that it would be unlawful to arrest individuals who were in prima facie violation of a straightforward statutory prohibition because those individuals may have believed, based on inferences drawn from ambiguous behavior by the police, that they were authorized to violate the statute. . . .Finally, plaintiffs argue that the Complaint may not be dismissed on the pleadings on qualified immunity grounds. It is certainly true that motions to dismiss a plaintiff's complaint under Rule 12(b)(6) on the basis of an affirmative defense will generally face a difficult road. . . .But that does not mean that qualified immunity can never be established at the pleading stage. To the contrary, every case must be assessed on the specific facts alleged in the complaint. The Supreme Court has made clear that qualified immunity can be established by the facts alleged in a complaint, see Wood v. Moss, —— U.S. ——, 134 S.Ct. 2056 (2014), and indeed, because qualified immunity protects officials not merely from liability but from litigation, that the issue should be resolved when possible on a motion to dismiss, 'before the commencement of discovery,'. . . to avoid subjecting public officials to time consuming and expensive discovery procedures. In this case, the facts alleged in the Complaint, and those depicted in the videos, do not bear out plaintiffs' legal conclusion that the officers' actions constituted 'an actual and apparent grant of permission' to the demonstrators to utilize the roadway. . . Still less do those facts plausibly describe a situation in which reasonable officers would have clearly understood that their actions were interpreted by the demonstrators as a grant of permission, such that arresting the demonstrators would violate clearly established law. Accordingly, dismissal of the Complaint is required.")

Velez v. Levy, 401 F.3d 75, 101 (2d Cir. 2005) ("We emphasize that this qualified immunity determination is made in view of the procedural posture of this case. Though Levy is not, as a matter of law, entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings, a factual basis for qualified immunity may arise as the proceedings develop. It may be, after discovery, that Velez cannot adduce the facts necessary to show that Levy based his actions 'on irrational and non legitimate considerations and pressures and having no rational [connection] to a legitimate state purpose,' as she alleges in her complaint. But the plaintiff's assertions that they were so based are not merely conclusory, as can be seen from the Board of Education's findings, attached to the complaint, which state that the Chancellor's decision was 'arbitrary and capricious' and 'irrational,' given that the investigation was 'grossly flawed' and 'could not rationally be relied upon.' At this stage of the case, we therefore cannot say that, as to the procedural due process claim, qualified immunity based on the Chancellor's good faith is appropriate.").

McKenna v. Wright, 386 F.3d 432, 436 (2d Cir. 2004) ("[W]e see no reason why even a traditional qualified immunity defense may not be asserted on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion as long as the defense is based on facts appearing on the face of the complaint. . . . Of course, a defendant presenting an immunity defense on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion instead of a motion for summary judgment must accept the more stringent standard applicable to this procedural route. Not only must the facts supporting the defense appear on the face of the complaint, . . . but, as with all Rule 12(b)(6) motions, the motion may be granted only where 'it appears beyond doubt that the plaintiff can prove no set of facts in support of his claim that would entitle him to relief.'. . Thus, the plaintiff is entitled to all reasonable inferences from the facts alleged, not only those that support his claim, but also those that defeat the immunity defense. On the other hand, with a motion for summary judgment adequately supported by affidavits, the party opposing the motion cannot rely on allegations in the complaint, but must counter the movant's affidavits with specific facts showing the existence of genuine issues warranting a trial. . . A party endeavoring to defeat a lawsuit by a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim faces a 'higher burden' than a party proceeding on a motion for summary judgment.").

Butler v. Hesch, No. 1:16-CV-1540, 2018 WL 922187, at *18 (N.D.N.Y. Feb. 15, 2018) ("On a motion to dismiss, however, a qualified immunity defense based on arguable probable cause ' "faces a formidable hurdle ..." and is usually not successful.' Field Day, LLC v. Cnty. of Suffolk, 463 F.3d 167, 191-92 (2d Cir. 2006) (quoting McKenna v. Wright, 386 F.3d 432, 434 (2d Cir. 2004)). This case is no exception. In support of qualified immunity, Defendants merely summarize their version of the facts and assert that their actions were objectively reasonably and not patently incompetent. At the summary judgment stage, they will have the opportunity to try to demonstrate this by submitting evidence showing that reasonably competent officers in their situation could have at least disagreed on whether probable cause existed. Based solely on the complaint, however, the Court cannot conclude that this must have been the case.")

Marlin v. City of New York, No. 15 CI V. 2235 (CM), 2016 WL 4939371, at *1, *6, *16-17 (S.D.N.Y. Sept. 7, 2016) ("Because Defendants have also brought a motion for summary judgment dismissing the complaint on the ground of qualified immunity, the Plaintiff has been deposed, in order to fully flesh out his story. To the extent that the deposition testimony elicited Plaintiff's version of the events pleaded in the FAC, it is deemed true for purposes of this pre-answer motion for summary judgment. Stephenson v. John Doe 332 F.3d 68 (2d Cir. 2003); see Individual Practices and Procedures for Judge McMahon, Rule IV.E.3. It seems that a number of questions were put at the deposition seeking to undermine the truth of what Plaintiff asserted. That is all very well and good, but as will be discussed below, it is irrelevant to a qualified immunity motion made at this early stage of proceedings. At this pre-answer stage, a court considering a motion for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity properly takes the plaintiff's story as true and asks whether a reasonable police officer standing in the shoes of each of the defendants could have thought that his actions, as described by the plaintiff, were constitutionally compliant. This is not the time for asserting that Plaintiff's story is not true, or that things did not happen as Plaintiff described them, or for establishing that the police officers did nothing wrong (which the City has a lamentable habit of confusing with qualified immunity). . . . In deciding the issue of qualified immunity, 'the defendants' version of the facts is absolutely irrelevant.' . . Accordingly, this Court does not take testimony from defendants or otherwise consider their version of events. . . Pursuant to this Court's Individual Rules, when any defendant raises a qualified immunity defense, I insist that the plaintiff amplify the 'short, plain statement' in the complaint with testimony that fully fleshes out his story. For purposes of this aspect of the motion (which is really a motion for summary judgment), the Court relies on evidence in the FAC as amplified by Plaintiff's deposition testimony. Time and time again, this Court finds that municipal defendants conflate qualified immunity with arguments relating to the merits of a claim. In many cases, defendants file a notice of motion for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity and proceed to make arguments for dismissal of Plaintiff's claims that have nothing to do with qualified immunity. For instance, defendants may argue that the plaintiff fails to plead facts sufficient to make out a constitutional violation, or that things did not happen in quite the way the Plaintiff says they did. The instant motion raising the qualified immunity defense is no exception. Thus, the Court finds it necessary to remind Defendants that an official is often entitled to dismissal or summary judgment 'not because of qualified immunity, but because he did nothing wrong.'. . And indeed, as we shall see, only one of plaintiff's many claims is dismissible on the ground of qualified immunity. . . .In the excessive force context, the analysis required to determine whether an officer deserves qualified immunity converges with the analysis used to determine whether force was excessive under the Fourth Amendment: both inquiries hinge on a determination of objective reasonableness. . . Both analyses require asking: 'Whether in the particular circumstances faced by the officer, a reasonable officer would believe that the force was lawful.'. .In cases involving the 'sometimes hazy border between excessive and acceptable force,' it may be appropriate to afford the defendants an 'extra layer of protection.'. . This is not one of those 'hazy' cases. No reasonable officer could possibly believe that he needed to use so much force to subdue a non-resisting arrestee as to dislocate and fracture his elbow, causing long-lasting damage. Taking Plaintiff's account of events as true, Defendants' pre-answer motion for summary judgment on the ground of qualified immunity is denied.")

Higginbotham v. City of New York, 105 F.Supp.3d 369, 375 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("On a motion to dismiss. . . a qualified immunity defense based on arguable probable cause ' "faces a formidable hurdle ..." and is usually not successful.' Field Day, LLC v. Cnty. of Suffolk, 463 F.3d 167, 191–92 (2d Cir.2006) (quoting McKenna v. Wright, 386 F.3d 432, 434 (2d Cir.2004)). This case is no exception. In support of qualified immunity, the defendants merely summarize their version of the facts and assert that 'the officers were objectively reasonable and patently not incompetent.'. . At the summary judgment stage, they will have the opportunity to try to demonstrate this by submitting evidence showing that reasonably competent officers in their situation could have at least disagreed on whether probable cause existed. Based solely on the complaint, however, the Court cannot conclude that this must have been the case. Because the complaint plausibly alleges that there was no probable cause to arrest Higginbotham for a violation of any of the four statutes suggested by the defendants, and because the defendants are not at this stage entitled to qualified immunity, Higginbotham has adequately stated a section 1983 false arrest claim.")

But see Higginbotham v. Sylvester, No. 14-CV-8549 (PKC), 2016 WL 6496253, at *3–5 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 2, 2016) ("All fact discovery has been completed and the determination of whether probable cause existed is ripe for determination. . . The summary judgment record includes the size of Higginbotham and his camera, the dimensions of the phone booth, and a visual depiction of the crowd surrounding the phone booth. The Court concludes that probable cause existed to arrest Higginbotham pursuant to New York Penal Law §§ 120.20. . . The undisputed facts surrounding Higginbotham's ascent of the phone booth demonstrate that a person of reasonable caution would infer that Higginbotham acted recklessly in creating a substantial risk of serious physical injury to another person. It can reasonably be inferred that Higginbotham was aware of the risk of climbing atop the phone booth based on the fact that he was only able to do so by first climbing on top of police barricades. . . Higginbotham was also aware of the large crowd that was tightly packed around the phone booth in question when he climbed to the top of it. . . Indeed, the video recording and pictures of Higginbotham atop the phone booth show that protestors and other camerapersons stood directly below Higginbotham while he filmed from above. . . Nevertheless, Higginbotham climbed more than seven feet above the tightly-packed crowd and filmed the protest, all while balancing a 30-pound camera on his shoulder. . . And because Higginbotham had climbed atop of the phone booth once before, he knew that the roof was not flat, but curved. . . Based on Higginbotham's position above the crowd atop a phone booth with a curved roof, probable cause existed for a reasonable person to believe that Higginbotham consciously disregarded the risk of losing his balance and falling or dropping his camera from more than seven feet in the air. . . .Because the Court concludes that there was probable cause for Higginbotham's arrest, 'a fortiori, [defendants] would be entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.'. . However, even if probable cause was lacking, defendants would nevertheless be entitled to qualified immunity. Officers are entitled to qualified immunity for false arrest claims if they can establish that they had '"arguable probable cause" to arrest the plaintiff.'. . Here, the evidence is sufficient to support a finding of arguable probable cause to arrest Higginbotham pursuant to New York Penal Law § 120.20. That is to say, it was objectively reasonable for the arresting officers to believe that probable cause existed, or at the very least, for officers of reasonable competence to disagree on whether probable cause existed.")

Bonilla v. City of York, No. 1:14-CV-2238, 2015 WL 1525483, at *7 (M.D. Pa. Apr. 2, 2015) ("The present case is one of the 'vast majority of cases' in which a determination of qualified immunity is inappropriate at the pleading stage. When viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, the complaint alleges a plausible violation of Bonilla's Fourth Amendment rights through the use of excessive force. As this court has previously stated, 'the protections of the Fourth Amendment are sufficiently clear that [the officers] should have known that shooting [the decedent] to death violated those protections.' Williams, 30 F.Supp.3d at 314. The question therefore becomes, once again, whether the officer responsible for firing the fatal shot was objectively reasonable in doing so. Because there are unresolved issues of historical fact material to the reasonableness of Officer Roosen's and Officer Jordan's actions, including if and when they knew Bonilla was unarmed or had surrendered, it is premature at the motion to dismiss stage for the court to determine that either Officer Roosen or Officer Jordan is entitled to qualified immunity as a matter of law.)

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Cloaninger ex rel. Estate of Cloaninger v. McDevitt, 555 F.3d 324, 331 (4th Cir. 2009) ("The procedural framework for evaluating a claim of qualified immunityis therefore clear: when the defendant in a § 1983 action raises a qualified immunity defense, the court ordinarily assesses whether the plaintiff's complaint states sufficient factual allegations that, if true, show a violation of clearly established constitutional rights. To do so, the plaintiff's complaint must allege conduct a reasonable officer would know to be unlawful. However, when there has been discovery and the defendants challenge through a motion for summary judgment the sufficiency of the plaintiff's evidence to support the allegations of his complaint, including his description of their conduct, an evaluation of the complaint's sufficiency is unnecessary and may unduly prolong the defendants' entanglement in litigation if the court can determine that the plaintiff's evidence does not support his allegations. In that circumstance, the familiar standard for summary judgment under Rule 56 applies.").

Quigley v. City of Huntington, W. Virginia, No. 3:17-CV-01906, 2017 WL 4998647, at *6 (S.D.W. Va. Nov. 2, 2017) ("The United States Supreme Court has made clear that a ruling on qualified immunity should be made early in the proceedings. . . Qualified immunity acts 'as an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability.'. . Therefore, the entitlement to the immunity is 'effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial.'. .But where qualified immunity is presented in a Rule 12(b)(6) motion, 'the defense faces a formidable hurdle and is usually not successful.'. . Only if the plaintiff fails to state a plausible claim on its face, may a Court dismiss a claim under Rule 12(b)(6). . . But the Court will not dismiss a complaint where the plaintiff supplies sufficient detail regarding the claim to demonstrate a 'more-than-conceivable chance of success on the merits.'. . Applying that standard to this case, it must be apparent on the face of the complaint that the officer is entitled to qualified immunity. But, from the facts alleged, Plaintiff could plausibly demonstrate the officer violated a clearly established right, and thus is not entitled to the protective cloaking of qualified immunity, at this stage. This does not mean, however, that Plaintiff's objection is correct. Plaintiff's contention that qualified immunity should be denied as a matter of law fails to persuade this Court. Consistent with the applicable standard for a motion to dismiss, this Court has assumed the factual allegations in Plaintiff's complaint are true. To rule, as Plaintiff wants, that, based upon that assumption of truth, the officer is stripped of his qualified immunity protection would be a fool's errand. That simply would not comport with the sound reasoning and judgment that is required of this Court.").

Ristow v. Hansen, No. 17-50121, 2018 WL 671150, ___ n.12 (5th Cir. Feb. 1, 2018) (not reported) ("Ristow insists that the officers should not be allowed to raise a qualified immunity defense in their motion to dismiss, but instead must wait to raise that defense until they file their answer. We have previously urged that '[q]ualified immunity questions should be resolved "at the earliest possible stage in litigation."'. . According to this principle, the district court was correct in addressing the officers' claims to qualified immunity at this stage in the litigation. See, e.g., Turner v. Lieutenant Driver, 848 F.3d 678, 683 (5th Cir. 2017) (addressing qualified immunity defense raised in a motion to dismiss).")

Castillo v. City of Weslaco, 369 F.3d 504, 506, 507 (5th Cir. 2004) ("The Supreme Court has recognized that the second step of the Harlow test is different at the summary judgment stage than it is when the defendant asserts qualified immunity after the initial pleadings. [citing Behrens] 'At the earlier stage, it is the defendant's conduct as alleged in the complaint that is scrutinized....' . . . On summary judgment, 'the plaintiff can no longer rest on the pleadings' and the court must look 'to the evidence before it (in the light most favorable to the plaintiff) in conducting the Harlow inquiry.' . . . Consequently, the court must highlight evidence that, if interpreted in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, identifies conduct by the defendant that violated clearly established law. . . By outlining this factual scenario the court does not make a determination that the alleged conduct occurred. Rather, it concludes that there is evidence in the record that, when interpreted in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, establishes conduct by the defendant that violated clearly established law. . . Ordinarily the district court in denying the summary judgment motion will outline 'the factual scenario it believes emerges from viewing the summary judgment evidence in the light most favorable' to the plaintiff. . . It will also highlight the evidence in the record supporting its conclusions, and it will determine whether the defendant's conduct, as outlined in the factual scenario, was 'objectively reasonable' in light of the relevant clearly established law. . . In cases where the district court failed to outline the relevant factual scenario and the evidence in the record establishing the relevant conduct, the Supreme Court has authorized 'the court of appeals [to] undertake a cumbersome review of the record to determine what facts the district court, in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, likely assumed.'. . We, however, have determined that there is another option in these situations. In certain cases, rather than combing through the record ourselves and concluding what factual scenario the district court likely assumed in applying the Harlow test, we will remand to the district court so that it can outline the factual scenario it assumed in making its decision. . . Although we are not required to make such a remand, in some cases it may provide a 'more efficient alternative.' . . In this case, the district court did not outline the factual scenario it assumed in construing the summary judgment evidence in the light most favorable to the Officers. In fact, it appears that it rested its ruling solely on the allegations made by the Officers in their Third Amended Complaint. This would be improper in light of the Supreme Court's instructions in Behrens. Considering it is not clear that the district court assumed a factual scenario supported by summary judgment evidence in applying the Harlow test, and if it did, what that factual scenario is, the more 'efficient alternative' in this case is to remand to the district court for it to outline the factual scenario it assumed in making its decision."), on remand to Castillo v. City of Weslaco, 2004 WL 2402439 (S.D. Tex. Aug. 10, 2004), vacated and remanded, 388 F.3d 464 (5th Cir. 2004).

Alfred v. Collins, No. Civ.A. H-03-2904, 2006 WL 492355, at *9 n.6 (S.D. Tex. Feb. 28, 2006) ("There is an implicit divergence of authority in this Circuit about the procedure for assessing the first prong of a qualified immunity defense in response to a summary judgment motion. Many appellate panels state that the issue is whether the plaintiff has 'alleged' facts establishing a constitutional violation, thus suggesting that the district court should not consider uncontroverted evidence presented by a defendant in the summary judgment motion. The Linbrugger case is the only case the Court can locate in which the issue is addressed. It is possible that the terminology focusing on what the plaintiff 'alleges' stems from the early practice that qualified immunity would be addressed on motions to dismiss. 'Qualified immunity is Aan entitlement not to stand trial or face the other burdens of litigation." ' . . Courts are to make the qualified immunity analysis 'early in the proceedings so that the costs and expenses of trial are avoided where the defense is dispositive.'. . Nevertheless, as a practical matter, defendants often, in an effort to develop the facts in the hopes of obtaining favorable rulings on the second qualified immunity prong, willingly engage in discovery and then seek qualified immunity rulings through summary judgment motions.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Osberry v. Slusher, No. 17-4242, 2018 WL 4360979, at *3-4 (6th Cir. Sept. 13, 2018) (not reported) ("[T]he Officers—not Osberry—filed the motion for judgment on the pleadings. We review de novo a judgment on the pleadings, using the same standard as a motion to dismiss under Rule 12(b)(6). . . This means that 'all well-pleaded material allegations of the pleadings of the opposing party must be taken as true.'. . Here, Osberry is the party opposing the motion—so we construe the complaint in the light most favorable to Osberry, accept her allegations as true, and draw all reasonable inferences in her favor. . . In contrast, we do not accept the Officers' allegations as true. But at oral argument, the Officers asked us to accept some allegations in the answer as true because Osberry's complaint fails to contradict all the Officers' counter-allegations. For example, Osberry's complaint is silent on whether there was an 'active crime scene'—which the Officers first raised in their answer. The Officers' argument lacks any merit. Under Rule 7(A), a 'plaintiff is not required to reply to affirmative defenses or new matter appearing in the answer.'. . And under Rule 8(b)(6), where new allegations are in a pleading to which no responsive pleading is required, the court must consider the new allegations as denied. . . In other words, because Osberry did not have to respond to the Officers' answer, we must assume that Osberry denies any new allegations in the answer. And when considering the Officers' motion, we rely on the general Rule 12 standard. . . .Here, our review of the video tracks the district court's finding that the video does not 'so blatantly and conclusively contradict' the allegations in the complaint that 'no reasonable jury could find in [Osberry's] favor.'. . For example, the video does not conclusively show that Osberry resisted arrest, hit the Officers, or that she—and not the Officers—provoked the brief scuffle. Likewise, the video does not necessarily show an 'active crime scene' or 'a barricaded subject.' There are no police vehicles, no caution tape, and no blockades or barriers visible in the video that would suggest that Osberry was in an active crime scene. Indeed, the presence of other individuals and vehicles, including several people riding bicycles nearby, would suggest the opposite. And while the presence of many police officers may suggest an ongoing investigation, as could Officer Frysinger instructing Osberry that 'you need to leave this is a crime scene,' these facts alone do not 'utterly discredit' Osberry's version of the arrest. In sum, at this stage, we can rely on the well-pleaded allegations in the complaint and leave further evaluation of the video to either the district court at summary judgment or the jury at trial. This is consistent with our previous warnings 'that it is generally inappropriate for a district court to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity.'. . Instead, we clarified that '[a]lthough an officer's entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point, that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.'. . This is especially true where, as is the case here, 'the fact-intensive nature of the applicable tests make it "difficult for a defendant to claim qualified immunity on the pleadings before discovery."'")

Osberry v. Slusher, No. 17-4242, 2018 WL 4360979, at *3 n.2 (6th Cir. Sept. 13, 2018) (not reported) ("Our ability to consider video evidence at the pleading stage apparently finds its roots in Rule 10(c), which instructs that '[a] copy of a written instrument that is an exhibit to a pleading is a part of the pleading for all purposes.' Fed. R. Civ. P. 10(c) (emphasis added). See also Weiner v. Klais & Co., 108 F.3d 86, 89 (6th Cir. 1997) (explaining that Rule 10(c) allows a court to consider 'certain pertinent documents' as part of the pleadings); Brownmark Films, LLC v.

Comedy Partners, 682 F.3d 687, 691 (7th Cir. 2012) (explaining that it would make 'eminently good sense' to extend the Rule 10(c) incorporation-by-reference doctrine to videos). This case, however, does not require us to determine the appropriateness (or limits) of reviewing videos under Rule 10 and Rule 12. See, e.g., Aimee Brown, Comment, Pleading in Technicolor: When Can Litigants Incorporate Audiovisual Works Into Their Complaints?, 80 U. Chi. L. Rev. 1269, 1278–1306 (2013).")

Wesley v. Campbell, 779 F.3d 421, 428 (6th Cir. 2015) (Wesley II) ("Before proceeding to the merits of the motion to dismiss, we note a critical threshold error in the district court's opinion. Instead of the 'plausibility' standard our precedent clearly requires, the district court improperly held Wesley to a novel and significantly higher standard. The district court determined—indeed, emphasized—that Wesley was required to make 'a substantial showing that the defendant stated a deliberate falsehood or showed reckless disregard for the truth' in order to survive Rule 12 dismissal. . . Such a 'substantial' pleading burden at the Rule 12 stage is plainly inappropriate in light of Iqbal and Twombly—cases that the district court cited but failed to apply—as well as this circuit's settled precedent. The district court's error apparently stems from its reliance on Vakilian v. Shaw, 335 F.3d 509, 517 (6th Cir.2003), a case that does speak of the 'substantial showing' plaintiffs must make when faced with dismissal. Vakilian, however, is a summary judgment case, as is every other case cited by the district court in support of its 'substantial showing' standard. . . Other than the district court's own decision, no published opinion within the Sixth Circuit has ever imported Vakilian's 'substantial showing' language into the Rule 12 context. At oral argument before this court, Rigney conceded that Vakilian's 'substantial showing' standard was inappropriate at the Rule 12(b)(6) stage. We agree. Moreover, review of the pleadings and applicable case law leaves us convinced that Wesley has satisfied his initial pleading burden.")

Hoskins v. Knox County, Kentucky, No. CV 17-84-DLB-HAI, 2018 WL 1352163, at *19–20 (E.D. Ky. Mar. 15, 2018) ("[T]he Supreme Court has repeatedly 'stressed the importance of resolving immunity questions at the earliest possible stage in litigation.'. . The Sixth Circuit, however, has clarified that only truly 'insubstantial claims against government officials should be resolved ... prior to broad discovery,' Johnson, 790 F.3d at 653, and has cautioned that 'it is generally inappropriate for a district court to grant a 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity.' Wesley, 779 F.3d at 433. Thus, '[a]lthough an officer's entitlement to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point, that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.'. . With respect to the second prong of the qualified-immunity analysis, the KSP Defendants have not argued that the constitutional rights allegedly violated were not clearly established at the time of the Defendant Officers' actions. Nor could they. At the time of Plaintiffs' arrest and pretrial detention, they had a clearly established right to be free from malicious prosecution and fabricated evidence under the Fourth Amendment. . . Therefore, despite the lack of any developed argument, the Court assumes that the Defendants' qualified-immunity argument rests on the first prong—whether the facts alleged make out a constitutional violation. As this Court has explained in detail above, the Plaintiffs have sufficiently stated plausible claims for malicious prosecution, fabrication of evidence, supervisor liability, failure to intervene, and conspiracy under § 1983. Accordingly, the KSP Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Reed v. Palmer, No. 18-1429, 2018 WL 4870351, at *5–6, *9 (7th Cir. Oct. 9, 2018) ("[T]he district court acted prematurely in deciding Palmer's entitlement to qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage. The court found that, during the time period alleged in the complaints, no law clearly established 'what the [C]onstitution requires of a government official in [Palmer's] position under similar circumstances.' Palmer's position is determined with reference to the well-pleaded factual allegations in plaintiffs' complaints, which are taken as true and considered in the light most favorable to plaintiffs on a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. . . According to the complaints, Palmer contracted with the state of Wisconsin to place juveniles, including plaintiffs, in the Copper Lake facility. The complaints further allege that both plaintiffs were in Palmer's custody pursuant to state court orders. Moreover, Palmer monitored and received reports concerning Reed's and Ray-Cluney's conditions of confinement at Copper Lake. Based on these reports, plaintiffs allege Palmer 'knew or should have known of the systemic and excessive use of isolation cells at Copper Lake,' and '[d]espite such knowledge, Palmer failed to remove the Iowa girls placed at Copper Lake and acted with deliberate indifference in doing so.' These allegations are sufficient to withstand a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. Plaintiffs have sufficiently alleged that their constitutional rights were violated through excessive use of isolation cells at Copper Lake. Supreme Court precedent is not clear about whether state juvenile detention facility conditions should be judged under the Eighth Amendment's Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause or the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause. . . In a case over forty years ago, we applied the Eighth Amendment's cruel and unusual punishment standard to evaluate the use of corporal punishment and tranquilizing drugs at a juvenile correctional institution. . . . Meanwhile, other circuits have applied the Fourteenth Amendment's 'more protective' Due Process Clause in evaluating juvenile detention center conditions. . . . At the time plaintiffs were allegedly in Palmer's custody, isolation of pre-trial juvenile detainees not 'reasonably related to a legitimate governmental objective,' Bell, 441 U.S. at 539, 99 S.Ct. 1861, could rise to the level of a constitutional violation. Here, plaintiffs' complaints plausibly allege that they were kept in isolation at Copper Lake for excessive amounts of time. Caselaw clearly establishes that such conduct could violate the Fourteenth and/or the Eighth Amendment. On the present record, however, it is impossible to determine whether such a constitutional violation occurred in plaintiffs' cases. We know the respective complaints allege plaintiffs spent an inordinate amount of time at Copper Lake in isolation. However, we do not know the reasons behind their seclusion. We therefore cannot evaluate, under the Fourteenth Amendment, whether Palmer—or the other defendants—acted reasonably pursuant to a 'legitimate governmental objective or instead unlawfully 'punished' plaintiffs. . . Nor can we determine, under the Eighth Amendment, whether Palmer had a 'sufficiently culpable state of mind.'. . . Such a result does not condemn the district court to unnecessary litigation or impede Palmer's potential right to be free from suit. The district court has a variety of means ... to move the case incrementally forward in order to address the qualified immunity issue at the earliest possible stage.'. . For instance, '[t]he Rule 12(e) motion for a more definite statement is perhaps the best procedural tool available to the defendant to obtain the factual basis underlying a plaintiff's claim for relief.'. . Alternatively, if additional evidence is needed to develop the factual record, the district court may 'limit the timing, sequence, frequency, and extent of that discovery under Rule 26.'")

[While the following case involved a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii), the reasoning would clearly apply to dismissal of a prisoner's complaint where dismissal is based on the grounds that the plaintiff "seeks monetary relief against a defendant who is immune from such relief." 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2)(B)(iii).]

Coleman v. Labor & Indus. Review Comm'n of Wisconsin, 860 F.3d 461, 465-66, 470-71, 474-75 (7th Cir. 2017) ("[M]ay an Article I judge dismiss an action for failure to state a claim on which relief can be granted, if that dismissal is part of the initial screening that occurs in IFP cases and thus takes place before the defendants are served? Although the statute does not say this in so many words, we have understood section 1915(e) to 'direct [ ] courts to screen all complaints filed with requests to proceed IFP.' Luevano v. Wal-Mart Stores, Inc., 722 F.3d 1014, 1022 (7th Cir. 2013). It instructs 'the court' to 'dismiss the case at any time' if, among other things, the action 'fails to state a claim on which relief may be granted.' 28 U.S.C. § 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii). The magistrate judge in our case followed that command and entered a final judgment for the as-yet-unserved defendant. We must decide whether this was permissible. . . .[A]lthough the consent requirement is carved in stone, the identity of 'the parties' whose permission section 636(c)(1) demands is less clear. Is it all of the parties? Some of the parties? Only any party who must be before the court for purposes of the ruling in question? The circuits have come to different conclusions about this question, and unfortunately, so have we. The Fifth Circuit, in Neals v. Norwood, 59 F.3d 530, 532 (5th Cir. 1995), and our opinion in Hains v. Washington, 131 F.3d 1248, 1249 & n.2 (7th Cir. 1997) (per curiam), take the position that an unserved defendant is not one of the 'parties' for purposes of section 636(c)(1), and thus the defendant's consent is not required in order to permit a magistrate judge to issue a dispositive order when screening a complaint for IFP purposes. On the other side, the Eighth Circuit, in Henry v. Tri-Services, Inc., 33 F.3d 931, 933 (8th Cir. 1994), and our court in Geaney v. Carlson, 776 F.2d 140, 142 (7th Cir. 1985), hold that the magistrate cannot finally dispose of the case, on screening or otherwise, without the defendant's consent. No matter what the rules concerning consent are, there is a substantial role for the magistrate judge to play in the screening process. Under the rule of Neals and Hains, the magistrate judge enters a final judgment on the case, while under the approach of Henry and Geaney, he evaluates the complaint, takes any nondispositive actions that are appropriate (e.g., further investigation of indigence), and recommends an action for the district court. . . If the action recommended is dismissal, the district court can enter that final judgment (after considering any properly filed objections) without bothering the defendants. Under either view, to the extent that section 1915(e)(2) involves nondispositive issues, such as the truthfulness of the allegation of poverty, nothing in the Magistrate Judges' Act prevents the magistrate judge from resolving the issue. That is because a conclusion that the plaintiff is not indigent does not foreclose further legal proceedings—it just means that the plaintiff must pony up the required filing fee. . . . The conclusion we draw is that a dismissal under section 1915(e)(2)(B)(ii) for failure to state a claim is covered by the language in the Magistrate Judges Act that prevents the district court from designating a magistrate judge to 'hear and determine' a motion 'to dismiss for failure to state a claim upon which relief can be granted.' 28 U.S.C. § 636(b)(1)(A). That rule is not absolute, however. It yields when, as section 636(c)(1) puts it, the magistrate judge is acting with 'the consent of the parties.' Packed into that short phrase are two questions: what does it take to signify consent, and which parties (one, some, or all) have to consent? Typically, both parties file written consents to the magistrate judge's jurisdiction and the case proceeds without a hitch. And as Judge Posner's dissent emphasizes, consent need not be explicit. No dispute there: consent may be implicit, as the Supreme Court recognized in Roell v. Withrow, 538 U.S. 580, 586–91, 123 S.Ct. 1696, 155 L.Ed.2d 775 (2003). But even implicit consent requires some action from the party whose consent must be found. . . . With the idea of presumed consent out of the way, the question remains whether the statute permits the consent of only one party. We think not. To begin with, that is not what the statute says; it speaks instead of the consent of the 'parties,' plural. The Commission sees no problem in the use of the plural: at the time of screening, it notes, only one party has come before the court. It should be enough, the Commission says, to obtain only the consent of the party that is actually present. This would require us to treat the unserved defendant as a nonparty to the case for this purpose. Such a step would ignore the general use of the term 'parties' throughout the rules of civil procedure. At the time of filing any civil complaint, only one party is ever before the court. . . .The fact that it is the plaintiff who commences the suit does not mean that the other parties named in the complaint do not count as 'parties' prior to service of process. And our case differs in one critical respect from the hypotheticals that concern Judge Easterbrook. . . All of his examples involve a case that has at least one plaintiff and at least one defendant. And in all of his examples, at least one plaintiff and one defendant have consented to the authority of the magistrate judge. That is the crucial element missing here: in our case, only one side of the 'v' has consented to the magistrate judge, and under the statute, that is not enough. . . .This court, unfortunately, has not been consistent in its approach to the issue we have been discussing. . . . We see no principled way of reconciling Geaney and Hains, even though Hains dealt with the prisoner-specific section 1915A, whereas Coleman's case was dismissed under section 1915(e). The relevant language and structure of these two statutes are identical. . . . In the end, Hains stands alone in this circuit. Our consistent emphasis on the importance of consent strongly supports Geaney's analysis. . . We conclude that Geaney, Brook, and Stevo are more consistent with the language of the statute and better respect the constitutional line between Article III judges and other adjudicators. We thus overrule Hains. Because this resolves an internal circuit conflict and overrules one case, we have circulated this opinion to all judges in regular active service. See Cir. R. 40(e). A majority of the judges did not wish to hear this case en banc. Judge Easterbrook, joined by Judge Sykes, voted in favor of an en banc hearing. Judge Posner dissents on the merits. As we stressed earlier, this does not mean that the work of the magistrate judge in this type of case is wasted. The role of the magistrate judges in conducting screening of prisoner and in forma pauperis actions is of great assistance to the district court. But unless all parties to the action have consented to the magistrate judge's authority to resolve the case finally, the role of the magistrate judge must parallel that of the bankruptcy judges after Stern. Rather than entering final judgments, they must 'issue proposed findings of fact and conclusions of law to be reviewed de novo by the district court.'. . We realize that this adds one extra step, but it is not a particularly burdensome one, and it does not mean that parties in the Commission's position must be served before the case can be resolved. It just means that the district judge must enter any post-screening orders that dispose of the entire case. Fears that the district court judges will drown beneath a deluge of IFP applications are overblown. The Stern dissent expressed similar fears, but this has not come to pass. . . The magistrate judges' screening is among those 'additional duties as are not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States.'")

NINTH CIRCUIT

Hernandez v. City of San Jose, 897 F.3d 1125, 1137-38 (9th Cir. 2018) (" 'Whatever the merits of the decision[s] in [Wood and Kennedy], the differences [in the facts of those] case[s] and [this] case ... leap from the page.' [citing Kisela] Without more, Wood and Kennedy did not place these Officers on notice that their actions were unlawful 'in light of the specific context of [this] case.'. .But the Attendees have also cited Johnson, a case that clearly establishes the state-created danger doctrine applies to the crowd-control context. . . .Based on the allegations in the FAC, which we take as true at this stage of the proceedings, we also find that this is 'one of those rare cases' in which the constitutional violation 'is so "obvious" that we must conclude ... qualified immunity is inapplicable, even without a case directly on point.'. . Here, the Attendees allege the Officers shepherded them into a violent crowd of protesters and actively prevented them from reaching safety. The Officers continued to implement this plan even while witnessing the violence firsthand, and even though they knew the mob had attacked Trump supporters at the Convention Center earlier that evening, and that similar, violent encounters had occurred in other cities. Viewed in the light most favorable to the Attendees, these allegations establish 'with obvious clarity' that the Officers increased the danger to the Attendees and acted with deliberate indifference to that danger, pursuant to the state-created danger doctrine. . . We therefore hold 'that the operative complaint alleges facts that allow us "to draw the reasonable inference that the [Officers are] liable for the misconduct alleged,"'. . and that the district court properly denied the Officers qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings. This, of course, 'does not mean that th[e] case must go to trial,'. . . or that the Officers are now precluded from ever asserting a claim for qualified immunity in this litigation. As we have noted time and again, '[o]nce an evidentiary record has been developed through discovery, [the Officers] will be free to move for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.'")

Keates v. Koile, 883 F.3d 1228, 1234-35, 1237-38, 1240 (9th Cir. 2018) ("This appeal raises an additional wrinkle because the district court granted the motion to dismiss largely on the ground that defendants were entitled to qualified immunity. Determining claims of qualified immunity at the motion-to-dismiss stage raises special problems for legal decision making. . . On the one hand, we may not dismiss a complaint making 'a claim to relief that is plausible on its face.'. . But on the other hand, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity so long as 'their conduct does not violate clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . The Supreme Court has emphasized that this is a low bar, explaining that '[q]ualified immunity gives government officials breathing room to make reasonable but mistaken judgments about open legal questions.'. . .Balancing these competing rules, when a district court dismisses a complaint for failure to state a claim based on a qualified immunity defense, we consider whether the complaint alleges sufficient facts, taken as true, to support the claim that the officials' conduct violated clearly established constitutional rights of which a reasonable officer would be aware 'in light of the specific context of the case.'. . If the operative complaint 'contains even one allegation of a harmful act that would constitute a violation of a clearly established constitutional right,' then plaintiffs are 'entitled to go forward' with their claims. . .But our decision at the motion-to-dismiss stage sheds little light on whether the government actors might ultimately be entitled to qualified immunity 'were the case permitted to proceed, at least to the summary judgment stage' and the court is presented with facts providing context for the challenged actions. . . Because the operative complaint here was dismissed on qualified immunity grounds, we must determine whether Keates and A.K.'s complaint pleads a plausible claim that withstands a qualified immunity defense. . . .In sum, our case law clearly establishes that the rights of parents and children to familial association under the Fourteenth, First, and Fourth Amendments are violated if a state official removes children from their parents without their consent, and without a court order, unless information at the time of the seizure, after reasonable investigation, establishes reasonable cause to believe that the child is in imminent danger of serious bodily injury, and the scope, degree, and duration of the intrusion are reasonably necessary to avert the specific injury at issue. . . . [B]ased solely on the facts alleged in the complaint construed in favor of Keates and A.K., a reasonable official in Koile's position would know the available information did not establish reasonable cause to believe that A.K. was in imminent danger of attempting to commit suicide, or that it was necessary to separate her from her mother, transfer her to ABHS, and continue to detain her after medical professionals at ABHS concluded she was a low suicide risk. Therefore, we conclude that the operative complaint alleges facts that allow us 'to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the misconduct alleged.'. . The district court therefore erred in dismissing the familial association claim against Koile and Pender on the basis of qualified immunity. However, '[o]ur denial of qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings does not mean that this case must go to trial.'. . As we have previously noted, '[o]nce an evidentiary record has been developed through discovery, defendants will be free to move for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.'") Butler v. San Diego District Attorney's Office, 370 F.3d 956, 958, 964 (9th Cir. 2004) ("We hold that the district court applied an incorrect evidentiary standard in denying summary judgment. It incorrectly understood the law to require it to assume that factual allegations in a plaintiff's § 1983 complaint are true when a defendant moves for summary judgment based on official immunity. Based on that understanding of the law, the district court did not rule on the admissibility of evidence proffered by plaintiffs at summary judgment, but rather simply assumed that the factual allegations in the complaint were true without regard to whether they had evidentiary support. The district court was misled by a brief (and incorrect) statement by this court in Fletcher v. Kalina, 93 F.3d 653, 654 (9th Cir.1996), and a repetition of that statement by the Supreme Court on review of our decision in Kalina v. Fletcher, 522 U.S. 118, 122 (1997). We hold that these brief statements were inadvertent and erroneous statements of the law. A correct statement of the law is that when a defendant makes a properly supported motion for summary judgment based on official immunity, the plaintiff has an obligation to produce evidence of his or her own. In such a case, the district court is not required (or even allowed) simply to assume the truth of challenged factual allegations in the complaint. In other words, a motion for summary judgment based on official immunity is governed by Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56, just like all motions for summary judgment in civil suits in federal district court. . . . Thus, in the usual case where a defendant asserts an official immunity defense, the district court first decides whether the facts alleged in the complaint, assumed to be true, yield the conclusion that the defendant is entitled to immunity. This is the analysis under Rule 12(b)(6) on a motion to dismiss. If, taking the facts as stated in the complaint, the defendant is entitled to immunity, no discovery should be permitted and the case should be dismissed. . . If a plaintiff passes this initial hurdle, he or she is entitled to enough discovery to permit the court to rule on a defendant's subsequent summary judgment motion brought under Rule 56. . . . The Supreme Court has clearly, and repeatedly, admonished that official immunity is immunity from suit rather than merely immunity from liability. . . It would therefore be extremely odd if, in ruling on a defendant's motion for summary judgment based on official immunity, a district court were required to assume that the allegations in plaintiff's complaint are true. If that were the law, the defendant would effectively be deprived of the protection afforded by a motion for summary judgment, and would be given only the protection afforded by a motion to dismiss. That is, the defendant would always be obliged to go to trial if the plaintiff's allegations (as distinct from the plaintiff's evidence) would overcome a claim of official immunity. If this were the law, a defendant moving for summary judgment based on official immunity would have to go to trial more, rather than less, often than a defendant moving for summary judgment on some other basis. Given that the very purpose of official immunity is to provide immunity from trial, this cannot be the law. . . . Because the district court misunderstood the evidentiary standard in ruling on defendants' motions for summary judgment based on official immunity, we vacate the district court's ruling and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. We recognize that the district court's misunderstanding of the evidentiary standard may have led it to be more restrictive in the discovery it allowed to plaintiff than it would have been if it had properly understood the standard, and that the court may have led plaintiffs to seek to discover and introduce less evidence than they otherwise would have done. We leave it to the district court on remand to allow additional discovery, if appropriate, based on the evidentiary standard plaintiff must meet in responding to a properly supported motion for summary judgment.").

Thompson v. Lampert, No. CV-02-135-HU, 2004 WL 1673102, at *15 n.3 (D. Ore. July 27, 2004) ("While the qualified immunity cases indicate that the first inquiry as to whether a constitutional right has been violated is based on a review of the facts alleged taken in the light most favorable to plaintiff, this does not mean that the court's analysis of a qualified immunity defense in the context of a summary judgment motion is limited to the allegations in the complaint or those put forth only by the plaintiff. . .Rather, the inquiry is whether upon review of the evidence in the record, there is a disputed issue of fact. If so, Saucier requires that the court conduct the first prong of the qualified immunity analysis assuming the truth of the facts as alleged by the plaintiff and in a light most favorable to the plaintiff. . . . If, however, the record reveals only undisputed facts and those facts do not support a constitutional violation, the inquiry ends.").

IV. STATE OF MIND AND QUALIFIED IMMUNITY

D.C. CIRCUIT

Daugherty v. Sheer, 891 F.3d 386, 390-92 (D.C. Cir. 2018) ("Regardless of whether a court expressly has declared certain conduct unlawful, a government official is not entitled to qualified immunity where 'every "reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates th[e] right."'. . Accordingly, 'we look to cases from the Supreme Court and this court, as well as to cases from other courts exhibiting a consensus view—if there is one.'. . The proponent of a purported right has the 'burden to show that the particular right in question ... was clearly established' for qualified-immunity purposes. . . .In their claim now on appeal, Daugherty and LabMD assert that Sheer and Yodaiken violated their rights by prosecuting an enforcement action in retaliation for Daugherty's speech, despite the undisputed data-security breach underlying the FTC's investigation and regardless of ultimate control over the decision to bring a complaint residing with the FTC board. Because no such right was clearly established, Sheer and Yodaiken are immune from this suit. . . .Our task, then, is to determine whether there is a clearly established right to be free from an enforcement action where retaliatory motive was allegedly present, but was not plausibly alleged to be the but-for cause of the enforcement. . . . Supreme Court precedent shows that there is no such clearly established right. If anything, the leading cases cut the other way: they show that retaliatory motive does not automatically imbue the conduct in question with an unconstitutional air, where the official's actions have a legitimate basis. . . .Because the FTC enforcement action against LabMD had an alternative cause—the undisputed data-security breach by which the 1718 File was publicly available from a LabMD computer—the alleged actions by Sheer and Yodaiken did not violate Daugherty's or LabMD's clearly established rights, even assuming retaliatory motive. Sheer and Yodaiken accordingly are entitled to qualified immunity, and the District Court's decision concluding otherwise is REVERSED.")

Richardson v. D.C., 322 F. Supp. 3d 175, 184-86 (D.D.C. 2018) ("It may seem odd to speak of qualified immunity in the context of the Eighth Amendment. After all, to hold an officer liable for deliberate indifference, a court must find that the officer disregarded a risk of harm that he subjectively knew about. Moreover, it was clearly established in Farmer v. Brennan that disregarding a risk of inmate-on-inmate sexual assault amounts to unconstitutional deliberate indifference. So if the record were to support a jury finding that Warden Smith disregarded the risk that an inmate like Richardson might be assaulted if placed in a cell with a heterosexual male, wouldn't the record necessarily also support a finding that Smith violated clearly established law? Not necessarily. Farmer put correctional officers on notice that they cannot house together a transgender female inmate who they know faces a particularly high risk of assault with a male inmate. . . But the case leaves open what exactly a higher-level supervisor or policymaker must do when dealing not with particularized evidence of risk, but rather with the ever-present, generalized risk of sexual assault that transgender inmates face at the hands of their cellmates. In other words, Farmer does not hold that transgender female inmates, notwithstanding their own housing preferences, may never be celled with male inmates. In fact, Farmer says nothing whatsoever about general procedures for housing transgender inmates. And, equally importantly, Farmer laid down a principle that officers who reasonably respond to known risks cannot be held liable for deliberate indifference, . . . which leaves open the possibility that an official's unreasonable response was not clearly unreasonable under existing law. The Supreme Court's unanimous decision in Taylor v. Barkes . . . helps explain why Farmer's holding—clear as it may be with respect to certain conduct—does not automatically vitiate Smith's immunity here. In Barkes, the widow of a former inmate who committed suicide in prison had sued the commissioner of the state department of corrections and the prison's warden. . . She claimed that the officials had displayed deliberate indifference toward his risk of suicide 'by failing to supervise and monitor the private contractor that provided the medical treatment—including the intake screening—at the [prison].'. . The court of appeals had found that the officers were not entitled to qualified immunity on her Eighth Amendment claim because, at the time of the inmate's death, there were cases on the books putting officers on notice that they could not behave with reckless indifference to a particular inmate's known 'vulnerability to suicide.'. . The Supreme Court disagreed. In its view, those prior decisions did not clearly establish the unlawfulness of the officials' purported conduct—failing to implement adequate screening procedures—because the cases 'did not say ... that detention facilities must implement procedures to identify such vulnerable inmates, let alone specify what procedures would suffice.'. . By the same token, Farmer does not dictate the outcome here. The clearly established right to be free from deliberate indifference to sexual assault does not mean that it is clearly established what procedures a supervisor must put in place to prevent assault. And the Court finds that, as a matter of undisputed fact, Warden Smith's actions did not violate clearly established Eighth Amendment law. It is undisputed that Smith played a limited role in the chain of events that led to Richardson's purported assault. He testified that he did not participate in creating or implementing the two policies that Richardson takes issue with—the one that allowed transgender inmates to be housed in the general male prison population, . . . or the one that presumptively double-celled inmates, including transgender inmates, absent a specific finding that they belonged in protective custody[.]Richardson identifies no evidence undermining that testimony, and indeed she concedes that the policies were instituted not by Smith, but by the Department's Director. . . . Nor is there any evidence suggesting that Smith selected Glover as Richardson's cellmate or was aware of Richardson's concerns about Glover, which she claims to have expressed to several prison guards after being moved into his cell. Rather, the record, read in the light most favorable to Richardson, supports the following narrative with respect to Warden Smith's state of mind: Smith knew that, pursuant to Department of Corrections policy, an inmate could circumvent the Transgender Housing Committee's hearing process by signing a form agreeing to be housed according to her birth sex. . . Smith could override any initial determination related to housing—including the inmate's election of birth-sex housing—by making a recommendation to the Director in writing. . . Smith also knew that any transgender female inmate who was housed in the general male population would presumptively be double-celled based on a suicide-prevention policy instituted by the Director. . . Smith could register disagreement with that policy but could not unilaterally change it. . . A jury could also infer that Smith knew generally that transgender female inmates—particularly those exhibiting traditionally feminine characteristics—faced a higher risk of sexual assault when celled with male inmates. There is no evidence, however, that Smith had any information indicating that Richardson faced a particularly high risk of abuse. Nor is there evidence that Smith knew that Glover, beyond his substantial criminal history, posed an especially high threat of sexual assault. Obviously, Richardson need not point to a case finding liability under that exact set of facts in order to overcome qualified immunity. . . But she still must persuade the Court that, in 2014, Smith was on clear notice that the foregoing conduct and associated state of mind amounted to a constitutional violation. She cites no authority, nor is the Court is aware of any, that provided such notice. The right to be free from deliberate indifference to the risk of assault does not necessarily imply that Smith needed to categorically prevent transgender female inmates from being celled with male inmates who exhibited no particularized red flags when it came to sexual violence. And an officer in Smith's position could reasonably—not necessarily correctly, but reasonably—believe that the D.C. jail's system for housing transgender inmates properly balanced inmate safety against avoiding mandatory isolation of transgender inmates, especially because it is undisputed that the double-celling policy was enacted to mitigate the risk of suicide. Smith is therefore entitled to qualified immunity on Richardson's Eighth Amendment claim against him in his individual capacity.")

FIRST CIRCUIT

Martinez-Velez v. Rey-Hernandez, 506 F.3d 32, 46 (1st Cir. 2007) ("[I]n political discrimination cases–where wrongful motive is an element of the claim–the case law has regularly rejected this objective-reasonableness argument.")

Rosario-Urdaz v.Velazco, 433 F.3d 174, 178 & n.2, 179 (1st Cir. 2006) ("Traditionally–search and seizure is the best example–the Supreme Court has said that private motive is irrelevant if the defendant had objective probable cause or, for qualified immunity purposes, a reasonable officer might have so believed, even if wrongly. . . By contrast, in cases involving first amendment rights, some of our decisions have left open the possibility that an objectively reasonable action could still be denied qualified immunity if improperly motivated. [citing Mihos and Tang] . . . . These cases note, without resolving, the tension between specific-intent constitutional violations and the requirement that qualified immunity be decided on a purely objective basis. . . . In all events, even if the existence of a political motivation underlying an objectively reasonable employment decision were enough to preclude qualified immunity, Rosario-Urdaz must make a threshold showing that she was adversely affected by these personnel decisions. . . .The personnel decisions of which Rosario-Urdaz complains do not rise to this level.").

Tejada-Batista v. Morales, 424 F.3d 97, 102 , 103 (1st Cir. 2005) ("[T]he problem in this case is not one of a single actor with multiple motives, but of sequential actors having different motives– the first actor's motive being unlawful and the second actor's motive at least permissible. In such a case, the first actor may be (and here was) a but-for cause of the firing. The question is whether the intervening step–a final decision maker acting on a permissible ground–should as a matter of policy (not lack of causation) insulate the wrongdoer from liability. We have found only a few circuits that have addressed this sequence-of-actors issue in the present context, and they are nominally in conflict. [citing cases] The interplay between qualified immunity and First Amendment violations is a difficult subject, partly because the former normally employs an objective standard and the latter–in contrast to the ordinary Fourth Amendment claim– turns heavily upon motive. This does not mean that qualified immunity can never succeed in a First Amendment case, see Dirrane v. Brookline Police Dept., 315 F.3d 65, 69-71 (1st Cir.2002), but only that the opportunities may be narrowed. On appeal, appellants' brief describes qualified immunity doctrine in general terms but makes no effort to apply it to the facts of this case. An argument not seriously developed in the opening brief is forfeit,. . .and that rule certainly applies in this case. Given that the jury almost surely found that appellants' purpose was improper retaliation, it is not clear how a qualified immunity defense could easily have prevailed.")

Tejada-Batista v. Morales, 424 F.3d 97, 105-08 (1st Cir. 2005) (Carter, J., dissenting) ("[T]he conduct and motivation of Ms. Morales and Mr. Alverez cannot be, as a matter of law, any part of a legally sufficient causative factor in Secretary Fuentes' employment action. Even though the evidence might be construed to establish that their termination recommendations were potentially driven by some unconstitutional motivation, they cannot be liable under section 1983 without some evidence of causation between that motivation and the decision by Secretary Fuentes to discharge the Plaintiff. . . . .Without at least being able to impute appellants' unlawful motives to Secretary Fuentes, those wrongful motives cannot be found to be a motivating factor in the adverse employment action. . . . As a matter of law, there simply cannot be any causal link here between any supposed improper motives of the minions and the discharge implemented by Secretary Fuentes' solitary decision to discharge plaintiff for a proper, stated reason. . . . Webber v. International Paper Co., 417 F.3d 229 (1st Cir.2005). . . . is a clear application of the Mt. Healthy rule requiring the presence of causational linkage between the conduct of those who are found to harbor discriminatory motivation and the making of the actual, challenged employment decision. It is, I suggest, not proper for this panel to depart from this holding. In this Circuit, each panel of the Court is bound by prior panel decisions directly on point. . . The seminal holding of Webber, for present purposes, is that where the evidence fails to show that the final decision-maker is influenced adversely by the motivation of lower level actors, the type and level of causation required by Mt. Healthy is absent and must be recognized. A).

Mihos v. Swift, 358 F.3d 91, 103-07(1st Cir. 2004) ("Given the importance of Swift's motivation for firing Mihos for his vote, we must pause to address Swift's argument in her brief that 'the state of mind of the public official is not relevant to the question of qualified immunity,' citing to Harlow v. Fitzgerald. . . . This argument, along with citations to Harlow, is often made in First Amendment retaliation cases when defendants raise the qualified immunity defense. We are mindful that the Supreme Court in Harlow changed qualified immunity doctrine to emphasize the objective, not subjective, nature of that inquiry. However, Harlow does not stand for the proposition that inquiries into defendants' subjective motivation is inappropriate in the first step of the qualified immunity analysis in assessing whether an intent-based constitutional violation has been alleged. . . . Harlow, then, did not affect the first step of the qualified immunity analysis: whether plaintiff's allegations, if true, establish a constitutional violation. Certain constitutional violations, including First Amendment retaliation claims, include defendant's motivations as a foundational element of the tort: Mihos's First Amendment retaliation claim 'has no meaning absent the allegation of impermissible motivation.' . . . While the Supreme Court has removed from the qualified immunity analysis inquiries into whether a defendant knew that he was violating plaintiff's constitutional rights or acted maliciously to that end, this jurisprudence has not suggested that the 'objectification' of the qualified immunity inquiry somehow removes the intent element in the 'subset of constitutional torts [in which] motivation or intent is an element of the cause of action .' . . . In Crawford-El v. Britton. . . the Supreme Court confirmed that although Harlow eliminated inquiries into the defendant's subjective state of mind in the third step of the qualified immunity analysis, it did not eliminate inquiries into the defendant's subjective state of mind in the first step of the qualified immunity analysis when plaintiff alleges an intent-based constitutional tort. . . . With its careful attention to the ways in which trial courts can control the examination of an official's state of mind pre-trial, the Supreme Court acknowledged in Crawford-El that the adoption of an objective standard for qualified immunity in Harlow did not foreclose all state of mind inquiries during the pre-trial consideration of qualified immunity when state of mind is an element of the constitutional tort. Swift misreads Harlow in asserting that its reformulation of the qualified immunity defense makes her motivation in firing Mihos irrelevant to the qualified immunity analysis. Therefore, if the qualified immunity defense proffered in her motion to dismiss does not identify proper grounds apart from motive for dismissing the case, and if the thrust of her motion to dismiss is simply to deny that she acted with the constitutionally proscribed motive, she is unlikely to succeed." [footnotes omitted]).

Orekoya v. Mooney, 330 F.3d 1, 11(1st Cir. 2003) ("Orekoya next erroneously argues that Judge Young could not have granted qualified immunity because 'national origin discrimination precludes the availability of qualified immunity as a defense,' citing to DiMarco-Zappa v. Cabanillas, 238 F.3d 25, 31, 37 (1st Cir.2001). The assertion is flatly wrong. DiMarco applied the usual rules of qualified immunity and concluded, on the facts there, that immunity was not available. There is no per se rule that national origin discrimination is exempt from qualified immunity analysis.").

Tower v. Leslie-Brown, 326 F.3d 290, 296 (1st Cir. 2003) ("Certainly, the unlawfulness of entering a person's home to effectuate a warrantless arrest in the absence of exigent circumstances was clearly established at the time of Tower's arrest in January 2001. . . But the qualified immunity inquiry demands that we ask a second, more specific question: would a reasonable officer have known that it was unlawful to enter the home under the specific circumstances faced?

. . Maine law largely answers this question. By statute, an arresting officer 'need not have the warrant in [his] possession at the time of the arrest.' Me. R.Crim. P. 4(c)(3). It is uncontested that Peary was told by a court employee that a valid warrant had issued. The district court concluded, as do we, that it was reasonable for defendants to rely on the representation of a district court official, and that a reasonable actor would have believed that the warrant had issued. The Towers argue that the district court improperly failed to engage in an analysis of the defendants' subjective intent and absence of 'good faith.' In evaluating the officer's conduct, 'we do not focus on the official's subjective state of mind, such as bad faith or malicious intention ... we [must instead] make an objective analysis of the reasonableness of conduct in light of the facts actually known to the officer and not consider the individual officer's subjective assessment of those facts. Nor are actual motives for conduct to be considered in evaluating a qualified immunity defense.' Sheehy v. Town of Plymouth, 191 F.3d 15, 19 (1st Cir.1999) (internal quotations omitted) (quoting Floyd v. Farrell, 765 F.2d 1, 4-6 (1st Cir.1985)); see also Harlow, 457 U.S. at 818, 102 S.Ct. 2727. Because objectively reasonable officers would not have known they were violating the Towers' Fourth Amendment rights by entering their home, the defendants enjoy qualified immunity.").

Tang v. State of Rhode Island, 120 F.3d 325, 327, 328 (1st Cir. 1997) ("We think that the Harlow-Anderson objective test does not automatically resolve a qualified immunity defense in favor of the defendant in a case of alleged racial discrimination or retaliation. The essence of such claims, or at least one standard version, is that official actions that might otherwise be defended as reasonable become illegitimate when taken out of racial bias or in revenge for a prior complaint. . . . To employ a wholly objective test would wipe out many, if not most, of these claims. The objective test focuses on the reasonableness of the official's conduct independent of motive. It is rarely going to be manifestly unreasonable, judged apart from motive, to assign particular tasks to an employee, move her file cabinet, alter her parking arrangements or do most of the things of which Tang complains. But because of special constitutional or statutory protections, some motives can convert relatively minor slights into causes of action. . . . An unresolved tension exists between such specific-intent torts and the objective Harlow-Anderson qualified immunity test. That test was designed to meet, not claims of racial bias or retaliation, but rather ill- founded allegations that an official action was "malicious" or taken "in bad faith"– characterizations that defeated qualified immunity at common law. . . In all events, the circuit courts have almost uniformly refused to apply a strictly objective test of qualified immunity in racial and retaliation cases.")

Broderick v. Roache, 996 F.2d 1294, 1297-98 (1st Cir. 1993) (holding that the district court did not err in taking into consideration defendant's intent in course of qualified immunity analysis, where state of mind was an essential component of plaintiff's underlying constitutional claim).

Feliciano-Angulo v. Rivera-Cruz, 858 F.2d 40, 46 (1st Cir. 1988) ("Harlow will not bar inquiry into a defendant's state of mind when the applicable law makes the defendant's state of mind . . . an essential element of plaintiff's constitutional claim.).

Facey v. Dickhaut, No. CA 11-10680-MLW, 2014 WL 8105164, at *21-22 (D. Mass. Sept. 30, 2014) ("Some courts have found that the qualified immunity analysis and the Eighth Amendment deliberate indifference analysis fold into each other, reasoning that a reasonable officer would know that conduct amounting to deliberate indifference violates the Eighth Amendment. [collecting cases] However, neither the First Circuit nor the Supreme Court has decided whether qualified immunity poses a discrete question from deliberate indifference. Assuming, without deciding, that the question of whether a prison official's conduct violates 'clearly established law' for purposes of qualified immunity is a question distinct from whether the officer acted with deliberate indifference under the Eighth Amendment, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, a reasonable official in the defendants' position would have known that his conduct violated the plaintiff's clearly established Eighth Amendment rights. As of 2010, when Facey was attacked, it was clearly established that prison officials violate a prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights when they knowingly place him at a substantial risk of attack from other inmates. [citing cases] Most significantly, in 1994, in Farmer, 511 U.S. at 842–44, the Supreme Court held that prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment when they knowingly place a prisoner in a setting that puts the prisoner at a substantial risk of violent assault from another inmate. . . . Like Farmer, Facey has presented evidence that would allow a reasonable jury to find that the defendants knowingly placed him at a substantial risk of being attacked by other inmates and that they violated Facey's clearly established Eighth Amendment rights. Therefore, the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Thayer v. Dion, No. 2: 09-cv-00435-DBH, 2010 WL 4961739, at * 16 (D. Me. Nov. 30, 2010) ("I agree with the defendants that there is a potential for an entitlement to qualified immunity under the Fourth Amendment standard even though there is sufficient evidence to warrant a trial on the Saucier v. Katz-esque [footnote omitted]excessive force claim in the absence of the immunity defense. [footnote omitted] However, it baffles me how a court could reach a conclusion that even though there was sufficient evidence that the force was applied impermissibly because it was motivated by a desire to punish or was malicious or sadistic the defendants are still entitled to summary judgment because 'the contour of the right' was not sufficiently clear and objectively a reasonable officer would not have understood that applying force to punish contravened the clearly established law. . . . The defendants' argument on this score comes very close to a suggestion that given the misbehavior of Thayer, they thought a reasonable officer would think he or she could get away' with the application of a little punitive, rights-violating force.")

Hrichak v. Kennebec County Sheriff, No. 06-59-B-W, 2007 WL 1170778, at 6-8 (D.Me. Apr. 18, 2007) ("[T]he defendants argue that the absence of probable cause for an arrest is a required element of a claim alleging retaliatory arrest, just as it is for a claim alleging retaliatory prosecution as indicated in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, __, 126 S.Ct. 1695, 1706-07 (2006). . . . There is a Circuit split on the question of whether or not, what is now the Hartman rule, of pleading and proving the absence of probable cause applies to retaliatory arrests. [citing cases] I am simply not convinced that the rationale of Hartman applies to a claim such as Hrichak's against the arresting officers involved in a spur-of-the-moment, warrantless arrest. . . . Even if Pion and Durham, under one version of the facts, were motivated by a desire to retaliate against Hrichak because of his threat to complain to federal authorities, they still claim they are entitled to qualified immunity for their actions because of the probable cause for the arrest. . . . . Tatro v. Kervin, 41 F.3d 9 (1st Cir.1994) and the 'but-for' test has been the clearly established law regarding retaliatory arrests in this circuit for over ten years. . . . As explained above, if the court considers the deposition testimony cited in his memorandum, there is a genuine dispute of material fact as to whether there was violation of a clearly established constitutional right. The difficult analysis occurs under the third prong of the First Circuit qualified immunity standard as it requires the court to determine whether 'it would have been clear to an objectively reasonable official, situated similarly to [these defendants], that the actions taken or omitted contravened the clearly established right.'. . Thus, I find myself in the uncomfortable situation of assessing whether a police officer who under one version of the facts made a decision to arrest an individual because he wanted to prevent that individual from exercising his First Amendment rights, acted as an objectively reasonable police officer given the indisputable probable cause for the arrest. . . . .The propriety of conferring Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800 (1982) qualified immunity in this sort of 'intent-based' constitutional tort is anything but clear based upon the majority opinion in Crawford-El. . . . I conclude however, under the facts and circumstances of this case, even if there is some evidence which would support a finding of improper motive, given the indisputable probable cause for the arrest and subsequent guilty plea by Hrichak, Pion and Durham are entitled to qualified immunity.").

See also Ligeri v. Rhode Island , 2007 WL 3072061, at *9 (D.R.I. Oct. 19, 2007) ("In Tatro v. Kervin, 41 F.3d 9, 18 (1st Cir.1994), the First Circuit opined on the standard of proof in a § 1983 action alleging First Amendment violations by a police officer. It held that the plaintiff in such a case 'need only show that the officer's intent or desire to curb the [protected] expression was the determining or motivating factor in making the arrest, in the sense that the officer would not have made the arrest Abut for" that determining factor.' . . . The Cranston Defendants also neglect to address the application to this case of the Supreme Court's holding in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 255-56 (2006), that a plaintiff in a § 1983 retaliatory prosecution claim must prove a lack of probable cause. In Hrichak v. Kennebec County Sheriff, No. 06-59-B-W, 2007 WL 1229404 (D. Me. April 24, 2007), the District Court considered the question of whether the Hartman probable cause rule extended to a claim of First Amendment retaliatory arrest. The Court noted that the First Circuit had not yet addressed the question and that there is currently a Circuit split on the question. Id. at *7 (collecting cases). The Cranston Defendants have simply not sufficiently addressed any of the legal issues arising out of Plaintiff's First Amendment retaliation claim. An additional complicating issue is that Plaintiff's claim is one for a retaliatory ticket rather than a retaliatory arrest or criminal prosecution. The bottom line is that the Cranston Defendants have not adequately briefed the issue and thus have not met their burden under Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(b)(6) of demonstrating a failure to state a claim.")

Pelletier v. Magnusson, 195 F. Supp.2d 214, 241 (D. Me. 2002) ("Because the deliberate indifference standard is subjective, asking whether the defendant consciously disregarded a substantial risk of serious harm, . . . it cannot be said that should Pelletier demonstrate that the defendants acted with a deliberate indifference to Ronald's medical care and physical safety that the defendants nonetheless reasonably believed that their conduct was lawful.").

Hogan v. Fischer, 738 F.3d 509, 515, 516 (2d Cir. 2013) ("Assuming, as we must, that the factual allegations of the complaint are true, three prison officials wearing masks approached Hogan's cell and proceeded to spray him with a mixture of feces, vinegar, and 'some type [of] machine oil.' The substance burned Hogan's eyes and left Hogan with other physical injuries. We are unwilling to accept, as a matter of law, the proposition that spraying an inmate with a mixture of feces, vinegar, and machine oil constitutes a de minimis use of force. . . .Moreover, even if we were to assume arguendo that the physical force allegedly used was de minimis—though it was not—spraying an inmate with vinegar, excrement, and machine oil in the circumstances alleged here is undoubtedly 'repugnant to the conscience of mankind' and therefore violates the Eighth Amendment. . . .We therefore hold that the district court erred in concluding that the prison officials' alleged use of force was de minimis and not of the sort repugnant to the conscience of mankind. . . The conduct alleged in Hogan's complaint is undoubtedly a form of cruel and unusual punishment proscribed by the Eighth Amendment.")

DiStiso v. Cook, 691 F.3d 226, 240, 241, 245-50 (2d Cir. 2012) ("Since Gant, it has been clearly established law in this circuit that claims of intentional race discrimination can be based on the 'deliberate indifference' of school boards, administrators, and teachers to invidious 'harassment, in the school environment, of a student by other children or parents.' Gant ex rel. Gant v. Wallingford Bd. of Educ., 195 F.3d at 140 (holding that 'only deliberate indifference to such [racial] harassment can be viewed as [intentional] discrimination by school officials themselves'). . . . Consistent with our obligation to consider a qualified immunity defense 'in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition," Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. at 201, we separately consider the claims that defendants Uccello and Cook were indifferent to racial name-calling directed at Nicholas in kindergarten and the claims that all defendants were indifferent to racially motivated physical misbehavior directed at Nicholas in both kindergarten and first grade. We conclude that qualified immunity is not available to defendants Uccello and Cook in the first context on the evidentiary record set forth by the district court. We conclude, however, that qualified immunity is available as a matter of law in the second context. . . . In sum, there are disputed issues of fact as to each element of plaintiff's claims that Uccello and Cook were deliberately indifferent to kindergarten students' repeated use of racial epithets to belittle Nicholas. Because the district court found the record evidence sufficient to allow each of those elements to be decided in favor of plaintiff, and because we must accept that sufficiency determination on this appeal, Uccello and Cook are not entitled to judgment on the ground of qualified immunity. . . . We reach a different conclusion with respect to plaintiff's claims that defendants were each deliberately indifferent to students' racially motivated physical misbehavior toward Nicholas. In so doing, we identify legal error in the district court's analysis, which appears not to have meaningfully distinguished the second element of a deliberate indifference claim as established by Gant, i.e., a defendant's actual knowledge of student-on-student racial harassment, see Gant ex rel. Gant v. Wallingford Bd. of Educ., 195 F.3d at 141 & n. 6, from the first element, i.e., students' racial harassment of a peer, see id. at 141. Rather, the district court largely elided consideration of the actual knowledge element by relying on an assumption as to the racial harassment element that is not clearly established in law: that evidence of student-on-student racial harassment in any respect can, without more, support an inference that any further student misbehavior directed to the same peer is also racially motivated. That assumption gave rise to another, also not clearly established in law: that evidence of a school official's knowledge of the initial racial harassment is enough, by itself, to permit a finding of his actual knowledge that any further misbehavior was also racially motivated. As we will explain herein, this mistakenly transformed the actual knowledge requirement established by Gant into an imputed knowledge requirement, and imputed knowledge is insufficient as a matter of law to support a claim for deliberate indifference. Where, as in this case, the subsequent misbehavior is of a type routinely engaged in by school children of the age at issue without regard to motivation, there must be some objective evidence linking initial racially hostile acts to such subsequent misbehavior to support a finding that a school official has actual knowledge that the latter behavior, like the former, is racially motivated. . . . To date, no Supreme Court or Second Circuit law clearly establishes that evidence of prior racial name-calling by unidentified kindergarten or first-grade students suffices to demonstrate that any subsequent physical misbehavior directed at the same classmate is also racially motived. Indeed, we conclude that something more is necessary to support an inference that a teacher or school official actually knew such subsequent misconduct was racially motivated. . . . In sum, because the record evidence is insufficient, as a matter of law, to support a finding that Uccello actually knew that her kindergarten students' routine physical misbehavior toward Nicholas was racially motivated, Uccello is entitled to an award of summary judgment based on qualified immunity for this part of plaintiff's deliberate indifference claim. . . . For the same reasons already discussed with respect to Uccello and Couture, see supra Part II.D.2.a.(1), no clearly established law permits an inference that Cook had actual knowledge that the complained-of physical misbehavior toward Nicholas in kindergarten or first grade was racially motivated in the absence of some objective evidence connecting the latter misbehavior to the earlier racial name-calling. . . . Because plaintiff's claims of deliberate indifference to physical misbehavior fail at the actual knowledge step of Gant analysis, we need not consider defendants' arguments for qualified immunity based on the final, reasonable response, element of a deliberate indifference claim. . . Any such inquiry would of course require us to assume that plaintiff could prove both that the physical misbehavior was racially motivated and that defendants had actual knowledge of that fact.") Reuland v. Hynes, 460 F.3d 409, 419, 420 (2d Cir. 2006) ("Because previous cases have recognized and defined the First Amendment right of public employees to be free from retaliation for speech on matters of public concern with reasonable clarity, Hynes would be entitled to qualified immunity only if it was objectively reasonable for him to believe that he could demote an assistant district attorney for making a hyperbolic statement regarding the crime rate without violating that right. . . . Because it would not have been objectively reasonable for Hynes to believe he could demote Reuland in retaliation for his hyperbolic statement to New York magazine, and he did not request that the jury decide if he was motivated by disruption rather than retaliation, Hynes is not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Reuland v. Hynes, 460 F.3d 409, 421 (2d Cir. 2006)(Winter, J. dissenting) (" I respectfully dissent. A prosecutor's statement to a magazine about homicide rates within his jurisdiction is not protected by the First Amendment when it was admittedly false, admittedly made without any belief of a basis in fact, and made to promote sales of the prosecutor's novel. . . . Labeling false speech 'hyperbole' does not render it protected. A government employee who purposefully or recklessly misinforms the public about a fact specifically related to his area of employment responsibility in order to profit monetarily should not be rewarded by a money judgment from a federal court when he is demoted. Established First Amendment doctrine provides no support for placing the mantle of victimhood upon such an employee.").

Mandell v. County of Suffolk, 316 F.3d 368, 385 (2d Cir. 2003) ("Where specific intent of a defendant is an element of plaintiff's claim under clearly established law, and plaintiff has adduced sufficient evidence of that intent to defeat summary judgment, summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds is inappropriate. . . In the present case retaliatory intent is an element of plaintiff's claim, and we have already noted that plaintiff's evidence of retaliatory animus is sufficient to make defendants' motivation a triable issue of fact. Until that issue is resolved by a factfinder, therefore, the retaliation claim against defendant [police commissioner] cannot be dismissed on qualified immunity grounds.").

Locurto v. Safir, 264 F.3d 154, 168, 169 (2d Cir. 2001) ("Defendants further urge upon us that subjective intent is per se irrelevant to the inquiry into objective reasonableness. But this argument betrays a fundamental misconception of the application of the qualified immunity doctrine to constitutional claims for which intent is an element. In the usual case where intent is not an element, bare allegations of malice coupled with otherwise legitimate government action do not yield a viable constitutional claim. In such a case, the qualified immunity doctrine focuses only on whether the government official's actions were objectively reasonable in light of clearly established law, without regard for possible subjective malice. . . But where a more specific intent is actually an element of the plaintiff's claim as defined by clearly established law, it can never be objectively reasonable for a government official to act with the intent that is prohibited by law.").

Sheppard v. Beerman (Beerman II), 94 F.3d 823, 828 (2d Cir. 1996) ("Sheppard asserts that qualified immunity is not available where he has alleged that Beerman had an actual unconstitutional motive in firing him. To a limited extent, we agree. Contrary to the district court's decision, the employer's actual (subjective) motive is not irrelevant in a qualified immunity inquiry. Rather, where the subjective state of mind of the actor is part of the constitutional mix, we have developed a rule that balances the interests of the official claiming immunity against the interests of the employee asserting unconstitutional motive: Upon a motion for summary judgment asserting a qualified immunity defense in an action in which an official's conduct is objectively reasonable but an unconstitutional subjective intent is alleged, the plaintiff must proffer particularized evidence of direct or circumstantial facts ... supporting the claim of an improper motive in order to avoid summary judgment. [citing Blue] This standard allows an allegedly offending official sufficient protection against baseless and unsubstantiated claims, but stops short of insulating an official whose objectively reasonable acts are besmirched by a prohibited unconstitutional motive.").

Blue v. Koren, 72 F.3d 1075, 1083-84 (2d Cir. 1995) ("The so-called heightened standard has been applied to address the problem of applying the test of "objective reasonableness" prescribed in Harlow [cite omitted] in circumstances where the constitutional claim asserted contains a subjective component. . . . By imposing that standard, courts have sought to reconcile the goal that led to the adoption of the objective test–permitting the dismissal of insubstantial claims involving objectively reasonable official conduct–with the goal of allowing plaintiffs to present claims that depend upon proof of unconstitutional motive. We believe that imposition of a similar standard is an appropriate way to accommodate these competing interests. . . . We agree that plaintiffs must offer specific evidence of improper motivation, but confess considerable doubt as to whether the "heightened" standard is really heightened or is simply an application of the rule that conclusory assertions are insufficient to defeat a motion for summary judgment. [cite omitted] When such a motion is based on assertion of qualified immunity, the first issue is whether a clearly established right is at stake. [cite omitted] If it is, the court must then address whether the conduct was objectively reasonable. If not, the motion must be denied. If the conduct was objectively reasonable, a conclusory proffer of an unconstitutional motive should not defeat the motion for summary judgment. The reasonableness of the conduct is itself substantial evidence in support of the motion and requires in response a particularized proffer of evidence of unconstitutional motive. . . . Accordingly, whether the description heightened is accurate or not, we hold: upon a motion for summary judgment asserting a qualified immunity defense in an action in which an official's conduct is objectively reasonable but an unconstitutional subjective intent is alleged, the plaintiff must proffer particularized evidence of direct or circumstantial facts . . . supporting the claim of an improper motive in order to avoid summary judgment. In our view, the particularized evidence of improper motive may include expressions by the officials involved regarding their state of mind, circumstances suggesting in a substantial fashion that the plaintiff has been singled out, or the highly unusual nature of the actions taken.").

Williams v. Koenigsmann, No. 03 Civ. 5267(SAS), 2004 WL 315279, at *6 (S.D.N.Y. Feb. 18, 2004) ("Suffice it to say that this is not a case where qualified immunity is an appropriate defense. The right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment is a clearly established constitutional right and this Court cannot find, as a matter of law, that it was objectively reasonable for defendants to believe that withholding pain medication and treatment did not violate that right. Defendants either were deliberately indifferent to plaintiff's serious medical needs or they were not. Qualified immunity simply does not come into the picture.").

Rodriguez v. Ghoslaw, No. 98 CIV. 4658(GEL), 2001 WL 755398, at *8, *9 (S.D.N.Y. July 5, 2001) (not reported) ("A conscientious and diligent public officer should not have to fear that his objectively reasonable decisions will subject him to burdensome litigation, and the risk of actual liability, based on the attribution of subjective bad motives inferred from the testimony of hostile parties. Accordingly, the proper inquiry is whether it was objectively reasonable, under the circumstances facing Ghoslaw, for a corrections officer to decide to refrain from immediate action to separate the fighting inmates. If it was, an officer who chose that course of action should be protected from suit by qualified immunity, even if the particular officer might be found by a jury, if the case were tried, to have acted from unconstitutional motives. . . . [C]ertainly, it would not have been 'clear to a reasonable officer that [waiting for backup before attempting to separate struggling inmates] was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' [citing Saucier] The only factual issue for a jury to resolve in assessing whether the action violated the constitution would be not the reasonableness of Ghoslaw's actions, but whether the apparent reasonableness of Ghoslaw's conduct masked a nefarious motive for inaction. While the defendant's motive is crucial to finding a violation of the Eighth Amendment, it is irrelevant to the issue of qualified immunity. The availability of qualified immunity turns upon the objective reasonableness of Ghoslaw's decision to wait for backup, an issue which may be resolved as a matter of law on summary judgment.")

THIRD CIRCUIT

Monteiro v. City of Elizabeth, 436 F.3d 397, 404, 405 (3d Cir. 2006)("Thus, if Perkins-Auguste acted with an intent to suppress Monteiro's speech on the basis of viewpoint, she violated clearly established law and is not entitled to qualified immunity. In cases in which a constitutional violation depends on evidence of a specific intent, 'it can never be objectively reasonable for a government official to act with the intent that is prohibited by law .' Locurto v. Safir, 264 F.3d 154, 169 (2d Cir.2001). Accordingly, the District Court did not err in holding that whether Perkins-Auguste's conduct violated clearly established law depended upon her motivation for ejecting Monteiro from the meeting. Furthermore, it was not error to submit this question to the jury because there was sufficient evidence from which a reasonable jury could conclude that Perkins-Auguste acted with a motive to suppress Monteiro's viewpoint. Although qualified immunity is a question of law determined by the Court, when qualified immunity depends on disputed issues of fact, those issues must be determined by the jury. . . . Motive is a question of fact that must be decided by the jury, which has the opportunity to hear the explanations of both parties in the courtroom and observe their demeanor. . . Monteiro adduced sufficient evidence at trial from which a reasonable jury could conclude that Perkins-Auguste acted with a motive to suppress Monteiro's speech based upon his opposition to the budget.").

Monteiro v. City of Elizabeth, 436 F.3d 407-12 (3d Cir. 2006) (Fisher, J., dissenting) ("The majority characterizes the jury's finding of improper intent as the dispositive inquiry in assessing both the existence of a constitutional violation and entitlement to qualified immunity. This reflects, in my view, a fundamental misunderstanding of the relationship of motive to the First Amendment and the doctrine of qualified immunity. I respectfully dissent. . . . The second stage of the qualified immunity analysis is whether, given the existence of a constitutional violation, a reasonable person should have recognized it under 'clearly established' law. The hypothetical 'reasonable person' is an objective observer, who is aware of the facts known to the official but possesses an independent knowledge of governing legal precepts. . . . Subjective intent plays a limited role in this analysis. It is considered as an element of the underlying claim when the right at issue is predicated on the official's motive, but the presence of improper motive does not preclude qualified immunity. Grant v. City of Pittsburgh, 98 F.3d 116, 124 (3d Cir.1996). An official who has committed a constitutional violation, even one evincing improper intent, will nevertheless be immune from liability if an objective observer in the same position, given the same facts and knowing of the official's improper motive, would not have recognized a constitutional violation under clearly established law. . . The opinion of the majority defines the right at issue in this case too broadly. It states that a public official in Perkins-Auguste's position 'must conform her conduct to the requirements of the First Amendment' and that 'viewpoint-based restrictions violate the First Amendment.' Maj. Op. at 16. These platitudes bear no relationship to the particular circumstances of this case and do little to define the standard governing Perkins-Auguste's conduct. . . The majority cites to no cases discussing whether and when a member of a legislative body may be removed from a public meeting. This failure is understandable, given the dearth of precedent on the issue. . . . I cannot conclude, on this backdrop, that a reasonable official in Perkins-Auguste's position should have realized that her conduct exceeded constitutional bounds. There is no doubt that Monteiro was being disruptive during the meeting and failed to comply with Perkins-Auguste's rulings. . . . His conduct was, in short, antithetical to the legitimate goals of the forum. A reasonable official in the same position as Perkins-Auguste could have concluded, under existing caselaw, that the decision to remove Monteiro was constitutionally justified, regardless of her actual underlying intent. . . She is thus entitled to qualified immunity. . . This conclusion does not cast doubt on the jury's verdict, or its findings that Perkins-Auguste was motivated by a desire to retaliate against Monteiro and that a constitutional violation did occur. That an official is granted qualified immunity does not mean that he or she acted laudably or even constitutionally. To the contrary, an official may act in a morally and legally culpable fashion and yet be entitled to immunity if an objective observer, in the same position, would not have recognized a constitutional infringement . . . The mantle of qualified immunity will be denied to a public official only when a reasonable person in the same situation would have recognized a constitutional infringement. Perkins-Auguste's conduct, even if violative of Monteiro's civil rights, was not so patently unconstitutional under existing caselaw as to deny her immunity. The majority concludes to the contrary. It does so based on a fundamental misinterpretation of the relationship of subjective intent to the First Amendment and the doctrine of qualified immunity. This error will, I fear, have unfortunate ramifications for our jurisprudence in these fields. I respectfully dissent.").

Beers-Capitol v. Whetzel, 256 F.3d 120, 142 (3d Cir. 2001) ("We have determined, however, that the plaintiffs have raised a genuine issue of material fact as to whether Burley was deliberately indifferent. Because deliberate indifference under Farmer requires actual knowledge or awareness on the part of the defendant, a defendant cannot have qualified immunity if she was deliberately indifferent; a reasonable YDC worker could not believe that her actions comported with clearly established law while also believing that there is an excessive risk to the plaintiffs and failing to adequately respond to that risk. Conduct that is deliberately indifferent to an excessive risk to YDC residents cannot be objectively reasonable conduct.").

Larsen v. Senate of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, 154 F.3d 82, 94, 95 (3d Cir. 1998) ("The qualified immunity analysis requires a determination as to whether reasonable officials could believe that their conduct was not unlawful even if it was in fact unlawful. . . In the context of a First Amendment retaliation claim, that determination turns on an inquiry into whether officials reasonably could believe that their motivations were proper even when their motivations were in fact retaliatory. Even assuming that this could be demonstrated under a certain set of facts, it is an inquiry that cannot be conducted without factual determinations as to the officials' subjective beliefs and motivations, and thus cannot properly be resolved on the face of the pleadings, but rather can be resolved only after the plaintiff has had an opportunity to adduce evidence in support of the allegations that the true motive for the conduct was retaliation rather than the legitimate reason proffered by the defendants. . . . In reaching this result we are not suggesting that a bare allegation of retaliatory motive necessarily is sufficient to defeat an assertion of qualified immunity as to a retaliation claim. In some circumstances, the legitimate basis for the actions might be so apparent that the plaintiff's allegations of retaliatory motive could not alter the conclusion that under the circumstances alleged in the pleadings, the defendants would have been compelled to reach the same decision even without regard for the protected First Amendment activity.").

Grant v. City of Pittsburgh, 98 F.3d 116, 124 (3d Cir. 1996) ("The City Defendants claim that under Harlow their subjective 'political or personal motives' are irrelevant to the qualified immunity analysis. The plaintiffs counter that the City Defendants' formulation of the qualified immunity standard would effectively prevent any plaintiff whose constitutional claim has as an essential element the state of mind of the public officials from ever getting past qualified immunity. Although we have not directly addressed this issue, . . . several of our sister circuits have. Those courts have held, with virtual unanimity, that, despite the broad language of Harlow, courts are not barred from examining evidence of a defendant's state of mind in considering whether a plaintiff has adduced sufficient evidence to withstand summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity, where such state of mind is an essential element of the constitutional violation itself. . . . We therefore join our sister circuits in adopting the narrower view of Harlow. Accordingly, in evaluating a defense of qualified immunity, an inquiry into the defendant's state of mind is proper where such state of mind is an essential element of the underlying civil rights claim.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Scinto v. Stansberry, 841 F.3d 219, 236 n.9 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Although we need not reach the issue here, we note once again the 'special problem' of ' "applying an objective qualified immunity standard in the context of an Eighth Amendment claim that is satisfied only by a showing of deliberate indifference"-that is, a knowing violation of the law.'. .Some Circuits have resolved this problem by concluding that qualified immunity is unavailable when the plaintiff presents a genuine dispute of material fact regarding the defendant's deliberate indifference. The Seventh Circuit, for example, has held that the subjective prong of the Farmer test and the objective, clearly established prong of the qualified immunity test 'effectively collapse into one' when the plaintiff raises genuine factual disputes regarding the defendant's deliberate indifference. Walker v. Benjamin, 293 F.3d 1030, 1037 (7th Cir. 2002). That court explained that when a plaintiff raises genuine disputes of fact on Farmer's subjective prong, 'a defendant may not avoid trial on the grounds of qualified immunity' even though qualified immunity protects covered government officials from suit, not merely from liability. . . see also, e.g., Beers-Capitol v. Whetzel, 256 F.3d 120, 142 n.15 (3d Cir. 2001) ("[T]o the extent that the plaintiffs have made a showing sufficient to overcome summary judgment on the merits [of their deliberate indifference claim], they have also made a showing sufficient to overcome any claim to qualified immunity."). But see Estate of Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043, 1049–50 (9th Cir. 2002) (rejecting the view that the deliberate indifference and clearly established inquiries merge).")

Cox v. Quinn, 828 F.3d 227, 238 n.4 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Although we need not reach the issue here, we note that some courts have concluded that it is not necessary to consider the objective reasonableness prong of the qualified immunity inquiry at all when summary judgment is denied on deliberate indifference. See, e.g., Walker v. Benjamin, 293 F.3d 1030, 1037 (7th Cir. 2002); Beers-Capitol v. Whetzel, 256 F.3d 120, 142 n.15 (3d Cir. 2001). Prison officials violate the Eighth Amendment through deliberate indifference if they are aware of a substantial risk of serious harm to an inmate, Farmer, 511 U.S. at 837, yet disregard that risk by taking action that they know to be inappropriate, Parrish, 372 F.3d at 303. In other words, for purposes of deliberate indifference, the Eighth Amendment violation must have been committed knowingly. As we have noted in the past, 'applying an objective qualified immunity standard in the context of an Eighth Amendment claim that is satisfied only by a showing of deliberate indifference' — that is, a knowing violation of the law — presents a 'special problem.' Rish v. Johnson, 131 F.3d 1092, 1098 n.6 (4th Cir. 1997). Accordingly, some of our sister circuits have concluded that deliberately indifferent conduct can never be objectively reasonable for purposes of qualified immunity. See Walker, 293 F.3d at 1037 (holding that deliberate indifference and qualified immunity inquiries 'effectively collapse into one' and that '[i]f there are genuine issues of fact concerning' a defendant's deliberate indifference, the 'defendant may not avoid trial on the grounds of qualified immunity'); Beers-Capitol, 256 F.3d at 142 n.15 ('Conduct that is deliberately indifferent to an excessive risk to [juvenile detention center] residents cannot be objectively reasonable conduct.'). But see Estate of Ford v.Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043, 1049–50 (9th Cir. 2002) (rejecting approach that 'collapses the deliberate indifference part of the constitutional inquiry into the qualified immunity inquiry').")

Williams v. Hansen, 326 F.3d 569, 581 (4th Cir. 2003) ("[W]e are dealing with an alleged equal protection violation predicated on the circumstance that Hansen caused only black officers to be initially interviewed with respect to possible discrimination. In applying Anderson we recognize that cases need not be identical for a public officer to be charged that on the basis of precedent he should have recognized that his conduct violated a right that was clearly established. . . But still it would be a remarkable extension of equal protection principles to hold that the very act of questioning the members of a racial group as to whether they perceived discrimination against the members of that group was in itself unlawful. We are not aware of any case from the Supreme Court or this court that comes close to making such a holding and, in fact, the plaintiffs and the amici curiae do not supply us with any from other jurisdictions. In the circumstances, we cannot reasonably hold that Hansen objectively should have known that his conduct was unlawful when he directed Moyd and Shambley to question only black officers about discrimination against blacks. A reasonable person in Hansen's position was entitled to obtain his legal guidance from law books rather than a crystal ball. Thus, the equal protection right that plaintiffs advance was not clearly established when Hansen directed that the black officers be interviewed and he is entitled to summary judgment on this ground . . . .").

Williams v. Hansen, 326 F.3d 569, 587 (4th Cir. 2003) (King, J., dissenting) ("When Hansen instituted this investigation almost a quarter of a century after the Supreme Court rendered its decision in Arlington Heights, it was eminently well established that a facially neutral administrative action that is undertaken with an intent to discriminate against a particular racial group is forbidden by the Constitution. Accordingly, the district court did not err in denying Hansen qualified immunity from the plaintiffs' equal protection claims. . . . [A] reasonable person in Hansen's position could make no mistake that to adopt with discriminatory animus a facially neutral policy that subjected all and only the African- Americans in his Department to investigation, would be to violate the equal protection rights of the targeted officers.").

Pritchett v. Alford, 973 F.2d 307, 315 (4th Cir. 1992) ("Illegal motive on the officer's part need not also be shown...to defeat a qualified immunity defense to a Fourth Amendment claim which itself has no motive element.").

Blankenship v. Warren County, Va., 918 F. Supp. 970, 975-76 (W.D. Va. 1996) ("The instant civil action alleges that the Sheriff impermissibly terminated the plaintiff based upon gender-based animus, and consideration of the Sheriff's subjective motivation is an integral component to the plaintiff's claim. The Sheriff is not entitled to a dismissal based upon the defense of qualified immunity at this stage in the proceeding. . . . The court believes that where the substantive claim requires inquiry into the subjective motivation of the public official, then a defense on the ground of qualified immunity is best decided on a motion for summary judgment after full discovery has been completed.").

Harris v. Wood, No. CIV A 92-0108, 1994 WL 162556, *5 (W.D. Va. April 22, 1994) (not reported) ("In Collinson, Judge Phillips acknowledged the difficulty encountered by other courts in applying the objective component of the test for qualified immunity because a First Amendment claim turns on both the defendant's subjective intent and on the objective reasonableness of his beliefs. Id. at 1001. The court agrees with Plaintiffs that a genuine issue of material fact surrounds [defendant's] motive in discharging Plaintiffs and that the parties disagree as to the reasons behind the decision. Plaintiffs have provided specific evidence of Defendant's improper motive, and Defendant has failed to convince this court that he would have made the decision regardless of Plaintiffs' speech. Consequently, resolution of this issue shall be in the hands of the reasonable fact-finder. . . .").

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Heaney v. Roberts, 846 F.3d 795, 802 n.3 (5th Cir. 2017) ("Roberts argues that the district court was wrong to assume, as a factual matter, that Roberts acted with improper motive because the 'test for the application of qualified immunity does not involve a look into the subjective intent of the official, but instead looks at what a reasonable official would know or think.' The Supreme Court addressed the issue of unconstitutional motive in Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998). The Court explained that 'although evidence of improper motive is irrelevant on the issue of qualified immunity, it may be an essential component of the plaintiff's affirmative case.' Id. at 589. While Roberts is correct that qualified immunity presents a question of law to be determined by the court, 'when qualified immunity depends on disputed issues of fact, those issues must be determined by the jury.' Monteiro v. City of Elizabeth, 436 F.3d 397, 405 (3d Cir. 2006). Indeed, Crawford-El recognized that that there is a 'wide array of different federal law claims for which an official's motive is a necessary element' and that there should be no heightened burden on plaintiffs at the summary judgment phase to prove improper motive.")

Bird v. Regents of New Mexico State Univ., 619 F. App'x 733, 744 (10th Cir. 2015) ("'When the qualified immunity inquiry turns on a subjective element, as it does when examining motive, the qualified immunity analysis is modified slightly.'. . In this context, '[t]he defendant must do more than merely raise the qualified immunity defense; he must make a prima facie showing of the objective reasonableness of the challenged conduct.'. . If the defendant carries this burden, 'the plaintiff must then produce specific evidence of the defendant's culpable state of mind to survive summary judgment.'")

Lauderdale v. Texas Dept. Of Criminal Justice, Institutional Div., 2007 WL 4465204, at *6 (5th Cir. Dec. 21, 2007) ("Given that actionable sexual harassment under title VII must be 'objectively ... offensive,' . . . such behavior cannot be 'objectively reasonable' for purposes of the qualified immunity inquiry. Thus, qualified immunity can never offer protection for sexual harassment because, if it is actionable at all, the harassment is by definition objectively offensive and unreasonable, and qualified immunity protects only the 'objectively reasonable,' County of Comal, 400 F.3d at 289 (citing Hare, 135 F.3d at 325). Because we have already determined that Arthur's alleged behavior is actionable under title VII and § 1983, we have necessarily determined that such behavior was objectively offensive and, therefore, not objectively reasonable. Thus, he is not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337, 372, 373 (5th Cir. 2004) (en banc) ("We close our discussion of qualified immunity by noting that, contrary to the position asserted by the Police Officials, the district court's review of the reasons for the Police Officials' boycott does not mean that the lower court, or this court, has engaged in a 'subjective' analysis of the type condemned in Harlow. The Police Official's position, apparently, is that they are entitled to qualified immunity as long as there exists some conceivable set of reasons that would have made their actions appropriate. Such factual scenarios doubtless exist. It would have been permissible for the Police Officials to pull their students out of Kinney's and Hall's classes if (for instance) the Police Officials learned that the instructors were unskilled. Therefore, the Police Officials suggest, we necessarily engage in a forbidden 'subjective' inquiry if we take cognizance of a genuine dispute over the reasons for their actions against the instructors. What the defendants' approach would mean, of course, is that there can never be liability for any violation for which the elements include the official's intent or reasons for action. Most § 1983 claims do not include such an element, but First Amendment retaliation claims do: The First Amendment protects employees only from 'termination because of their speech on matters of public concern,'. . . not from termination simpliciter. Similarly, the Constitution forbids officials from discriminating on the basis of race only when their discrimination is intentional. . . In such cases, reading Harlow as forbidding all discussion of intent would allow the qualified immunity defense to preclude recovery even when the law was clearly established, for plaintiffs would be barred from proving an essential legal element of their case.").

Cantu v. Jones, 293 F.3d 839, 845 (5th Cir. 2002) (To extent that jury determined that prison officials had deliberately allowed another prisoner to escape and to perpetrate assault upon plaintiff in retaliation for his act of filing complaints about certain guards, officials were not entitled to qualified immunity from civil rights liability.)

Thompson v. Upshur County, 245 F.3d 447, 459, 460 (5th Cir. 2001) ("At the outset, we highlight the importance of appreciating the difference between the objective reasonableness standard for qualified immunity set forth in Part II, supra, and the subjective deliberate indifference standard for section 1983 liability set forth in Part IV, supra. These standards are often confused. See Hare III, 135 F.3d at 327- 28. Examples of behavior that does (and does not) constitute deliberate indifference are relevant in assessing the scope of clearly established law and, therefore, are relevant in determining whether the defendants' actions were objectively reasonable. Id. However, when the defendant moves for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, it is the plaintiff's burden to demonstrate that all reasonable officials similarly situated would have then known that the alleged acts of the defendants violated the United States Constitution. . . . That is different from the burden of establishing a genuine issue as to the defendant's deliberately indifferent subjective state of mind.When assessing the scope of clearly established law for step two, it is necessary to articulate the asserted constitutional right more specifically.").

Jacobs v. West Feliciana Sheriff's Dep't, 228 F.3d 388, 394 (5th Cir. 2000) ("In Hare III, we explained the somewhat confusing relationship between the deliberate indifference and objective reasonableness standards . . . . [W]e are to determine whether, in light of the facts as viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, the conduct of the individual defendants was objectively unreasonable when applied against the deliberate indifference standard.").

Mendenhall v. Riser, 213 F.3d 226, 231 (5th Cir. 2000) ("[W]e are compelled by our case law that clearly dictates subjective intent, motive, or even outright animus are irrelevant in a determination of qualified immunity based on arguable probable cause to arrest, just as an officer's good intent is irrelevant when he contravenes settled law.").

Tompkins v. Vickers, 26 F.3d 603, 607 (5th Cir. 1994) ("Every Circuit that has considered the question has concluded that a public official's motive or intent must be considered in the qualified immunity analysis where unlawful motivation or intent is a critical element of the alleged constitutional violation." citing cases).

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Bishop v. Hackel, 636 F.3d 757, 772 (6th Cir. 2011) ("A government official performing a discretionary function is entitled to qualified immunity on summary judgment unless the facts, when viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, would permit a reasonable juror to find that: (1) the defendant violated a constitutional right; and (2) the right was clearly established. . . An inmate's right to be free from violence at the hands of other prisoners was clearly established at the time of the alleged constitutional violation. . . Thus, the main issue in this case is whether any of the Deputies violated Bishop's constitutional rights. To raise a cognizable constitutional claim for deliberate indifference to an inmate's safety, an inmate must make a two-part showing: (1) the alleged mistreatment was objectively serious; and (2) the defendant subjectively ignored the risk to the inmate's safety. . . Bishop was young, small, and mentally ill; and he was incarcerated with Floyd, who was jailed for violent felonies including sexual assault. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Bishop, he raises an issue of fact as to whether the alleged mistreatment was objectively serious. Because Bishop raises an issue of fact as to whether Stanley subjectively ignored a risk to his safety, the district court's denial of qualified immunity to him is AFFIRMED. However, because Bishop fails to raise an issue of fact as to whether Harrell, Anderman, or Cantea subjectively ignored a risk to his safety, the district court's denial of qualified immunity to them is REVERSED.")

Center for Bio-Ethical Reform, Inc. v. City of Springboro, 477 F.3d 807, 831 n.16 (6th Cir. 2007) ("As a general rule, a claimant cannot defeat qualified immunity merely by leveling 'bare allegations of malice' against government officials. . . However, 'an essential element of some constitutional claims is a charge that the defendant's conduct was improperly motivated.' Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, 588 (1998). Where improper motivation constitutes an element of the claim–as in the case of Plaintiffs' First Amendment retaliation claims–and the claimant has shown all other elements, a question of fact remains as to the official's intent, thereby precluding summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. Post Crawford-El, it remains an open question whether inquiry into motive 'unrelated to the knowledge of the law' in the Fourth Amendment context can similarly be taken to preclude summary judgment. Because we need not explore Defendants' motivations in detaining Plaintiffs to find that Defendants do not merit the protection of qualified immunity, we leave that question for another day.").

McKee v. Turner, No. 96-3446, 1997 WL 525680, *4 (6th Cir. Aug. 25, 1997) (unpublished) (concluding "that Farmer's deliberate indifference analysis precludes the application of qualified immunity to this case.").

Wright v. Jefferson County Police Department, 14 F.3d 603 (Table), 1993 WL 503748, *3 (6th Cir. 1993) ("The subjective views of the officers are irrelevant for purposes of determining qualified immunity to a section 1983 action based on an unreasonable search and seizure. However, when intent is an element of the substantive claim, the court must examine the officer's intent under a qualified immunity analysis to determine if he has violated 'clearly established' law. . . . Plaintiff's allegation that the officers impounded his van in violation of his equal protection rights requires an analysis of the officers' intent when they impounded the van because intent is an element of an equal protection violation.").

Riccardo v. Rausch, 375 F.3d 521, 526 (7th Cir. 2004) (amending and superseding prior opinion) ("The first two matters (the objective and subjective components of the eighth amendment) are for the jury in the first instance, with appellate review limited to the question whether any reasonable juror could have found that the requisite level of risk existed, and that Rausch knew it. Immunity, however, is a matter of law for the court, to be decided without deference to the jury's resolution–and preferably before the case goes to the jury. . .The district court brushed aside Rausch's invocation of immunity, writing that a guard cannot benefit from immunity if the action taken was not a reasonable response to a risk actually foreseen. That approach, which merges immunity and the merits, is incompatible with Saucier and its predecessors. . . . Immunity protects officials who act at the 'hazy border' . . . between the lawful and the forbidden. That Rausch may have overstepped the line does not mean that every reasonable officer would have been bound to know that Rausch acted improperly. We need not pursue the immunity defense, however, because Saucier calls on appellate courts to address the merits first . . . and Rausch is entitled to prevail outright: no reasonable juror could have concluded, on this record, that Rausch actually recognized that placing Garcia and Riccardo together exposed Riccardo to substantial risk..").

Walker v. Benjamin, 293 F.3d 1030, 1037 (7th Cir. 2002) ("[A] plaintiff claiming an Eighth Amendment violation must show the defendant's actual knowledge of the threat to the plaintiff's health or safety, the defendant's failure to take reasonable measures, and the defendant's subjective intent to harm or deliberate indifference. . . If there are genuine issues of fact concerning those elements, a defendant may not avoid trial on the grounds of qualified immunity.")

Hill v. Shelander, 992 F.2d 714, 717 (7th Cir. 1993) ("[D]espite Harlow's focus on a purely objective inquiry, the plaintiff must be afforded an adequate opportunity to establish intent when it is an element of the alleged constitutional violation. . . . Because [plaintiff] has thus asserted a constitutional claim requiring proof of intent, he must adduce specific factual support for his allegation of bad intent to survive a motion for summary judgment.").

Fiorenzo v. Nolan, 965 F.2d 348, 351-52 (7th Cir. 1992) ("In Wade v. Hegner. . . we held that Harlow requires the district court to conduct a two-part analysis when state of mind is at issue: '(1) Does the alleged conduct set out a constitutional violation? and (2) Were the constitutional standards clearly established at the time in question? ' Id. at 70. Intent is relevant to the first inquiry.").

Auriemma v. Rice, 910 F.2d 1449, 1453 (7th Cir. 1990) (en banc) ("[W]hen intent is crucial to a party's claim...the court's consideration of intent is relevant to the determination of whether a constitutional violation exists but not in deciding if the constitutional standard was clearly established.").

Olech v. Village of Willobrook, No. 97 C 4935, 2002 WL 31317415, at *23, *24 (N.D. Ill. Oct. 10, 2002) (not reported) ("[T]he law establishing class of one equal protection claims was clearly established in 1995. At the time of the alleged actions, both the United States Supreme Court and the Seventh Circuit had held that a municipality could violate an individual's equal protection rights by intentional and different treatment of others who are similarly situated. . . The only question is whether the clearly established right in this Circuit required actions motivated by ill will before a constitutional violation could be established. Although the Supreme Court cases established a 'basic intent' standard, Esmail interpreted those cases to require 'ill will.' However, as explained above, there are disputed fact questions that require a trial on the issue of ill will. Thus, even if the law in 1995, read most favorably to defendants, required ill will as part of a class of one equal protection claim, there is evidence for which a jury could find ill will. Qualified immunity could not be granted at this time because to do so would require the Court to resolve fact questions that are for the jury. . . The only remaining question . . .is whether Saucier applies to this case, as defendants claim (i.e., defendants argue they are entitled to qualified immunity if their decisions were based on 'reasonable mistakes'). We find that the 'reasonable mistake' exception carved out in Saucier cannot be used to establish qualified immunity at this time. If a jury finds intentional 'ill will' based on the disputed issues outlined above, then there can be no 'reasonable mistake' defense to support a qualified immunity defense. Thus, since we have found that there are genuine issues of material fact on the ill will issue, we must find that the defendants' reasonable mistake argument cannot support a qualified immunity defense at this time.").

Jackson v. Gutzmer, 866 F.3d 969, 976-78 (8th Cir. 2017) ("Qualified immunity is an affirmative defense governed by an objective standard in which 'the defendant's subjective intent is simply irrelevant.'. . 'The immunity standard in Harlow itself eliminates all motive-based claims in which the official's conduct did not violate clearly established law.'. . Thus, just as an arresting officer with probable cause to arrest for a particular violation is entitled to qualified immunity even if that was not his motive at the time of arrest, . . . Gutzmer is entitled to qualified immunity if the totality of the circumstances justified use of the restraint board even if Gutzmer erred in believing Jackson was self-injurious when placed on the board. In addition, the district court erred in construing Walker as equating 'punishment' of an inmate with an excessive use of force. 'The punishment of incarcerated prisoners ... effectuates prison management and prisoner rehabilitative goals.... Discipline by prison officials in response to a wide range of misconduct falls within the expected perimeters of the sentence imposed by a court of law.' . . A typical punishment for inmate misconduct is punitive segregation, as in Sandin. But here, because of Jackson's prior misconduct, he was already in the most segregated living unit in the Minnesota prison system. If Jackson's additional misconduct on May 13, 2014 warranted additional discipline, no Eighth Circuit case, and certainly no Supreme Court case, has ever held that such 'punishment' violates the Eighth Amendment. Turning to the merits of the alleged Eighth Amendment violation, the issue of intent that is an element of Jackson's claim is whether undisputed facts establish that force was applied 'in a good-faith effort to maintain or restore discipline,' or whether Lt. Gutzmer applied force 'maliciously and sadistically to cause harm.'. . We have jurisdiction to review whether, viewing the facts in the summary judgment record most favorably to Jackson, he 'identif[ied] affirmative evidence from which a jury could find that [he] carried his ... burden of proving' that Gutzmer's actions reflected a malicious and sadistic motive. . . This issue turns on consideration of far more than whether use of the restraint board was unreasonable because Jackson was not self-injurious. . . As in Burns, we conclude that Jackson presented no evidence whatsoever that Gutzmer's actions 'evinced such wantonness with respect to the unjustified infliction of harm as is tantamount to a knowing willingness that it occur.'. . Jackson argues that, when he was placed on the restraint board, there was no longer a risk of self-injurious behavior, so the evidence demonstrates that Gutzmer placed Jackson on the restraint board 'as punishment for seeking medical attention,' thereby violating the Eighth Amendment. But punishing an inmate 'to preserve internal order and discipline and to maintain institutional security' does not violate the Eighth Amendment . . . unless the punishment or force used is 'repugnant to the conscience of mankind,'. . . like the 'degrading and dangerous' hitching post restraint at issue in Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 745, 122 S.Ct. 2508, 153 L.Ed.2d 666 (2002). Nor is there evidence of prior contacts or relations between Jackson and Gutzmer that would be specific evidence of a malicious motive to harm. . . For these reasons, we conclude that we have jurisdiction over this appeal and the denial of qualified immunity to Lt. Gutzmer must be reversed because the record fails to establish the alleged Eighth Amendment excessive force violation.")

Cullor v. Baldwin, 830 F.3d 830, 837-39 (8th Cir. 2016) ("[W]e have yet to address a deliberate-indifference claim, as in the present case, in which an inmate alleges that prison officials were deliberately indifferent to his objective medical need for dental care by failing to address a shortage of dentists in the prison, thereby subjecting the inmate to needless pain. Other courts, however, have addressed similar claims and granted qualified immunity to prison officials. [surveying cases]

For purposes of this appeal, we will assume that Cullor suffered from an objectively serious medical need. . . But Cullor has failed to establish that Director Baldwin and Dr. Deol deliberately disregarded his need for dentures. . . .Contrary to Cullor's argument, this is not a case in which the defendants are attempting to use costs as a reason for denying constitutionally required medical care. . . .Nor does Cullor dispute that Dr. Deol always offered the maximum salary permitted and sought an increased salary for new dentists with special skills. In that way, Dr. Deol and Director Baldwin 'neither created the ... shortage of dentists nor the general issues with recruitment and retention.'. . As a result, we hold that Director Baldwin and Dr. Deol are entitled to qualified immunity on Cullor's deliberate-indifference claim.")

Borgman v. Kedley, 646 F.3d 518, 523, 524 (8th Cir. 2011) ("Arguable probable cause exists even where an officer mistakenly arrests a suspect believing it is based in probable cause if the mistake is 'objectively reasonable.'. . . Kedley's subjective motivations in arresting Borgman are irrelevant to the qualified immunity analysis. . . For that reason, even if Kedley had been subjectively motivated to arrest her for refusing to sign the readvisement form, it would not affect the arguable probable cause analysis.")

Gardner v. Board of Police Com'rs, for Kansas City, Mo., 641 F.3d 947, 953 (8th Cir. 2011) ("Given th[e] legal landscape, we think it was not clearly established as of September 2007 that an officer in Missouri could effect a seizure under the Fourth Amendment without subjectively intending to do so. Ritchie was therefore not on clear notice that he must conform his conduct–including conduct that was a foreseeable consequence of his medical condition–to a rule that might result in liability under the Fourth Amendment for actions that he did not subjectively intend. He is entitled to qualified immunity if the state of the law did not allow him reasonably to anticipate that his conduct may give rise to liability for damages. . . For these reasons, we conclude that the district court erred in denying Ritchie's motion for summary judgment on Gardner's Fourth Amendment claim without considering Ritchie's subjective intent. The district court should determine whether the evidence, viewed in the light most favorable to Gardner, would support a finding by a reasonable jury that Ritchie subjectively intended to effect a seizure of Gardner by firing his weapon. If not, then Ritchie is entitled to qualified immunity. The portion of the district court's order denying Ritchie's motion for summary judgment on the § 1983 claim is vacated, and the case is remanded for further proceedings.").

Mathers v. Wright, 636 F.3d 396, 401 (8th Cir. 2011) ("Wright complains that the district court erred in emphasizing her subjective intent in its qualified immunity analysis, particularly with respect to its finding of malice. The subjective intent of the actor is generally irrelevant to the objective reasonableness test at the heart of the qualified immunity analysis. . . Here, however, the actor's subjective intent is relevant to determine whether the mistreatment was intentional, as required to state a cognizable class-of-one claim. . . To the extent that the district court considered Wright's subjective intent, it did so in determining whether a constitutional violation occurred, not whether the right at issue was clearly established. Accordingly, Wright's objection that the district court improperly emphasized subjective intent fails.")

McClendon v. Story County Sheriff's Office, 403 F.3d 510, 515 (8th Cir. 2005) ("An officer's subjective intent is irrelevant to the question of whether her or his conduct violated a constitutional right by exceeding the scope of a warrant. Indeed, an officer's subjective intent is never relevant under a Fourth Amendment analysis, so long as an objective basis for the seizure exists. . . Yet, the district court found a genuine issue as to whether a constitutional violation occurred based solely on the Defendants' possible subjective intent. . . Even if we assume, arguendo, that McCaskey and Rogers seized the entire herd solely to punish McClendon for attempting to thwart the seizure, this cannot negate the uncontested fact that two professionals, Dr. Houlding and Nicole Snider, recommended removal of all the horses. On this basis alone, the decision of the district court warrants reversal.").

Coleman v. Parkman, 349 F.3d 534, 538 n.2 (8th Cir. 2003) (noting Athe difficulty courts have experienced when evaluating Saucier's second step in deliberate indifference cases. E.g., Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043, 1049-1053 (9th Cir.2002); Walker v. Benjamin, 293 F.3d 1030, 1037 (7th Cir.2002); see, e.g., Jacobs v. West Feliciana Sheriff's Dep't, 228 F.3d 388, 394 (5th Cir.2000).").

Thomas v. Talley, 251 F.3d 743, 746 (8th Cir. 2001) ("The Supreme Court has recently made it clear . . . that the subjective intent that Harlow eliminated from consideration differs from intent that is 'an essential component of [a] plaintiff's affirmative case,' Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, 589 (1998). In considering a qualified immunity defense, a court cannot disregard evidence of the intent that is an element of the plaintiff's case because if it did so the plaintiff could not show that the defendant violated clearly established law. . . Because evidence of improper motive is an essential component of Mr. Thomas's affirmative case, we conclude that when ruling on Captain Talley's motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, the district court was indeed required to consider the evidence of Captain Talley's intent to discriminate.").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Rodriguez v. County of Los Angeles, 891 F.3d 776, 796-97 (9th Cir. 2018) ("The deputies who used tasers. . . contend that they are entitled to qualified immunity because the law governing the use of tasers was not clearly established in 2008. We disagree. 'An officer is not entitled to qualified immunity on the grounds that the law is not clearly established every time a novel method is used to inflict injury.'. . This statement applies with particular strength in the context of the Eighth Amendment. A plaintiff cannot prove an Eighth Amendment violation without showing that force was employed 'maliciously and sadistically' for the purpose of causing harm. . . Even if particularized notice, specific to tasers, were needed at the time Deputies Sanford, Vazquez, and Delgado acted, . . . controlling circuit and Supreme Court case law provided it. [collecting cases] Deputies Sanford, Vazquez, and Delgado argue that limits on the proper use of tasers were still unclear as of 2008, relying on two Fourth Amendment cases decided after the cell extractions at issue in this case: Mattos v. Agarano, 661 F.3d 433 (9th Cir. 2011) (en banc), and Bryan v. MacPherson, 630 F.3d 805 (9th Cir. 2010). Mattos and Bryan clarified the circumstances under which taser use would violate the Fourth Amendment and granted qualified immunity to the officers who acted without the benefit of this clarification. . . However, the deputies' argument fails to acknowledge the respective standards for Fourth and Eighth Amendment violations. . . We determine whether the Fourth Amendment has been violated by assessing the objective reasonableness of the force used, balancing the degree of intrusion against the government's interest. . . By contrast, subjective intent is critical in an Eighth Amendment analysis. More than de minimis force applied for no good faith law enforcement purpose violates the Eighth Amendment. . . Objective reasonableness may inform the Eighth Amendment inquiry, providing evidence of good faith or of malice. . . But once a jury has determined on the basis of sufficient evidence that 'prison officials maliciously and sadistically use[d] [more than de minimis] force to cause harm, contemporary standards of decency,' and thus the Eighth Amendment, 'always are violated.'. . Here, the evidence amply supported the jury's finding that the deputies acted maliciously and sadistically.")

Chism v. Washington State, 661 F.3d 380, 393 & n.15 (9th Cir. 2011) (amending panel opinion and denying reh'g en banc) ("In light of Branch, Liston, and Hervey, we conclude that 'every "reasonable official would have understood"' that the Chisms had a constitutional right to not be searched and arrested as a result of judicial deception. . . We therefore hold that the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In judicial deception cases, our qualified immunity analysis at the summary judgment stage is swallowed by the question of reckless or intentional disregard for the truth. . . We have explained that this 'merger' is sensible because 'no reasonable officer could believe that it is constitutional to act dishonestly or recklessly with regard to the basis for probable cause in seeking a warrant. Accordingly, should a factfinder find against an official on this state-of-mind question, qualified immunity would not be available as a defense.'").

Norse v. City Of Santa Cruz, 629 F.3d 966, 974, 977 (9th Cir. 2010) (en banc) ("A mayor's entitlement to qualified immunity for ejecting a person from a city council meeting 'depends on whether a reasonable person in his position, acting on his information and motivated by his purpose, would have known that ejecting [the attendee] violated his clearly established rights.'. . The DVDs show triable issues of fact as to whether Norse was impermissibly ejected because of his viewpoint rather than his alleged disruptiveness. . . . In this case, we are dealing with city officials who ejected one individual from City Council meetings. . . . [T]he decisions to expel Norse were administrative, not legislative, so the defendants are not entitled to absolute immunity.")

Norse v. City Of Santa Cruz, 629 F.3d 966, 979 (9th Cir. 2010) (en banc) (Kozinski, CJ., joined by Reinhardt, J., concurring) ("I join Judge Thomas's opinion because it's clearly right. I write only to observe that, even after the procedural irregularities that deprived Norse an opportunity to present evidence, it's clear that the council members aren't entitled to qualified immunity. In the Age of YouTube, there's no need to take my word for it: There is a video of the incident that I'm 'happy to allow ... to speak for itself.' Scott v. Harris, 550 U.S. 372, 378 n.5 (2007); see http://www.youtube.com/watch?v' ZOssHWB6WBI (last visited Nov. 16, 2010). This video (also found in the record) clearly shows that Norse's sieg heil was momentary and casual, causing no disruption whatsoever. It would have remained entirely unnoticed, had a city council-man not interrupted the proceedings to take umbrage and insist that Norse be cast out of the meeting. Councilman Fitzmaurice clearly wants Norse expelled because the 'Nazi salute' is 'against the dignity of this body and the decorum of this body' and not because of any disruption. But, unlike der Führer, government officials in America occasionally must tolerate offensive or irritating speech.")

Prison Legal News v. Lehman, 397 F.3d 692, 703 (9th Cir. 2005) ("The district court correctly held that the DOC regulation prohibiting mail that could create a risk of violence and physical harm to any person is constitutional on its face. . .The question presented in this case is whether the prison officials applied this rule in a fashion that is unconstitutional. Because we must, for purposes of this appeal, accept the facts as laid out by PLN, we cannot determine on this record whether the prison officials are entitled to qualified immunity. PLN contends that the DOC's policy was applied by the prison officials in a manner that singled out PLN for discriminatory treatment, while allowing other publishers to deliver similar material. PLN challenges the DOC's refusal to deliver more than one hundred specific legal documents. PLN suggests that the real motive of the prison officials who prevented third-party legal materials from being delivered was to suppress materials that embarrass the DOC and educate inmates on how to file their claims. Although an improper motive ordinarily will not defeat a request for qualified immunity, . . . if the policy were applied in a discriminatory fashion based on the content of the material, this would clearly violate PLN's First Amendment rights. . . Accordingly, we hold that the prison officials are not entitled to qualified immunity regarding PLN's claim that they violated its constitutional rights in banning the receipt of the third-party legal materials.").

Covington v. Fairman, No. 03-17003, 03-17004, 2004 WL 2823307, at * 6, *7 (9th Cir. Dec. 9, 2004) (Brunetti, J., dissenting) (not published) ("Because I do not believe that the extraction officers used excessive force in violation of Covington's Eighth Amendment rights, the supervisors therefore cannot be held liable.. . . Even if I assume that under the facts of this case all Defendants engaged in conduct that violated Covington's Eighth Amendment rights, all Defendants would still be entitled to qualified immunity under the second step of Saucier. . . . I do not dispute that as of September 2, 1998, it was clearly established that a wanton beating by a prison official amounted to a violation of a prisoner's Eighth Amendment rights. However, under this step, the inquiry is whether it was clearly established that the force applied during a cell extraction under these circumstances would have been known by a reasonable officer to be wanton and unnecessary. While it was clearly established in September 1998 that prisoners were entitled to be free from wanton beatings, it was equally clearly established in September 1998 that at times prison officials may have to apply force to prisoners in order to restore or maintain discipline. . . It was certainly not clearly established at this time that kicking and punching during a cell extraction, especially when the use of force was necessary, would be characterized as a wanton beating and an Eighth Amendment violation. Under the circumstances detailed above, a reasonable officer would have believed that force was necessary and lawful to extract Covington from his cell. A reasonable officer would also suspect that this force might include punching and kicking. Importantly, the extraction officers did not use weapons such as tasers or guns to subdue Covington. Further evidence that the force applied was reasonable under the circumstances is that the injuries resulting from these punches and kicks were very minor. Under the Hudson and Whitley parameters, which allow prison officials certain leeway in order to maintain prison discipline, I cannot conclude that the extraction officers acted unreasonably and beyond those parameters. . . .The majority relies on Covington's allegations that he was repeatedly hit in his groin to bolster the conclusion that the force applied was excessive. However, neither the Supreme Court nor this court have ever held that a prison official's punching or kicking in the groin is a per se Eighth Amendment violation. Indeed, this conduct must be considered in light of the entire factual context. The groin allegations occurred in the heat of a cell extraction, with punches and kicks inevitably flying. The panel may decide today that that type of force should never be allowed. However, we have yet to reach such a conclusion. Because the officers were not put on notice that any physical force applied to the groin would be considered per se excessive force, the officers were reasonable in their actions. . . . Even if I were to agree that some of the minimal force used in this cell extraction was unnecessary, the conduct of the extraction officers and the supervisors demonstrates that they acted in good faith and any mistake made by the officers as to the amount of force necessary was reasonable, in light of all of the circumstances. By the time the extraction officers entered the cell, events had escalated such that it was probable that force would be used to remove Covington from the cell. Force was in fact used, but Covington's injuries suggest it was minimal and did not exceed the amount that was necessary. If there was some punching or kicking that could conceivably be considered excessive, this conduct would be a reasonable mistake made in the furtherance of restoring discipline and was not done to maliciously harm Covington.").

Torres v. Runyon, No. 02-15273, 2003 WL 22598339, at *1, *2 (9th Cir. Nov. 6, 2003) (unpublished) ("In a recent case, Marquez v. Gutierrez, supra, we applied Saucier to an excessive use of force claim and underscored the significance of analyzing the constitutional right apart from qualified immunity. . . Specifically, even if Torres might establish an excessive use of force, Runyon still may be entitled to qualified immunity for reasonable conduct under the circumstances he faced. . . . Accepting Torres' version of the facts, which placed him on the ground as a victim of other inmates' assaults, a reasonable fact finder might view Runyon's use of deadly force against Torres as an act that violated Torres' Eighth Amendment right. . . However, there is no evidence that Runyon knew Torres nor carried any animus toward him. At most, Runyon may have been negligent in shooting the wrong person. But we need not resolve this issue because we find Runyon's conduct was reasonable under the following analysis. . . . From his viewpoint in the observation tower, Runyon believed that the inmates on the ground were defenseless as they received kicks and blows from other inmates. And the evidence is uncontradicted that Runyon aimed at and intended to shoot the inmate whom he saw kicking an unconscious inmate to death, whether or not he hit the wrong person or was mistaken about which person was hit. . . . We cannot say that Runyon's conduct was unreasonable under the circumstances. Therefore, Runyon is entitled to qualified immunity from the Torres estate's claims arising out of the prison yard shooting.")

Marquez v. Gutierrez, 322 F.3d 689, 692, 693 (9th Cir. 2003) ("To shoot a passive, unarmed inmate standing near a fight between other inmates, none of whom was armed, when no inmate was in danger of great bodily harm, would inflict unnecessary and wanton pain. . . Even though there would be a constitutional violation if Marquez were to prove the facts that he posits, Gutierrez may nevertheless be entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable officer could have believed his conduct was lawful. . . . Marquez argues that a prison official cannot act maliciously and sadistically while, at the same time, reasonably believing that his actions conform to clearly established law. However, this argument is the same argument that the Supreme Court rejected in Saucier, and that we rejected in Estate of Ford. . . . Accordingly, Gutierrez's claim of qualified immunity is not defeated simply because a triable issue of fact exists as to whether his decision to shoot Marquez was malicious. Even if Gutierrez's beliefs that Marquez was involved in the kicking incident and that Perez was in danger of serious harm were mistaken, he can still be entitled to qualified immunity. A reasonable official standing where Gutierrez was standing–that is, in a tower located 360 feet away from the disturbance–could perceive that both Marquez and another inmate were kicking Perez and threatening Perez with serious injury or death, and that Perez was not capable of protecting himself, even if no kick was actually administered by Marquez. The scenario may look different when gauged against the "20/20 vision of hindsight," but we must look at the situation as a reasonable officer in Gutierrez's position could have perceived it. . . In that light, we believe that a reasonable officer could believe that shooting one inmate in the leg to stop an assault that could have seriously injured or killed another inmate was a good faith effort to restore order, and thus lawful.").

Estate of Ford v. Ramirez-Palmer, 301 F.3d 1043, 1045 (9th Cir. 2002) (Hamilton has been undermined by Saucier; AEven though the constitutional issue turns on the officers' state of mind (here, deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of serious harm), courts must still consider whether–assuming the facts in the injured party's favor–it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful.")

Clement v. Gomez, 298 F.3d 898, 906 (9th Cir. 2002) (" The general law regarding the medical treatment of prisoners was clearly established at the time of the incident. . . Furthermore, it was also clearly established that the officers could not intentionally deny or delay access to medical care. . . While a resolution of the factual issues may well relieve the prison officials of any liability in this case, if the prisoners' version of the facts were to prevail at trial, a jury might conclude that the officers were deliberately indifferent to such needs during the four-hour period after the incident. Various supervisory officials may also have been deliberately indifferent to obvious risks of injury. Under such circumstances, the officials' actions are not protected by qualified immunity.").

Butler v. Elle, 281 F.3d 1014, 1024 (9th Cir. 2002) ("[O]ur cases effectively intertwine the qualified immunity question (1) whether a reasonable officer should have known that he acted in violation of a plaintiff's constitutional rights with (2) the substantive recklessness or dishonesty question. This merger is ultimately appropriate because, as Branch and Hervey recognize, no reasonable officer could believe that it is constitutional to act dishonestly or recklessly with regard to the basis for probable cause in seeking a warrant. Accordingly, should a factfinder find against an official on this state-of-mind question, qualified immunity would not be available as a defense. On the other hand, should the fact-finder find at trial in the officer's favor, i.e., that he did not act dishonestly or recklessly, that officer's conduct would not have violated any clearly established statutory or constitutional rights. In this regard, because the two issues merge, there need be no separate inquiry at trial, and no discrete instructions, on whether Elle is entitled to qualified immunity. If he was reckless or deceitful in preparing the warrant affidavit, then he both violated Butler's rights and is not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Meeks v. Gomez, No. 96-15625, 1997 WL 51518, at *2 (9th Cir. Feb. 21, 1997) (unpublished) ("A public official cannot both be 'deliberately indifferent'. . . and at the same time reasonably believe that his conduct conforms to clearly established law. . . . The district court correctly concluded that the existence of a triable issue of fact as to deliberate indifference precluded granting defendants' motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds.").

Alexander v. City and County of San Francisco, 29 F.3d 1355, 1364 (9th Cir. 1994) ("Defendants have not shown that a reasonable officer could have believed that entry with intent to arrest would not violate clearly established law. Thus summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity would be inappropriate if the intent was to arrest or if facts as to intent are in dispute. A genuine dispute exists as to whether or not defendants ordered the storming of the house primarily for the purpose of arresting [decedent]. The fact that this dispute turns on an essentially subjective element (the officers' purpose), while qualified immunity involves an inquiry into 'objective reasonableness' does not mean that qualified immunity is any more or less available in this context than it would otherwise be. . . In short, the factual issues in this case must be decided by a jury before any determination of qualified immunity can be made.").

Hamilton v. Endell, 981 F.2d 1062, 1066 (9th Cir. 1992) ("A finding of deliberate indifference necessarily precludes a finding of qualified immunity; prison officials who deliberately ignore the serious medical needs of inmates cannot claim that it was not apparent to a reasonable person that such actions violated the law.").

Vaden v. Summerhill , No. CIV S-06-1836 GEB KJM P, 2008 WL 4370061, at *10 (E.D. Cal. Sept. 24, 2008) ("Because the point at which a risk to an inmate becomes a substantial risk of serious harm for Eighth Amendment purposes is ill-defined and because St. Andre's actions fall into this hazy area, he is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Coyle v. Cambra, No. C 02-1810 SBA PR, 2005 WL 2397517, at *15 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 27, 2005) ("Plaintiff alleges that Defendants were responsible for the over six-month delay in his receiving an orthopedic consultation, in violation of his Eighth Amendment rights. Although the law was clearly established that delay and interference with medical care can violate an inmate's Eighth Amendment rights, the law does not specifically state the exact amount of delay that would rise to the level of an Eighth Amendment violation. . . . And though it is not necessary to find a case with the exact same fact pattern (e.g., six-month delay in receiving an orthopedic consultation) to hold that Defendants breached a clearly established duty, more specificity as to the amount of delay in receiving an orthopedic consultation must be shown, before the Court could find that Defendants violated clearly established law. Applying Estate of Ford here, it would not have been clear to a reasonable prison official that a six-month delay in Plaintiff receiving an orthopedic consultation would expose Plaintiff to a substantial risk of serious harm. The circumstances in the instant case include a temporary suspension of the Orthopedic Specialty Clinic, however, reasonable alternatives were available for Plaintiff's routine medical care, including specialty medical care through the use of Telemedicine. Therefore, a reasonable prison officer would not necessarily have drawn the inference that Plaintiff would not be able to receive adequate medical care with the aforementioned plan for emergency medical care that was implemented in place of the Orthopedic Specialty Clinic. Because the law did not put Defendants on notice that their conduct would be clearly unlawful, summary judgment based on qualified immunity is appropriate.").

Moreno v. City of Sacramento, No. CIV-S-01-0725DFLDAD, 2005 WL 2016910, at *3, *4 (E.D. Cal. Aug. 19, 2005) ("[D]efendants argue that even though the Ninth Circuit found violations of clearly established constitutional law, that does not foreclose a finding by the court that a reasonable officer would not understand that his conduct violated the law on the specific facts presented in this case. . . Additionally, they assert that the individual defendants' personal knowledge of the relevant law is pertinent to this qualified immunity inquiry. . .They seek to introduce additional testimony from Pino, Vanella, and Fernandez on the following topics: (1) their general reliance on the city attorney for their knowledge of the law; (2) their efforts to keep up with developments in the law; and (3) their understanding and reading of the relevant case law. Defendants' arguments are premised on a misunderstanding of the qualified immunity inquiry. The qualified immunity analysis contains only two steps: (1) was there a constitutional violation? and (2) if so, was the violation clearly established? . . . Although defendants correctly note that a court must analyze whether a reasonable officer would understand that his actions were unconstitutional on the facts of the present case, that inquiry is subsumed within the 'clearly established' analysis. As the Supreme Court has held, 'the relevant, dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' . . Therefore, when the Ninth Circuit held that the constitutional violations were clearly established, it found that a reasonable officer, confronted with the alleged facts of this particular case, would be on notice that his actions were unconstitutional. Accordingly, defendants' assertion that a reasonable officer would not have understood that his actions were unconstitutional on the specific facts is foreclosed by the Ninth Circuit's ruling. Defendants' request for additional testimony is equally misplaced. The qualified immunity analysis is objective, not subjective. . . . Thus, the individual defendants' personal knowledge of the law and their efforts to stay abreast of changes in the law is irrelevant to this constitutional inquiry. In fact, the Supreme Court rejected a subjective component of the qualified immunity inquiry for the very purpose of preventing the need for testimony from individual officers as to their state of mind, subjective motivation, and knowledge of the law.").

Nelson v. California DOC, No. C 02-5476 SI(PR), 2004 WL 569529, at 8-10 (C.D. Cal. Mar. 18, 2004) ("Applying Estate of Ford here, it would not have been clear to a reasonable prison official when the risk of harm from being required to live in and exercise in just underwear-changed from being a risk of some (or even any) harm, to a substantial risk of serious harm to the inmate's health. Although the law was clearly established that depriving an inmate of outdoor exercise on a long-term basis violated the Eighth Amendment, and although the law was clearly established that depriving an inmate of adequate clothing violated the Eighth Amendment, the law was not very well fleshed out on amount of clothing required to avoid an Eighth Amendment violation. Although the court earlier in this decision found that requiring an inmate to live in his underwear for five months was sufficiently serious to establish the first prong of an Eighth Amendment claim, the court recognizes the dearth of authority on the specific point of how much clothing must be given to an inmate. . . . A reasonable prison official understanding that he could not be deliberately indifferent to a serious risk to inmate health could know that Nelson spent five months in no clothes other than boxer shorts and a t-shirt and know that he had only those clothes to wear when he exercised in the occasionally cold weather but reasonably perceive that Nelson's exposure to any harm was not that high when (1) Nelson spent the vast majority of his time in a climate- controlled environment, (2) Nelson was allowed, but not required, to go outside for an exercise period for up to 3-1/2 hours at a time, (3) the temperature was in the 34-50 degree range on some days, (3) notwithstanding his complaints that it was cold and he was in bad health, Nelson continued to choose to go outside for the exercise period even though he had the option to remain indoors. . . . The information available to defendants did not make it so clear that Nelson would be in pain or face a serious risk to his health while inside his cell or during the six hours of exercise each week that no reasonable officer would have let him remain in just his underwear. Because the law did not put defendants on notice that their conduct would be clearly unlawful, summary judgment based on qualified immunity is appropriate").

Mooring v. San Francisco Sheriff's Dep't., 289 F.Supp.2d 1110, 1120 (N.D. Cal. 2003) ("Applying Estate of Ford here, it would not have been clear to a reasonable prison official when the risk of harm from housing an inmate in a cell containing Soreno gang members when the inmate said he had 'gang affiliation' concerns but did not identify himself as a Norteno gang member specifically and was not known to the official to be from the Norteno gang changed from being a risk of some (or even any) harm, to a substantial risk of serious harm from one of those inmates. A reasonable prison official understanding that he could not recklessly disregard a serious risk to inmate safety could know that Mooring said he had gang affiliation concerns and objected to the cell placement but reasonably perceive that Mooring's exposure to any harm was not that high when there was no evidence of a specific threat from the inmates in cell E to Mooring.

Because the law did not put Gonzalez on notice that his conduct would be clearly unlawful, summary judgment based on qualified immunity is appropriate. . . Gonzalez met his burden of proof in his moving papers. Mooring did not introduce evidence to show the existence of a genuine issue of fact on the defense. Gonzalez is entitled to judgment as a matter of law on the qualified immunity defense.").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Cox v. Glanz, 800 F.3d 1231, 1248-54 (10th Cir. 2015) ("The requisite showing of an 'affirmative link' between a supervisor and the alleged constitutional injury has '[come] to have three related prongs: (1) personal involvement, (2) sufficient causal connection, and (3) culpable state of mind.'. .Admittedly, '[t]he contours of ... supervisory liability are still somewhat unclear after [the Supreme Court decided] Iqbal, which "articulated a stricter liability standard for ... personal involvement."'. . . Our clearly-established-law analysis centers on whether the controlling cases 'show that [Sheriff Glanz] took the alleged actions with the requisite state of mind.' . . This state of mind '"can be no less than the mens rea required" of [any of his] subordinates [i.e., Jail employees] to commit the underlying constitutional violation.'. . Importantly, as our discussion of the pertinent governing caselaw . . . demonstrates, this is a particularized state of mind: actual knowledge by a prison official of an individual inmate's substantial risk of suicide. . . .Our review of relevant caselaw postdating Hocker and Barrie indicates that the foregoing state of the law in our circuit—which required prison officials to possess knowledge that a specific inmate presents a substantial risk of suicide—had not changed in material respects by July 2009. We are not aware of any controlling Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decisions that directly answer this clearly-established-law inquiry. However, our view of the requirements of the clearly established law extant when Mr. Jernegan committed suicide (July 2009) does find some support in the Supreme Court's recent decision in Taylor v. Barkes, —— U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 2042 (2015) (per curiam), where the Court resolved a deliberate-indifference dispute on the clearly-established-law prong of the qualified-immunity standard. There, the Court held that, as of November 2004, there was no clearly established 'right' of an inmate to be adequately screened for suicide. . . The Taylor Court emphatically stated that '[n]o decision of this Court even discusses suicide screening or prevention protocols.'. . Taylor teaches us that, as of November 2004, there was no constitutional right to such screening or protocols. . .Consequently, in November 2004, a jail's nonexistent or deficient suicide-screening measures would not have necessarily indicated that an individual prisoner's suicide was the product of deliberate indifference in violation of the Eighth Amendment. In light of Taylor, our reading of the contours of the law a short five years later should not be surprising. That is, irrespective of the alleged deficiencies in the Jail's suicide-screening protocols, in order for any defendant, including Sheriff Glanz, to be found to have acted with deliberate indifference, he needed to first have knowledge that the specific inmate at issue presented a substantial risk of suicide. Moreover, though not dispositive, our limited corpus of nonprecedential jail-suicide decisions supports our reading of the state of the law when Mr. Jernegan committed suicide. . . .At bottom, when confronting individual-capacity § 1983 claims, our 'focus must always be on the defendant—on the ... injury he inflicted or caused to be inflicted, and on his motives. This is because § 1983 isn't a strict liability offense.'. . As noted, Sheriff Glanz had no personal interaction with Mr. Jernegan or direct and contemporaneous knowledge of his treatment in July 2009. Therefore, insofar as he had knowledge sufficient to form the requisite mental state, it would have had to necessarily come from his subordinates, notably Ms. Taylor or Ms. Sampson. Because they did not possess such knowledge, the conclusion inexorably follows that Sheriff Glanz could not have possessed such knowledge. Accordingly, though we have not ignored Ms. Cox's strong assertions regarding the systemic failings of the Jail's mental-health screening and treatment protocols, which quite understandably troubled the district court, we conclude that Ms. Cox has nevertheless failed to establish that Sheriff Glanz acted as to Mr. Jernegan with the requisite mental state to constitute deliberate indifference. In other words, she has not carried her burden regarding the essential subjective component of the deliberate-indifference standard. In sum, for the reasons stated, we cannot conclude that Sheriff Glanz's conduct constituted an Eighth Amendment violation under the law that was clearly established at the time of Mr. Jernegan's death. Therefore, Ms. Cox cannot satisfy the clearly-established-law component of the qualified-immunity standard. We must accordingly reverse the district court's denial of qualified immunity to the Sheriff on Ms. Cox's individual-capacity claim under § 1983.")

Shrum v. City of Coweta, Oklahoma, 449 F.3d 1132, 1145 (10th Cir. 2006) ("Chief Palmer does not dispute that it was clearly established that non-neutral state action imposing a substantial burden on the exercise of religion violates the First Amendment. If Officer Shrum's factual allegations are correct–that he was singled out precisely because of Chief Palmer's knowledge of his religious commitment–then Chief Palmer's claim of qualified immunity must fail. Only if the finder of fact ultimately concludes, as a matter of fact, that Chief Palmer had a neutral basis for his personnel actions, does he have a defense. This is thus a case where the claim of qualified immunity collapses into the merits. The district court was correct to hold that it should proceed to trial on the free exercise claim.").

Mimics v. Village of Angel Fire, 394 F.3d 836, 848 (10th Cir. 2005) ("In the context of a summary judgment motion on a qualified immunity defense to a claim involving the defendant's state of mind, the defendant must first show that the challenged conduct was objectively reasonable. . . Because this court has determined that there is evidence Hasford's entries into MIMICS on December 20, 1996 and January 16, 1997 were not objectively reasonable, we need not conduct any further analysis. Construing the evidence in the Wildgrubes' favor, as we must do on summary judgment, Hasford has failed, at least at this point in the proceedings, to establish that he is entitled to qualified immunity on the Wildgrubes' First Amendment claim.").

Beard v. City of Northglenn, 23 F.3d 110, 114-15 (10th Cir. 1994) (White, Associate Justice (Ret.)) ("If the court had addressed itself to the proper Fourth Amendment question, it would have found its resolution of that question would have also dictated its conclusion on the second portion of the qualified immunity test. If, after all, a claimant is able to prove the necessary deliberate falsehood or reckless disregard to impeach a facially valid warrant, the reasonableness inquiry has to be resolved against the defendant since no reasonably competent officer could believe an arrest legal where it was his deliberate or reckless deception that led the magistrate into issuing the warrant. Conversely, if a plaintiff cannot prove a Fourth Amendment violation, there is no need to proceed any further; the case ends in defendant's favor. It is clear from this analysis that the trial court's conclusion that the officers violated appellant's Fourth Amendment rights and still acted reasonably is untenable. To reach such a conclusion under the correct Fourth Amendment standard would require a court to hold the knowing or reckless disregard of the truth in an arrest affidavit–the ultimate act of unreason– reasonable as a matter of law.").

Gallegos v. City and County of Denver, 984 F.2d 358, 363-64 (10th Cir. 1993) ("The 'objective reasonableness' standard set forth in Harlow often rests on a determination of whether the defendant's conduct can be traced to the subjective element of impermissible motive or intent."), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 2962 (1993).

Estate of Dixon v. Bd. of Cty. Commissioners of Crowley Cty., No. 15-CV-02727-NYW, 2017 WL 1684134, at *3 (D. Colo. May 3, 2017) ("Nor does the court's ruling on the Motions to Dismiss otherwise dispose of the qualified immunity analysis on summary judgment. The qualified immunity inquiry at the motion to dismiss phase and at the summary judgment phase are separate and distinct—notably, Plaintiffs carry different burdens. On a motion to dismiss, the court determines whether the complaint's factual allegations state a plausible constitutional claim, not whether the complaint contains all the necessary factual allegations to sustain a conclusion that Defendants violated clearly established law. See Robbins v. Oklahoma, 519 F.3d 1242, 1249 (10th Cir. 2008). At summary judgment, 'the record must clearly demonstrate the plaintiff[s] ha[ve] satisfied [their] heavy two-part burden,' i.e., that Defendants violated Mr. Dixon's clearly established constitutional rights. . . Accordingly, the court's conclusion at the motion to dismiss phase that dismissal is not warranted based on the pleadings does not necessarily translate into a determination that Plaintiffs have carried their burden to overcome qualified immunity on summary judgment.")

Richard v. City of Wichita, No. 15-1279-EFM-KGG, 2016 WL 5341756, at *6 (D. Kan. Sept. 23, 2016) ("The Court takes these three cases with similar facts to show that the question of reasonableness is a very fact-specific inquiry. As alleged, the instant case is a close one. And usually in close cases such as this, reasonableness is properly a question for a jury. . . In Allen, Hastings, and Bleck, the Tenth Circuit determined whether summary judgment was appropriate. But here, Defendants are not arguing that this close case should be decided in their favor on summary judgment. Rather, they are arguing that Plaintiff fails to state a plausible claim upon which relief can be granted. Accordingly, their motion must be denied. Stacy was emotionally disturbed and considering suicide. His wife had called for help. He was alone in the house. Officers entered his home and issued forceful commands. It is plausible that these commands caused Stacy to become more distressed. Stacy was not suspected of committing a crime, and he did not pose any immediate danger to others when he was alone in his house. Given these facts, Plaintiff has stated a plausible claim for relief. The Court recognizes that Defendants may have colorable arguments as to why their actions were reasonable, but these arguments do not belong in a 12(b)(6) motion. They are better suited for a motion for summary judgment or a jury determination.")

Freeman v. Knight, No. 04CV00148MSKPAC, 2005 WL 1896245, at *4 (D. Colo. Aug. 8, 2005) ("The 'clearly established' prong of the analysis is often described as inquiring whether a 'reasonable official would understand' that his or her behavior violated the constitution. . . In this Court's view, this description of the test has resulted in imprecise analysis, as it suggests that the focus of the analysis is on the official's subjective or objective state of mind. This is incorrect. The 'clearly established' prong does not actually examine state of mind; rather, it merely inquires whether, at the time of the challenged act, there was binding legal authority recognizing the existence of a constitutional right in the particular circumstances.").

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Mitchell v. City of Jacksonville, 734 F. App'x 649, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("To the extent Defendants argue they are entitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's race discrimination claim because a reasonable official under the circumstances could have believed that Defendants' conduct was lawful, we have jurisdiction to review that legal issue on appeal. Viewed in the light most favorable to Plaintiff, . . . the record establishes that Plaintiff was treated less favorably than his non-minority co-workers. Plaintiff has also proffered some evidence that his treatment was racially motivated. Defendants, on the other hand, contend that a lawful basis existed for utilizing a liaison to communicate with Plaintiff: that it was 'easier' for Chief Loput. That Defendants may have acted, in part, with discriminatory motive does not necessarily defeat their entitlement to qualified immunity. See Foy v. Holston, 94 F.3d 1528, 1534-35 (11th Cir. 1996). When improper motive is part of the underlying constitutional tort -- and where evidence exists of mixed motives -- a defendant is still entitled to qualified immunity if 'the record indisputably establishes that the defendant in fact was motivated, at least in part, by lawful considerations.' Stanley v. City of Dalton, 219 F.3d 1280, 1296 (11th Cir. 2000) (emphasis in original). Here, the record does not establish 'indisputably' that Defendants' conduct was in fact motivated at least in part by their proffered reason. Instead, evidence in the record demonstrates that the use of a 'liaison' to communicate within a single division was atypical and that the use of a lower-ranking 'liaison' to relay orders to a higher-ranking officer would violate the JFRD's chain-of-command policy. We also note that Defendants have proffered no legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for the other conduct alleged by Plaintiff: that Chief Loput avoided one-on-one contact with Plaintiff, excluded Plaintiff from a department-wide email, assigned Plaintiff menial tasks, and denied Plaintiff's travel leave. At this stage in the proceedings, the district court concluded properly that Defendants were unentitled to qualified immunity on Plaintiff's claim for race discrimination. Because Defendants' remaining arguments on appeal attack the sufficiency of the evidence supporting Plaintiff's substantive claims for race discrimination and retaliation -- and are not pertinent to the core qualified immunity analysis -- we lack jurisdiction to consider them in this interlocutory appeal.")

Joseph v. Gee, No. 17-12185, 2018 WL 345323, at *1 (11th Cir. Jan. 10, 2018) (not reported) ("Officers Echenique, Clark, Jones, and Chester moved to dismiss Mr. Joseph's second amended complaint, arguing that it failed to state a claim upon which relief could be granted, and that they were entitled to qualified immunity. The officers appeal the district court's denial of these motions. Upon de novo review, . . . and after careful consideration of the record and the parties' briefs, we vacate the orders denying the officers' motions to dismiss and remand to the district court. The district court's orders denying the officers' motions state that the motions were denied because '[i]t is premature to determine ... whether [the officers] are entitled to Qualified Immunity based on the facts of this case. The Court finds that discovery is needed to make this determination.'. . This was error. As we recently explained, the district court's order requiring discovery 'before the court ruled on the immunity defenses is ... inconsistent with [our] decisions which establish that immunity is a right not to be subjected to litigation beyond the point at which immunity is asserted.'. . When presented with the officers' motions to dismiss, both our precedent and precedent from the Supreme Court instruct the district court to analyze whether, taking Mr. Joseph's allegations as true, the second amended complaint asserted a violation of a clearly established constitutional right. . . Because the district court failed to conduct this analysis, we vacate its orders on the officers' motions to dismiss and remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

Wall-DeSousa v. Florida Dep't of Highway Safety and Motor Vehicles, 691 F. App'x 584, 592-93 & n.5 (11th Cir. 2017) ("Here, the allegations of the second amended complaint, taken with the text of the November 5, 2014 letter canceling the Wall-DeSousas' driver's licenses based on § 741.212, show substantial lawful intent without ruling out some unlawful intent, too. It is undisputed that, at the time of the November 5, 2014 letter, the enforcement of § 741.212 was not enjoined. Florida law did not recognize out-of-state same-sex marriages and driver's licenses based on the Wall-DeSousas' out-of-state marriage license. Once enforcement of § 741.212 was enjoined on January 6, 2015, the requested driver's licenses were issued shortly thereafter. . .Given our precedent, the circumstances alleged, and the state of the Florida law at the time, we cannot say that the district court erred in dismissing this case against the defendants based on qualified immunity. . . This is not a case where no legitimate reason in fact motivated the defendants' conduct. Importantly too, at the time of the conduct here, it was not clearly established federal law that the defendants could not act as they did. . . .The dissent suggests that a partial lawful motivation can never be decided on a motion to dismiss. But this ignores the allegations in the Wall-DeSousas' second amended complaint, the text of the defendants' letter which is properly before the Court (see n.3, infra), and the fact that § 741.212 remained the law at the time the letter was sent. Although qualified immunity defenses are sometimes resolved at the summary judgment stage, district courts may grant motions to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity if the undisputed facts in the plaintiffs' own complaint show that the defendants acted lawfully. . .The dissent suggests that the Wall-DeSousas need discovery. But the text of the letter is evidence of at least one of the defendants' motivations. . . And even if the Wall-DeSousas could show an improper motive too in discovery, here we have assumed that fact in the Wall-DeSousas' favor.")

Wall-DeSousa v. Florida Dep't of Highway Safety and Motor Vehicles, 691 F. App'x 584, 594 (11th Cir. 2017) (O'Malley, J., dissenting) ("Reading Foy broadly would effectively immunize all defendants who luck into lawful post-hoc explanations for otherwise illegally-motivated behavior. Even where flagrant smoking guns exist, plaintiffs will never be able to discover them. And where, by sheer providence, the plaintiffs already have a smoking gun in hand, how can they use it to rebut a motion to dismiss if its contents are disputed? . . . I acknowledge wholeheartedly that the Wall-DeSousas' complaint is not a model of clarity, replacing concrete and particularized allegations with conclusory generalities. Had the district court rejected their complaint as failing outright to provide 'sufficient factual matter' to satisfy the straightforward requirements of Iqbal and Twombly, I would have few qualms in affirming. . . By relying instead on Foy, the district court's analysis begins a dangerous practice, which today's opinion ratifies. I respectfully dissent.")

Brown v. Davis, 684 F. App'x 928, ___ (11th Cir. 2017) ("In the employment discrimination context, the 'clearly established' requirement provides that a state official 'can be motivated, in part, by a dislike or hostility toward a certain protected class to which a citizen belongs and still act lawfully' where 'the record shows they would have acted as they, in fact, did act even if they had lacked discriminatory intent.' Rioux v. City of Atlanta, 520 F.3d 1269, 1283 (11th Cir. 2008) (quoting Foy v. Holston, 94 F.3d 1528, 1534 (11th Cir. 1996)). 'Unless it, as a legal matter, is plain under the specific facts and circumstances of the case that the defendant's conduct—despite his having adequate lawful reasons to support the act—was the result of his unlawful motive, the defendant is entitled to immunity.' Foy, 94 F.3d at 1535. 'Where the facts assumed for summary judgment purposes in a case involving qualified immunity show mixed motives (lawful and unlawful motivations) and pre-existing law does not dictate that the merits of the case must be decided in plaintiff's favor, the defendant is entitled to immunity.' Id.")

Jackson v. Humphrey, 776 F.3d 1232, 1241-42 (11th Cir. 2015) ("The District Court should have granted the Corrections officials' motion for summary judgment on Mrs. Jackson's claims. Here, the Corrections officials made just one decision with respect to Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges, the decision found in the July 19, 2012 letters. With respect to this decision, the Corrections officials' entitlement to the protections of qualified immunity should have been determined 'at the time' that they sent the letters to Mr. and Mrs. Jackson. . . This is the case even though the decision, like many decisions made by public officials, had consequences in the future. The purpose for qualified immunity is to permit officials to act without fear of harassing litigation as long as they can reasonably anticipate before they act whether their conduct will expose them to liability. . . . Thus, the entitlement to the protections of qualified immunity is judged based on the facts and the law present at the time that public officials make their decisions and does not take into account later facts or changes in the law. [citing cases] Therefore, the District Court erred in its characterization of the Corrections officials' decision to terminate Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges as having 'continued [to] den[y Mrs. Jackson] visitation long after the end of the hunger strike.' Rather, the record establishes that the decision to terminate. . . Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges was lawfully made when the letters were sent on July 19, 2012, and that the Corrections officials were therefore entitled to qualified immunity from suit for their decision. Accordingly, the Corrections officials are entitled to qualified immunity for both the period during the hunger strike and for the period after the hunger strike ended.")

Jackson v. Humphrey, 776 F.3d 1232, 1244-45 (11th Cir. 2015) (Hinkle, District Judge, concurring) ("On the primary opinion's view of the facts, the Corrections officials revoked Ms. Jackson's visitation privileges for both a lawful motive (preventing the security risk and harm to the institution that come with hunger strikes) and an unlawful motive (punishing Ms. Jackson for free speech for reasons unrelated to security and institutional harm). The primary opinion says, '[T]he law of this Circuit is that, where, as here, the facts assumed for summary judgment show both a lawful and unlawful motivation for the decision made by a government official, the official is entitled to qualified immunity.' For this proposition the primary opinion cites Foy v. Holston, 94 F.3d 1528, 1535 (11th Cir.1996). Another case supporting the statement is Stanley v. City of Dalton, Ga., 219 F.3d 1280 (11th Cir.2000). This indeed seems to be the law of the circuit. But it should not be. In a proper case, when it makes a difference, the issue should be revisited. . . .In my view, summary judgment is improper when (1) a plaintiff asserts that an officer took action based on a factor that, as a matter of clearly established law, could not constitutionally be considered, and (2) the record presents a genuine dispute over whether that prohibited factor was a but-for cause of the officer's challenged action. In asserting the contrary, Foy and Stanley confuse the subjective standard that governs the merits (what was the officer's actual motivation for taking the challenged action?) with the objective standard that applies to qualified immunity (would a reasonable officer have known that taking action for that reason was unconstitutional?). An officer's actual thought process does not always line up with what a reasonable officer could have thought. None of this calls into question the primary opinion's conclusion that the Corrections officials are entitled to summary judgment here. The record establishes without genuine dispute that in prohibiting Ms. Jackson from visiting her husband, the Corrections officials were motivated at least in part by legitimate concern for institutional security and resources. No clearly established law suggested that acting on that basis was unconstitutional. On this record, a reasonable jury could find that Ms. Jackson's protected activities were a motivating factor in the decision to prohibit her from visiting, but a reasonable jury could not find that her protected activities were a but-for cause of the decision.")

Jackson v. Humphrey, 776 F.3d 1232, 1245-47 (11th Cir. 2015) (Martin, J., dissenting) ("The majority awards qualified immunity to three Georgia Department of Corrections officials for their complete and permanent termination of Delma Jackson's visitation privileges with her inmate husband. The officials first revoked Mrs. Jackson's privileges based on her purported role in a prison hunger strike. But they did not restore her privileges when the strike ended on July 26, 2012. Neither did they reinstate her privileges when they returned visitation privileges to all others who had been denied visitation for the same reason. Indeed, by all accounts they have not restored her privileges to this day, nearly thirty months later. Because I am convinced that any stated legitimate penological purpose for revoking her privileges vanished sometime after the end of the hunger strike, and because qualified immunity cannot extend to protect the officials if their sole remaining motivation was to retaliate against Mrs. Jackson for her protected speech, I respectfully dissent. I am not persuaded by the majority's conclusion that our qualified immunity analysis can only look to the initial revocation communicated by the July 19, 2012 revocation letters. Specifically, I reject the idea that we are permitted to consider only the July 19, 2012 communication of the decision (which did not include an end-date for the action, as required by GDOC operating procedures), and must ignore the ongoing impact of that decision which still prevents Mrs. Jackson from seeing her husband now almost three years later. While certainly we must consider the letters, Mrs. Jackson's First Amendment retaliation claim is not so limited. As the District Court correctly noted, Mrs. Jackson challenged the permanent suspension of her privileges. The officials have the authority at any point to reinstate Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges. Their continued failure to do so perpetuates the permanent suspension and should be considered as part of the qualified immunity analysis. The District Court was right in observing that the officials did not offer any valid motivation for the permanent suspension of Mrs. Jackson's privileges once the hunger strike ended. The officials returned visitation privileges to every other prison visitor whose rights had been revoked during the hunger strike. They suggest that Mrs. Jackson's privileges were not restored due to incomplete paperwork. But even if that were true, Mrs. Jackson made clear her request to be able to visit her husband when she sought an injunction for reinstatement of her privileges nearly a year before her husband was allegedly given the proper paperwork. The officials knew then that Mrs. Jackson wanted her privileges back, but did not reinstate them. The majority points out that qualified immunity is 'judged based on the facts and the law present at the time that public officials make their decisions,' not 'tak[ing] into account later facts or changes in the law.'. . While that may be true, all the cases they rely upon stand for the unremarkable principle that an officer who performs a single act which does not violate the law when performed, will not be stripped of that immunity just because of a later change in the law. . . I do not read those holdings to apply here so as to prevent us from considering the officers' ongoing decisions to revoke and refuse to reinstate Mrs. Jackson's privileges. Neither do those cases stop us from evaluating whether the scope of the deprivation was reasonable at the time it was made.

The majority acknowledges that a decision that would warrant qualified immunity at the time it is made can have ongoing consequences. . . And I understand that qualified immunity can attach to inaction just as it does to actions. . . Our precedent does not require us to turn a blind eye when defendants' ongoing inaction causes harm, especially where, as here, it was the same defendants' earlier action that created the harm in the first place. Our analysis should begin anew once changing circumstances do away with the justification first given. . . . Even if the majority were correct that the officials 'made just one decision with respect to Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges, the decision found in the July 19, 2012 letters,'. . . I would not hold that the decision is entitled to complete qualified immunity. The letters imposed a permanent revocation of Mrs. Jackson's visitation privileges. GDOC Standard Operating Procedures require notice of the 'reason for and length of the [revocation].' The officers' stated reason for revocation was related to the hunger strike, but the letters contained neither a date on which the revocation would end nor a statement that the privileges would be reinstated when the hunger strike was over. In light of those facts, I do not believe that defendants have offered a lawful motive for the breadth of the letters for purposes of qualified immunity. I would affirm the District Court's partial grant of qualified immunity.")

Sherrod v. Johnson, 667 F.3d 1359, 1364 (11th Cir. 2012) ("A proper analysis of Johnson and Crutchfield's entitlement to qualified immunity is not whether they knew that terminating Sherrod in retaliation for protected speech was lawful, but rather whether terminating him based upon all the information available to them at the time, to include any knowledge of his protected speech, was objectively reasonable. See Stanley, supra, at 1294. In Foy, we noted that the presence of a jury issue about a defendant's improper intent does not necessarily preclude qualified immunity. Foy, 94 F.3d at 1533. . . .The facts in the record show lawful justifications for recommending Sherrod's termination. On May 16, 2002, Plaintiff received an unsatisfactory evaluation at Olympic Heights from Vice–Principal Christine Hall, with seven areas of concern. As a result, Sherrod was placed on a remedial teaching performance plan. While at Roosevelt Middle School, Crutchfield began to receive complaints from parents about excessive work assignments and deviations from the curriculum. Further, on one occasion, Crutchfield observed unsupervised students standing outside Sherrod's classroom. After consulting with Sherrod, Crutchfield gave him another unsatisfactory evaluation. Plaintiff failed to present any precedent, and the Court is aware of none, to suggest that a reasonable principal and superintendent armed with the knowledge they possessed, to include the unsatisfactory performance reviews, would know they could not recommend and/or adopt a recommendation to terminate Sherrod. Accordingly, Johnson and Crutchfield are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Danley v. Allen, 540 F.3d 1298, 1308, 1309 (11th Cir. 2008) ("Although the initial pepper spraying itself was not excessive force, this is not a case in which a jailer simply sprayed an inmate who had repeatedly failed to obey commands. Danley's complaint groups together the initial spraying and the subsequent twenty-minute confinement as a single instance of excessive force. Although less common than the direct application of force, subjecting a prisoner to special confinement that causes him to suffer increased effects of environmental conditions–here, the pepper spray lingering in the air and on him–can constitute excessive force. . . . Reading the complaint in the light most favorable to Danley, the pepper spray had its intended effect; it disabled Danley before the jailers pushed him back into the small cell. Given that he was disabled, there was no need for the jailers to continue using force after spraying him. The use of force in the form of extended confinement in the small, poorly ventilated, pepper spray filled cell, when there were other readily available alternatives, was excessive. . . . Having established a constitutional violation, the next step in the qualified immunity analysis usually is to determine whether the right was clearly established. . . However, we have held that 'there is no room for qualified immunity ' in Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment excessive force cases because they require a subjective element that is 'so extreme' that no reasonable person could believe that his actions were lawful. . . As a result, we conclude that the district court did not err by denying the defendants' motions to dismiss Danley's excessive force claim on qualified immunity grounds.").

Rioux v. City of Atlanta, 520 F.3d 1269, 1282-85 (11th Cir. 2008) ("If the trier of fact believed Rioux's showing of pretext, and disbelieved Appellees' proffered legitimate reason, then a violation of the Equal Protection Clause would be shown. The 'other' evidence from which a jury might infer discriminatory animus on the part of Rubin and COO Young, which we have summarized above, constitutes that showing by Rioux, at the summary judgment stage, of the violation of a constitutional right. The trial court below addressed the next step in the qualified immunity analysis by noting that there was no real dispute that the right to be free from employment discrimination was clearly established at the time of Rioux's demotion. As a general principle, we can all agree with that statement. . . . However, the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis asks the question 'in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.' . . . Rioux must demonstrate at this step in the qualified immunity analysis that a reasonable fire chief and a reasonable chief operating officer of a city would know that demoting a high-ranking, subordinate, discretionary officer in the factual circumstances presented here violated clearly established law. . . And it is this that he cannot show. . . . The events of May 2, 2004 are largely undisputed, and the results of the OPS and Law Department investigations confirmed that Rioux violated department rules. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Rioux, Appellees had adequate lawful reasons to support their decision to demote Rioux, and may have had improper race-based motives to take the challenged action as well. What Rioux has presented, then, is a 'mixed-motives' case, which is governed by the analysis set out in Foy. . . . Tracking the reasoning used in Foy to reverse the denial of summary judgment where qualified immunity was interposed as a defense, here no jury could find that it would have been unlawful for a fire chief and the city's chief operating officer to do as Appellees did if they had lacked discriminatory intent. . . No jury could find that a reasonable fire chief and chief operating officer would never have demoted Rioux but for a discriminatory intent. . . The record here, as in Foy, undisputably establishes that Appellees were motivated at least in part by lawful justifications, supported by the independent investigations conducted by OPS and the Law Department, investigations which these two decisionmakers were not a part of and which there is no evidence they manipulated.. . . . The Foy analytical framework was applied in Stanley to a mixed motives case, following the Supreme Court pronouncement in Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998). In Crawford-El, the Court rejected a rule that would have required a heightened burden of proof from plaintiffs in unconstitutional-motive cases. . . The Crawford-El decision did not address how courts should apply the objective reasonableness test after a plaintiff creates a jury question on improper motive, where improper motive is an element of the claim, as it is here. Stanley concluded that Foy was the correct approach and remained the law of this circuit. . . And so Stanley reiterated that a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity only where 'the record undisputably establishes that the defendant in fact was motivated, at least in part, by lawful considerations.' . . . Because pre-existing law did not provide fair warning to Appellees that demoting Rioux under these circumstances would violate clearly established federal law, Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity . . . . If Rioux had presented his claims under the provisions of Title VII, he would be entitled to have his claims of discrimination heard by a jury. The result we reach here is compelled by the remedy Rioux chose, that is, section 1983 claims against individual decisionmakers rather than his employer, for which the law recognizes the right to qualified immunity. Again, because Rioux has not been able to present any evidence that Appellees' decisions were not motivated, at least in part, by lawful justifications, Appellees are entitled to qualified immunity.")

McMillan v. DeKalb County, Georgia, No. 05-17110, 2006 WL 3204829, at *2, *3 (11th Cir. Nov. 6, 2006) (not published) ("Drew misapprehends the analytical framework applicable to qualified immunity in mixed motive cases. The district court observed correctly that the right to be free from racial discrimination in the public workplace was a clearly established constitutional right of which a reasonable official would have known. The district court also recognized correctly that the payroll abuse attributed to Plaintiff could objectively justify Plaintiff's termination. Qualified immunity was denied at this stage because the pretrial record failed to establish that Drew's termination decision indisputably was actually motivated at least in part by the payroll incident. Drew takes issue with the district court's conclusions on the evidentiary sufficiency of her lawful motives. We have jurisdiction to review evidentiary sufficiency issues when core qualified immunity issues also are raised. . . Viewing the pre-trial record in the light most favorable to Plaintiff–as we and the district court are required to do–the record fails to show indisputably that Drew was motivated (at least in part) by the legitimate reason she proffered.")

Bozeman v. Orum, 422 F.3d 1265, 1273, 1274 (11th Cir. 2005) ("'[A]n official acts with deliberate indifference when he intentionally delays providing an inmate with access to medical treatment, knowing that the inmate has a life-threatening condition or an urgent medical condition that would be exacerbated by delay.' . . This general statement of law ordinarily does not preclude qualified immunity in cases involving a delay in medical treatment for a serious injury. The cases are highly fact-specific and involve an array of circumstances pertinent to just what kind of notice is imputed to a government official and to the constitutional adequacy of what was done to help and when. Most cases in which deliberate indifference is asserted are far from obvious violations of the Constitution. But the assumed circumstances here are stark and simple, and the decisional language from cases such as Lancaster obviously and clearly applies to these extreme circumstances: the officers knew Haggard was unconscious and not breathing and–for fourteen minutes–did nothing. They did not check Haggard's breathing or pulse; they did not administer CPR; they did not summon medical help. Given these circumstances, we conclude that the Officers were fairly warned by our case law and that the Officers' total failure to address Haggard's medical need during the fourteen-minute period violated Haggard's constitutional rights, which violation should have been obvious to any objectively reasonable correctional officer.").

Bozeman v. Orum, 422 F.3d 1265, 1274, 1275 (11th Cir. 2005) (Edmondson, C.J., concurring) ("I concur in the judgment. And I concur in the opinion; I believe it accurately presents the current law of the Circuit. I write separately to say that I question whether the law of this Circuit on Eighth Amendment claims of excessive force is correct. Briefly stated, I am inclined to believe that the excessive-force tort created by the Eighth Amendment has an important objective element: The correctional officer's physical conduct (force) used must be objectively unreasonable under the circumstances. So, if the conduct (force) is not outside of the borders of objectively reasonable conduct given the circumstances, the prisoner's Eighth Amendment right would not be violated no matter what the particular officer's subjective state of mind might be. Put differently, the constitutional tort–I suspect–requires objectively unreasonable action (force) plus a subjective, bad faith motive or intent to cause unnecessary suffering. If the officer's act in applying force is objectively reasonable, no need would exist to consider state of mind. Because I am inclined to believe an Eighth Amendment violation based on excessive force requires objectively unreasonable force, I expect that the defense of qualified immunity can apply in cases based on Eighth Amendment excessive force claims. If the force used was not force that the preexisting law had clearly established to be unreasonable given the circumstances, the defendant correctional officer seemingly should be entitled to the defense of qualified immunity on that account. After all, qualified immunity is available in most constitutional torts, including other kinds of excessive force cases. Correctional officers are due considerable deference in how they deal with violent inmates. Our Circuit's law makes it too hard for correctional officers–who have a tough (at times, dangerous) job and are surrounded by hostile witnesses–to avoid suit and trial because our law focuses on the particular correctional officers' subjective motive or intent. I stress that I do not believe that the Supreme Court's decisions compel our Circuit's law to be as it seems to be now. The question I raise here was not briefed in this case. I am also uncertain that, if the Circuit's law operated in the way that I think is likely more correct, the result for this appeal would be different on the excessive force claim. Therefore, I see no point in elaborating or sharpening or finalizing my views at this time; it seems prudent to wait for a case where we have pertinent briefing and where the outcome would doubtlessly be impacted and then to test in that context the ideas advanced for consideration today. But I do hope that this Court and the Bar will keep the ideas that I have raised today under active review. In some cases, I am pretty sure the outcome would be affected if the law of excessive force under the Eighth Amendment was set out differently than we seem to do now, that is, if we took a tack giving real attention to an objective element (unreasonable force) as well as the subjective mental element.").

Snow v. City of Citronelle, 420 F.3d 1262, 1270 (11th Cir. 2005) ("Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Snow, a jury could find that Chennault subjectively believed that there was a strong risk that Poiroux would attempt suicide and deliberately did not take any action to prevent her suicide. Those facts, if found by a jury, would establish a constitutional violation. Because, at the time of Poiroux's death, it was clearly established that an officer's deliberate indifference to the risk of serious harm to a detainee is a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment, the district court erroneously granted summary judgment on Snow's claim against Chennault.").

Carter v. Galloway, 352 F.3d 1346, 1350 n.10 (11th Cir. 2003) ("The district court also addressed Defendants' qualified immunity defense. Because Plaintiff's deliberate indifference claim fails, Defendants have no need for qualified immunity. If Plaintiff has stated a good deliberate indifference claim, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for the law was not clearly established in Plaintiff's favor.")

Bogle v. McClure, 332 F.3d 1347, 1356 (11th Cir. 2003) ("Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to the Librarians, the record evidence does not undisputably indicate that Appellants were in fact motivated, at least in part, by objectively valid reasons. Therefore, Appellants were not entitled to qualified immunity under Foy.").

Skrtich v. Thornton, 280 F.3d 1295, 1301 (11th Cir. 2002) ("In this Circuit, a defense of qualified immunity is not available in cases alleging excessive force in violation of the Eighth Amendment, because the use of force 'maliciously and sadistically to cause harm' is clearly established to be a violation of the Constitution by the Supreme Court decisions in Hudson and Whitley. See Johnson v. Breeden, __ F.3d __ (11th Cir.2002). There is simply no room for a qualified immunity defense when the plaintiff alleges such a violation. Id. The only question, then, is whether the plaintiff has alleged facts sufficient to survive a motion to dismiss or a motion for summary judgment. If he has done so, that is the end of the inquiry.").

Johnson v. Breeden, 280 F.3d 1308, 1321, 1322 (11th Cir. 2002) ("We are aware of Saucier v. Katz . . . but think that case is distinguishable, because it did not involve a constitutional tort with a subjective intent element. Instead, Saucier involved a Fourth Amendment claim of use of excessive force against an arrestee, and such claims are purely objective. They turn solely on the objective reasonableness of the amount of force used in the circumstances, regardless of the intent or other subjective state of mind of the defendant officer. . . It makes perfect sense to conclude, as the Supreme Court did in Saucier, that with such claims the merits issue and the qualified immunity issue are distinct, so that the existence of a valid Fourth Amendment excessive force claim is not inconsistent with qualified immunity. In other words, a defendant officer could use force in making an arrest that is later judged to be excessive enough that it violates the Fourth Amendment, but if prior decisions did not clearly establish that the use of that amount of force in those circumstances was constitutionally excessive, the defendant officer would be entitled to qualified immunity. That is what Saucier holds. It is different with claims arising from the infliction of excessive force on a prisoner in violation of the Eighth Amendment Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause. In order to have a valid claim on the merits of excessive force in violation of that constitutional provision, the excessive force must have been sadistically and maliciously applied for the very purpose of causing harm. Equally important, it is clearly established that all infliction of excessive force on a prisoner sadistically and maliciously for the very purpose of causing harm and which does cause harm violates the Cruel and Unusual Punishment Clause. So, where this type of constitutional violation is established there is no room for qualified immunity. It is not just that this constitutional tort involves a subjective element, it is that the subjective element required to establish it is so extreme that every conceivable set of circumstances in which this constitutional violation occurs is clearly established to be a violation of the Constitution by the Supreme Court decisions in Hudson and Whitley. This is a different situation entirely from the one in Saucier, . . . where the Supreme Court said that, 'neither respondent nor the Court of Appeals has identified any case demonstrating a clearly established rule prohibiting the officer from acting as he did, nor are we aware of any such rule.'").

Marsh v. Butler County, 268 F.3d 1014, 1031 n.8 (11th Cir. 2001) (en banc) ("In Hill v. DeKalb Regional Yourth Detention Center, 40 F.3d 1176, 1186 (11th Cir.1994), we see some dicta: 'a finding of deliberate indifference necessarily precludes a finding of qualified immunity'. We reject that dicta because it incorrectly jumbles the merits of an Eighth Amendment violation with the separate concept of an immunity defense.").

Stanley v. City of Dalton, 219 F.3d 1280, 1296 & n.26 & n.29 (11th Cir. 2000) ("We conclude that Chadwick is due qualified immunity under Foy. A defendant is entitled to qualified immunity under the Foy rationale only where, among other things, the record indisputably establishes that the defendant in fact was motivated, at least in part, by lawful considerations. . . . In this case–viewing the record in the light most favorable to Stanley, as we must at the summary judgment stage–we can say that the record undisputably establishes (a) that objectively valid reasons did exist for the step Chadwick took, and (b) that Chadwick was motivated, at least in part, by these lawful considerations. Thus, even at the summary judgment stage, we can say that this case is undisputably one of mixed motives. Therefore, Foy commands qualified immunity on mixed-motive grounds in this case. . . .Crawford-El did not separately propose its own analysis for unconstitutional-motive cases, much less reject the kind of analysis we used in Foy. And, because Foy is based on well-settled principles of summary judgment and qualified immunity, we think that the approach taken in Foy is consistent with the Supreme Court's words and holding in Crawford-El. We, therefore, conclude that Foy remains the law of this Circuit. . . . We emphasize that it is not sufficient for Chadwick to establish that there exists a lawful basis for a reasonable police chief to have terminated Stanley. Rather, in order for the Foy analysis to apply, Chadwick himself must have been actually motivated, at least in part, by that lawful basis.").

Macuba v. DeBoer, 193 F.3d 1316, 1321 n.8 (11th Cir. 1999) ("The parties devote significant space in their briefs to the Supreme Court's recent decision in Crawford-El v. Britton, . . .which rejected a requirement that a plaintiff in a § 1983 case produce clear and convincing proof of improper motive when motive is an essential element of the constitutional claim. The apparent disagreement between the parties is whether, after Crawford-El, a district court may consider a government official's intent or motive in determining if the official is entitled to qualified immunity, when the claim is for First Amendment retaliation. We have not decided what effect, if any, Crawford-El has on our holdings, such as Mencer v. Hammonds, 134 F.3d 1066, 1070-71 (11th Cir.1998), and Walker v. Schwalbe, 112 F.3d 1127, 1132-33 (11th Cir.1997), which concluded that a district court should consider, for qualified immunity purposes, evidence of improper motive, but only when motive is part of the constitutional claim. We decline to address this issue here because, even if Macuba has shown that appellants dislike him, he has not produced sufficient evidence to establish they caused him not to be hired.").

Brown v. Cochran, 171 F.3d 1329, 1333 (11th Cir. 1999) ("The dispute lies in whether a reasonably objective trier of fact could find racial animus on Cochran's part in light of all the facts. In other words, the issue is whether or not Brown has created a genuine issue of fact that Cochran acted out of racial animus and that Cochran's proffered reason (Brown's poor performance record) was merely a pretext for discrimination. After reviewing the record, we are persuaded that Brown has not created a genuine issue of fact in this regard, and that a trier of fact would find Cochran's actions objectively reasonable. Therefore we conclude that Brown has failed to establish a deprivation of a constitutional right at all, and a fortiori has not established a violation of any clearly established constitutional right.").

Johnson v. City of Ft. Lauderdale, 126 F.3d 1372, 1379-80 (11th Cir. 1997) ("The holding in Foy rested primarily on the existence of an indisputable and adequate lawful motive on the part of the social service employees such that reasonable officials would disagree as to the legality of their conduct in light of the Mt. Healthy and Arlington Hts. doctrines. Here, the transcripts of the disciplinary hearings against Johnson offer conclusive support for the defendants' claimed adequate lawful motives for demoting and discharging Johnson. . . . Even assuming that the defendants acted with some discriminatory or retaliatory motives in demoting and discharging Johnson, the law did not clearly establish that a reasonable official faced with the same evidence of disobedience and deception should not have disciplined Johnson in the same manner. We therefore reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment on Johnson's § 1981 and § 1983 claims. . . . We do not, however, reverse the district court's denial of summary judgment on Johnson's § 1985(3) claim. . . . We have squarely held that qualified immunity is not available as a defense to a § 1985(3) claim, see Burrell v. Board of Trustees of Ga. Military College, . . .and are not swayed by the defendants' argument that Burrell is no longer legally viable in light of Lassiter . . . . Lassiter does not undermine Burrell's central rationale: that the narrow intent element of § 1985(3) erects a significant hurdle for § 1985(3) plaintiffs, thereby obviating the need for granting public officials qualified immunity with respect to a § 1985(3) claim.").

Walker v. Schwalbe, 112 F.3d 1127, 1132 (11th Cir. 1997) ("Defendants are correct that there is generally no subjective component to qualified immunity analysis and that the test is based on objective legal reasonableness. . . However. . . [w]here the official's state of mind is an essential element of the underlying violation, the state of mind must be considered in the qualified immunity analysis or a plaintiff would almost never be able to prove that the official was not entitled to qualified immunity. We hold, as every Circuit that has considered this issue has held, that where subjective motive or intent is a critical element of the alleged constitutional violation the intent of the government actor is relevant. . . . Defendants argue that denial of qualified immunity here would be equivalent to the court's holding that once an employee has engaged in First Amendment speech he may no longer be punished for valid reasons. This argument misses the point. An employee may still be punished for valid reasons. However, when the employee can establish a genuine issue of material fact that the true reason for the punishment was actually the speech, then the case must go to trial.").

Walker v. Schwalbe, 112 F.3d 1127, 1137 n.3 (11th Cir. 1997) (Birch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("I note that our precedent is ambiguous regarding the correct analytical framework in a qualified-immunity context when intent is an element of the cause of action. Compare McMillian, 88 F.3d 1554, in which the court assumed, for purposes of qualified-immunity analysis, that the defendants possessed an intent to punish the plaintiff, regardless of possible evidence of a lawful motive on the part of the defendants, with Foy, 94 F.3d at 1534-35 ('[W]hen an adequate lawful motive is present, that a discriminatory motive might also exist does not sweep qualified immunity from the field ... Unless it, as a legal matter, is plain under the specific facts and circumstances of the case that the defendants' conduct–despite his having adequate lawful reasons to support the act–was the result of his unlawful motive, the defendant is entitled to immunity.'). There are other contexts in which the role of evidence of subjective intent of a state actor complicates the qualified-immunity question. Some courts have found, for instance, that a finding of a genuine issue of fact with respect to a defendant's subjective intent necessarily precludes entitlement to qualified immunity when the claim advanced is deliberate indifference to medical needs under the Eighth Amendment. [citing cases] The claim of deliberate indifference obviously is not at issue in this case. An examination of this claim does serve to highlight, however, the unsettled state of the law as it pertains to the court's basis for jurisdiction–as well as its analytical approach– in qualified-immunity cases when subjective intent is raised as a disputed predicate question of fact.").

McMillian v. Johnson, 101 F.3d 1363, 1368-69 (11th Cir. 1996) (On Petition For Panel Rehearing and Suggestion of Rehearing en banc) (Propst, Senior District Judge, specially concurring) ("Since this case, unlike Jenkins and Wright, implicates subjective intent or motive, the issue remains as to how such intent claims are to be considered during the course of a qualified immunity analysis. . . . An issue is whether claims involving subjective intent are appropriate for summary judgment based upon qualified immunity if a legitimate motive is simply posited. I find it difficult to see how such cases can be determined at the summary judgment stage if there is any substantial evidence of an illegal motive in view of the established law which precludes a trial court's making credibility determinations, weighing the evidence, and interfering with a jury's drawing of legitimate inferences from the evidence. . . . I suggest that the qualified immunity issues cry out for further en banc consideration, especially as to the claims involving intent or motive as an element vis a vis those which do not.").

Foy v. Holston, 94 F.3d 1528, 1533-35 & n.9 (11th Cir. 1996) ("Our former decisions . . . must not be understood to rule out qualified immunity wherever discriminatory intent appears in the summary judgment record even if discriminatory intent is an element of the underlying constitutional tort. Qualified immunity is too important a right of public servants and too important a public policy to be nullified so easily. The Supreme Court has not instructed us to drop qualified immunity . . . from cases in which discriminatory intent is an element of the underlying tort. . . . So, whenever a public officer is sued for money damages in his individual capacity for violating federal law, the basic qualified immunity question looms unchanged: Could a reasonable officer have believed that what the defendant did might be lawful in the circumstances and in the light of the clearly established law? . . . . [S]tate officials act lawfully despite having discriminatory intent, where the record shows they would have acted as they, in fact, did act even if they had lacked discriminatory intent. [citing Mt. Healthy v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274, 286-87 (1979)] The Mt. Healthy doctrine is part of the law and, when the concept is presented by a defendant's argument, must not be overlooked in the qualified immunity analysis. . . . One trigger to the doctrine's application depends upon whether the record establishes that the defendant, in fact, did possess a substantial lawful motive for acting as he did act. At least when an adequate lawful motive is present, that a discriminatory motive might also exist does not sweep qualified immunity from the field even at the summary judgment stage. Unless it, as a legal matter, is plain under the specific facts and circumstances of the case that the defendant's conduct–despite his having adequate lawful reasons to support the act–was the result of his unlawful motive, the defendant is entitled to immunity. Where the facts assumed for summary judgment purposes in a case involving qualified immunity show mixed motives (lawful and unlawful motivations) and pre-existing law does not dictate that the merits of the case must be decided in plaintiff's favor, the defendant is entitled to immunity. . . . Here the record, in fact, shows substantial lawful intent, while not ruling out some unlawful intent, too. Unlike McMillian and Ratliff (which involved pointed district court fact findings–that we did not review–about the intent of the defendants and in which the Mt. Healthy doctrine was not discussed), we are deciding the qualified immunity question based on circumstances which include indisputable and sufficient lawful motivations on the part of Defendants.").

McMillian v. Johnson, 88 F.3d 1554, 1566 (11th Cir. 1996) ("Like every other circuit that has considered the issue, we have held that intent or motivation may not be ignored when intent or motivation is an essential element of the underlying constitutional violation." citing Edwards v. Wallace Community College, 49 F.3d 1517, 1524 (11th Cir.1995)).

Ratliff v. DeKalb County, Ga., 62 F.3d 338, 341 (11th Cir. 1995) ("In considering a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, the Supreme Court has held that courts should pay no attention to the subjective intent of the government actor. [citing Harlow] Harlow was intended to make a fundamental change in the law of immunity. And the strict meaning of the words used in Harlow for the immunity standard would protect public officials from personal liability when the pertinent substantive law makes the official's state of mind an essential element of the alleged constitutional violation. Despite Harlow's words, we have said that in one kind of qualified immunity case–where discriminatory intent is an element of the tort–intent remains relevant. [footnote and cites omitted] We are bound by our earlier holding that, in qualified immunity cases, intent is a relevant inquiry if discriminatory intent is a specific element of the constitutional tort; and, we follow that rule here.").

Hansen v. Soldenwagner, 19 F.3d 573, 578 (11th Cir. 1994) ("For qualified immunity purposes, the subjective motivation of the defendant-official is immaterial . . . . Harlow's objective standard would be rendered meaningless if a plaintiff could overcome a summary judgment motion based on qualified immunity by injecting the defendant's into the pleadings.").

Crowley v. Scott, No. 5:14-CV-326 (MTT), 2016 WL 2993174, at *7 (M.D. Ga. May 23, 2016) ("It is undisputed that Scott was acting within his discretionary authority, and the Court has concluded that a reasonable jury could find that Scott violated Crowley's constitutional rights by using excessive force. Thus, Scott is entitled to qualified immunity only if the law was not clearly established that his conduct was unlawful. To overcome Scott's qualified immunity defense, Crowley cites the former rule for Fourteenth Amendment excessive force cases: a plaintiff can overcome the defense of qualified immunity simply by establishing the violation of his constitutional rights. . . This was the rule because 'the subjective element required to establish [a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim was] so extreme that every conceivable set of circumstances in which this constitutional violations occurs is clearly established to be a violation of the Constitution.'. . However, because the Supreme Court's decision in Kingsley eliminated the subjective element in Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claims, a plaintiff asserting the claim must establish a constitutional violation and that the defendant violated clearly established law. . . Scott argues 'the law was not clearly established that the amount of forced used was excessive in response to the resistance [Crowley] offered in response to the directions Scott had given him.'. . At the time of the events in this case, the law was clearly established that a handcuffed, non-resisting, and otherwise compliant person has a 'right to be free from excessive force.'. . Therefore, if a jury credits Crowley's version that Scott used a leg sweep while Crowley was handcuffed, non-resistant, and otherwise not creating the disturbance that Scott described, then no reasonable officer in Scott's position could have believed that Scott's use of force was lawful. . . . Accordingly, Scott is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

V. DISCOVERY

In some cases, limited discovery may be needed on the qualified immunity issue to properly establish the contours of the right in question. A court may defer its decision on the immunity question, allow limited discovery to achieve the requisite factual development and decide the issue on summary judgment.

In Crawford-El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574 (1998), the Court noted:

> Discovery involving public officials is indeed one of the evils that Harlow aimed to address, but neither that opinion nor subsequent decisions create an immunity from all discovery. Harlow sought to protect officials from the costs of 'broad-reaching' discovery. . . and we have since recognized that limited discovery may sometimes be necessary before the district court can resolve a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.

523 U.S. at 593 n.14.

But see Ashcroft v. Iqbal, 129 S.Ct. 1937, 1953, 1954 (2009) ("We decline respondent's invitation to relax the pleading requirements on the ground that the Court of Appeals promises petitioners minimally intrusive discovery. That promise provides especially cold comfort in this pleading context, where we are impelled to give real content to the concept of qualified immunity for high-level officials who must be neither deterred nor detracted from the vigorous performance of their duties. Because respondent's complaint is deficient under Rule 8, he is not entitled to discovery, cabined or otherwise.").

D.C. CIRCUIT

Hinojosa v. Livingston, No. 14-40459, 2015 WL 7422990, at *3-6, *9-11, *14 (5th Cir. Nov. 18, 2015) ("[T]o determine whether we have jurisdiction over this interlocutory appeal, we must determine whether the district court's order complied with our precedent for issuing such orders. . . . First, the district court must determine 'that the plaintiff's pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity.'. . . When reviewing a complaint that meets this standard, the district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling and order limited discovery if 'the court remains "unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts."'. . Such a discovery order must be 'narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.'. . .We first ask whether the complaint pleads facts that, if true, would permit the inference that Defendants are liable under § 1983 for an Eighth Amendment violation and would overcome their qualified immunity defense. We conclude that it does. . . .Here, the complaint alleges an Eighth Amendment violation. The complaint alleges that Defendants subjected Hinojosa to dangerous heat conditions in conscious disregard of the serious risk that the heat posed for prisoners who, like Hinojosa, suffered from certain medical conditions, took certain medications, and had recently been transferred from air-conditioned jails to non-climate-controlled facilities. . . . Prison officials cannot escape liability in a conditions-of-confinement case like this one by arguing that, while they allegedly were aware of and consciously disregarded a substantial risk of serious harm to a discrete class of vulnerable inmates, they were not aware that the particular inmate involved in the case belonged to that class. . . . In sum, then, the complaint adequately alleges an Eighth Amendment violation based on Hinojosa's conditions of confinement. . . . Having determined that the complaint's factual allegations, if true, would establish Defendants' liability for an Eighth Amendment violation and overcome a qualified immunity defense, we next ask whether further clarification of the facts was necessary for the district court to rule on the qualified immunity defense. We easily conclude that it was. When reviewing a well-pleaded complaint and a defendant's motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity, a district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling and order limited discovery when 'the court remains "unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts."'. . In other words, a district court may elect the defer-and-discover approach 'when the defendant's immunity claim turns at least partially on a factual question' that must be answered before a ruling can issue. . . Here, the district court held that it was unable to rule on Defendants' qualified immunity claim because factual development was needed as to their 'knowledge, actions, omissions and/or policies in regards to TDCJ prison operations in times of extreme heat.'. . .The factual questions of what Defendants knew, when they knew it, and whether they investigated and considered possible remedial measures, are undoubtedly necessary to answer before determining whether Defendants acted reasonably in light of clearly established law. Of course, as detailed above, Defendants' knowledge is central to the deliberate indifference element of Plaintiff's Eighth Amendment claim.

However, their knowledge is also highly relevant to qualified immunity, because it bears heavily on the reasonableness of their actions. . . . The reasonableness analysis must be different from the deliberate-indifference analysis, because '[o]therwise, a successful claim of qualified immunity in this context would require defendants to demonstrate that they prevail on the merits, thus rendering qualified immunity an empty doctrine.'. . 'In light of these complexities, we have observed that "[a]dditional facts ... are particularly important when evaluating the [reasonableness] prong of the qualified immunity test."'. . That holds true in this case. The district court did not err in determining that factual development was needed to rule on Defendants' qualified immunity defense. . . Our foregoing discussion establishes that the district court was empowered to defer its qualified immunity ruling and issue a discovery order. However, the breadth of the ordered discovery is critically important. Qualified immunity is immunity not only from judgment, but also from suit . . . . We therefore must determine whether the discovery that the district court ordered was "narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim." Id. (quoting Lion Boulos, 834 F.2d at 507–08). While this presents a somewhat close question, we conclude that the district court's discovery order was appropriately tailored. . . . Because, as set forth above, the district court's order complies with our precedent, we DISMISS this interlocutory appeal for want of jurisdiction. We express no opinion on how the district court should rule on Defendants' qualified immunity defense.")

Navab-Safavi v. Glassman, 637 F.3d 311, 317, 318 (D.C. Cir. 2011) ("Having established that the complaint set forth a violation of right requiring a Pickering balancing against the appellants' assertion of qualified immunity, we now face a question similar to that determined by the Fifth Circuit in Kinney v. Weaver, 367 F.3d 337 (5th Cir.2004): That is, given the function of qualified immunity in protecting government officials against not only civil liability, but the burden of litigation, did its assertion by the appellants require the district court to terminate the litigation at the motion stage without further resolution of the factual questions underlying the determination of the Pickering balance? Upon review of the record, we conclude as did the district court that it is not possible to determine at this stage as a matter of law that Navab-Safavi has not alleged a violation of clearly established law. . . .[W]here the interests underlying the Pickering balancing are as fact-dependent as those in this case, the district court appeared to correctly determine that this decision could not be made at the 12(b)(6) stage and should properly await some evidentiary development. We do not suggest that the determination can never be made on allegations–the relative weight of governmental interest and established constitutional rights on other facts may often be quite evident from the pleadings–but only that it cannot be done on the record before the court in this case.")

Irish v. State of Maine, 849 F.3d 521, 523-29 (1st Cir. 2017) ("As to qualified immunity, we recognize the Supreme Court's admonitions that it is 'an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability,' and should thus be decided early in litigation. . . But we are reluctant to make

law in the absence of more facts. We thus send the case back to the district court for some development of facts material to those issues. We vacate the district court's ruling as to the individual defendants and remand the case with instructions that the parties be permitted to conduct discovery on relevant facts. The discovery should include facts on whether there was any departure from established police protocol or training on, inter alia, the manner in which the police should notify the accused of allegations filed against him or her; what exactly the State Police officers knew about the risk that Lord posed to Irish and when exactly they knew it; and what message they left for Lord. Whether or not the officers followed proper procedure and how much they knew about the attendant risks of leaving a casual voice message, in turn, may bear on the questions of whether Irish has a due process claim that can withstand a 12(b)(6) motion and whether the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .At least eight sister circuits have recognized the existence of the state-created danger theory. . . While this circuit has discussed the possible existence of the state-created danger theory, we have never found it applicable to any specific set of facts. In addition to alleging a sufficient state-created danger, the plaintiff must meet 'a further and onerous requirement' to prove a substantive due process violation: "'he state actions must shock the conscience of the court.'. . To meet this standard, the state actions must be 'so egregious, so outrageous, that it may fairly be said to shock the contemporary conscience.'. . Although the circumstances of each case impact whether the state action at issue meets this standard, 'where actors have an opportunity to reflect and make reasoned and rational decisions, deliberately indifferent behavior may suffice.'. . Finally, we 'may elect first to address whether the governmental action at issue is sufficiently conscience shocking' before considering the state-created danger element. . . .In our view, the bare-bones nature of the complaint and the record at this early stage of litigation makes vacating the appropriate course. To be sure, our concern is not that the State Police sought to interview Lord for 'his side of the story.' Nor is our concern that they identified Irish as the complainant. After all, even had they not identified her by name, her identity might have been clear to Lord, given the one-on-one nature of the crime of rape. What we do question, however, is whether there are standard police protocols that were violated when the officers decided not to be present when they alerted Lord to Irish's allegations but instead opted to leave Lord a voice message on his phone -- notwithstanding Irish's specific warning that such notification would 'incite Lord to terrible violence.' Assuming the voice message was left on Lord's cell phone, it is likely that he received immediate notification and was left free to immediately do violence. And given the timeline presented in Irish's complaint, the police had apparently not taken any prior steps to evaluate Irish's allegations or Lord's propensity for violence before leaving him the voice message. Or if they did, the actions are not documented in the record. Neither party at oral argument could provide any detail on acceptable police procedures or training, if any, on how and when to notify the accused of the allegations that have been filed against him or her under similar circumstances. Our developing caselaw in this area helps explain why we pause. . . .[B]ased on this record, we do not know the steps, if any, that officers should take when they have reason to believe that an alleged perpetrator is violent and is likely to retaliate against a victim who reports such serious crimes. And as Stamps and Marrero-Rodríguez illustrate, violation of protocol and training is relevant both to the substantive due process and qualified immunity inquiries. Beyond the dearth of facts on police procedure and training, the record also offers no facts on exactly what the officers knew about the veracity of the allegations that Irish had made, about Lord's propensity for violence, and about the risk that Lord would act on that propensity to harm Irish. . . .If discovery reveals that the officers' actions violated accepted norms of police procedure or that they acted despite foreseeing the harm to Irish, it may strengthen the plaintiffs' argument that the officers exacerbated the danger that Lord posed. It may also directly speak to whether the officers acted in deliberate indifference to Irish's safety, so much so that their conduct shocks the conscience. By contrast, if discovery reveals that no protocols were violated, then the plaintiffs may have a harder time surviving a 12(b)(6) motion. While the fact that the officers did not take further discretionary steps to ensure Irish's safety may amount to negligence, mere negligence would be insufficient to maintain a claim of substantive due process violation. . . Similarly, if no or few protocols were violated, then the officers' chance of successfully asserting qualified immunity may increase, as a reasonable officer may not have known that acting in line with their own standard procedures and training would violate a private citizen's constitutional rights. . . But we cannot reach any of these conclusions without a fuller development of the facts. We vacate the district court's ruling as to the individual defendants and remand the case with instructions for discovery not inconsistent with this opinion.")

Hegarty v. Somerset County, 25 F.3d 17, 18 (1st Cir. 1994) ("On May 9, 1994, we entered an order granting the officers' emergency request to stay district court discovery pending their appeal of the denial of qualified immunity. The request was granted 'pending further order of this court.' We now elaborate the basis for our May 9 order and extend the stay of discovery pending our determination of these appeals. A qualified immunity defense is an immunity from suit and the rationale for allowing an immediate appeal from the denial of qualified immunity is that the immunity from suit is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial ... The immunity from suit includes protection from the burdens of discovery. 'Until this threshold immunity question is resolved, discovery should not be allowed.'... We recognize that Harlow's reference to staying discovery was in the context of the district court's resolution of the immunity question. But in light of the Court's later determination that a denial of qualified immunity is entitled to immediate appellate review, . . . we believe that the stay of discovery, of necessity, ordinarily must carry over through the appellate court's resolution of that question, so long as the appeal is non-frivolous. The rationale for staying discovery applies with no less force while the appeal, to which the officers are entitled, proceeds. It is important to note what is not involved here. As the officers concede, the district court, prior to its ruling on the issue of qualified immunity, properly ordered some discovery limited to that issue . . . . What the district court thereafter authorized, and what we have stayed pending these appeals, is more extensive discovery directed at the merits of the case.").

Castro v. United States, 34 F.3d 106, 112 (2d Cir. 1994) ("Where the claimant's description of the events suggests that the defendants' conduct was unreasonable, and the facts that the defendants claim are dispositive are solely within the knowledge of the defendants and their collaborators, summary judgment can rarely be granted without allowing the plaintiff an opportunity for discovery as to the questions bearing on the defendants' claims of immunity.").

Golio v. City of White Plains, No. 06 CIV. 1691 CM/GAY, 2006 WL 3199140, at *3 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 2, 2006) ("In short, this is the rare case in which the fact record needs to be more fully developed before the court can rule on the question of qualified immunity in the context of the false arrest claim against Officer Suggs. The motion is denied with leave to renew, either at the close of discovery or at trial.").

Burns v. Citarella, 443 F.Supp.2d 464, 468, 469 (S.D.N.Y. 2006) ("Plaintiff claims that she is unable to fully and effectively oppose defendants' motion for summary judgment in the absence of discovery–in particular, the opportunity to depose the individual defendants. Accordingly, plaintiff asserts that the present motion should be either stayed until discovery is completed or treated as a Rule 12 motion to dismiss. The court rejects this contention. . . . In keeping with the Supreme Court's observation that, in deciding the issue of qualified immunity, the court must assume plaintiff's version of the facts to be true (rendering defendants' story irrelevant), . . . this Court's Individual Practice Rules require that any defendant claiming qualified immunity (1) file a pro forma motion for summary judgment on that sole ground with his answer; (2) depose the plaintiff and file papers in support of the motion within thirty days thereafter; and (3) obtain a decision on the motion before conducting any further discovery. . . Granting plaintiff discovery about defendants' version of events before deciding the motion is not consistent with the goal of 'resolving immunity questions at the earliest possible stage in litigation,' by assuming plaintiff's version of the facts to be true.")

Elmaghraby v. Ashcroft, No. 04 CV 1409 JG SMG, 2005 WL 2375202, at *13, *21 (E.D.N.Y. Sept. 27, 2005) ("In sum, Crawford-El, Swierkewicz, and McKenna suggest the following principles when evaluating qualified immunity at the motion to dismiss stage: (1) a complaint must meet Rule 8(a)'s requirements: fair notice of the claims asserted and the grounds upon which they rest; (2) the plaintiff is entitled to all reasonable inferences from the facts alleged in the complaint, including those that defeat the immunity defense; (3) where there is a factual dispute bearing on the qualified immunity question, that dispute should be resolved at the earliest opportunity; and (4) to resolve such a dispute, it may be appropriate to limit discovery in scope (to issues that bear on the qualified immunity defense) and manner. . . . The issue of qualified immunity should be addressed at the earliest appropriate stage. Where, as here, there are factual disputes that bear on the availability of the defense, discovery may be structured accordingly. . . The personal involvement, if any, of the non-MDC defendants should be the subject of the initial stage of discovery. Accordingly, discovery concerning Ashcroft, the FBI Defendants (Mueller, Maxwell, and Rolince), and the BOP Defendants (Sawyer, Cooksey, and Rardin) will be generally limited to inquiries into their involvement in the alleged denials of due process. Appropriate topics will include whether the individual defendant participated in the creation and implementation of the policy or policies under which plaintiffs were detained, whether he or she had knowledge of the conditions under which plaintiffs were detained, and the defendant's involvement in or knowledge of the clearance process and the alleged bypassing of BOP procedures for challenging administrative segregation of pretrial detainees.").

Torres v. Village of Sleepy Hollow, 379 F.Supp.2d 478, 484 n. 4 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) (S.D.N.Y. 2005) ("Under this Court's rules, the plaintiff is deposed before a rule 12(c) motion on qualified immunity grounds is made, so that the plaintiff's complete story–not just the minimal allegations required of a pleader under Fed.R.Civ.P. 8–is before the Court. No other discovery (including depositions of the defendants) is permitted prior to the determination of the qualified immunity motion, however, because none would be relevant at the commencement of the lawsuit, when the Supreme Court and the Second Circuit require this issue to be decided.")

Williams v. County of Sullivan, 157 F.R.D. 6, 9 (S.D.N.Y. 1994) ("Neither the reasonableness of ... the defendants' conduct in light of information available to them nor the liability of each defendant can be resolved until all material issues of fact pertaining to these matters have been fleshed out. [cite omitted] A stay of all discovery under such circumstances is inconsistent with expeditious adjudication of the issue of qualified immunity .... Discovery dealing with the most obviously pertinent sources of information can be permitted to proceed initially, holding in abeyance questions regarding controverted further discovery until the results of initial discovery are known.").

THIRD CIRCUIT

P.F. v. Mendres, 21 F. Supp.2d 476, 483, 484 (D.N.J. 1998) ("We do not perceive our conclusion to be inconsistent with the Supreme Court's mandate that the immunity issue be resolved at the earliest possible stage of the litigation. The Court's opinion in Crawford-El indicates approval of the possibility that limited discovery may be necessary where the underlying substantive legal theory requires the Court to engage in some factual analysis to determine whether the defendant's conduct rises to the level of a constitutional violation. . . . In light of our conclusion that we cannot resolve the immunity issue at this juncture, we must next address how this particular litigation should proceed. The Supreme Court's opinion in Crawford-El teaches that we may tailor discovery narrowly and dictate the sequence of discovery so as to protect the defendant's immunity defense. . . . We must make it clear that this initial discovery phase is limited only to gathering information which bears upon our qualified immunity inquiry. In the context of this case, the initial discovery will be limited to gathering information pertaining to the inquiry that we must undertake in determining if defendant's conduct rises to the level of a constitutional violation of the plaintiffs' right to privacy. . . [O]nce this information is gathered, defendant may file a motion for summary judgment which raises the immunity defense again in light of the factual development gained through this initial discovery phase. Accordingly, we will deny the motion to dismiss without prejudice to the defendant's right to assert a qualified immunity defense in a properly supported motion for summary judgment.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Raynor v. Pugh, 817 F.3d 123, 130 n.5 (4th Cir. 2016) ("Raynor also argues that the district court erred in denying him any discovery. Generally, a court should not grant summary judgment when, as here, outstanding discovery requests on material issues exist. See Ingle ex rel. Estate of Ingle v. Yelton, 439 F.3d 191, 196–97 (4th Cir.2006). The district court stayed Raynor's discovery requests pending resolution of Pugh's qualified immunity defense, in accord with Crawford–El v. Britton. See 523 U.S. 574, 598, 118 S.Ct. 1584, 140 L.Ed.2d 759 (1998). But, without ruling on the (meritless at this stage) qualified immunity claim, the court granted summary judgment on evidentiary grounds, faulting Raynor for 'not provid[ing] any evidence, other than his own affidavit, to support his allegations.' In so doing, the court erred. On remand the district court should permit appropriate discovery before entertaining any additional motions for summary judgment.")

Tobey v. Jones, 706 F.3d 379, 389 (4th Cir. 2013) ("Based on Mr. Tobey's complaint, it is unclear whether Appellants' behavior was reasonably motivated by Mr. Tobey's 'disruptive' conduct or unreasonably motivated by his protected protest. What is reasonable in this context, therefore, requires greater factual development and is better decided once discovery has been conducted. See Martin, 980 F.2d at 952; DiMeglio v. Haines, 45 F.3d 790, 795 (4th Cir.1995) ("[W]here there is a material dispute over what the defendant did ... it may be that the qualified immunity question cannot be resolved without discovery .").")

McMillian v. Wake County Sheriff's Dept., No. 10-1576, 2010 WL 4366478, at *3, *4 (4th Cir. Oct. 28, 2010) (unpublished) ("McMillian has consistently asserted that, after he was handcuffed and subdued, Defendants knocked him to the ground, repeatedly struck him, and kneed him in the head, causing his eye to bleed and injury to his neck. In granting summary judgment to Defendants, the district court accepted Defendants' assertions that they handcuffed McMillian due to his disruptive conduct, and that their use of force was limited to accomplishing that objective. Neither the magistrate judge nor the district court squarely addressed McMillian's allegation that the complained-of use of force occurred after he was handcuffed. Accepting McMillian's allegations and evidence as true, as we must at this procedural juncture, see Jones v. Buchanan, 325 F.3d 520, 524 n. 1 (4th Cir.2003), we conclude the district court erred in finding there was no issue of material fact as to the need for the use of force and the extent of force Defendants used. Crediting McMillian's version of the events, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that knocking down, punching, and kicking an arrestee while he is in handcuffs are actions taken in good faith to restore order. . . Adjudication of this issue is complicated by the fact that the district court denied McMillian's repeated requests for discovery of any videotapes and photographs from the night in question. We review the denial of a request for discovery for an abuse of discretion. . . McMillian has steadfastly maintained that the jail's surveillance cameras captured the events at issue. The court denied McMillian's request for discovery of any such evidence, finding it was not relevant to Defendants' assertion of qualified immunity. We disagree. In evaluating whether a police officer is entitled to qualified immunity, the district court must assess whether there was a constitutional violation. . . Certainly, evidence that would have confirmed (or dispelled) McMillian's allegations pertaining to the events that form the subject of this lawsuit is highly probative of that issue. . . Because we conclude the denial of McMillian's discovery requests substantially prejudiced him, we hold the district court abused its discretion in denying these requests. For these reasons, we conclude the district court's grant of summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity was premature, particularly in light of the erroneous evidentiary ruling. Accordingly, we vacate the district court's order granting Defendants summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Ingle v. Yelton, 439 F.3d 191, 195, 196 (4th Cir. 2006) ("In holding that the defendant officers were entitled to qualified immunity, the district court relied almost exclusively on the officers' assertions that Christopher aimed his weapon at them. Ingle, of course, has no way to directly contradict the officers' statements. Because this is a deadly force case, 'the witness most likely to contradict [the officers'] story–the person shot dead– is unable to testify.'. . In such circumstances, 'a court must undertake a fairly critical assessment of the forensic evidence, the officer's original reports or statements and the opinions of experts to decide whether the officer's testimony could reasonably be rejected at a trial.' . . . Given the facts of this case, the district court could not conduct a thorough assessment of the officers' statements without allowing discovery as to whether videotapes exist and, if so, what they depict. Ingle presented compelling reasons to allow the requested discovery. She alleged that the officers' account–that the decedent aimed the gun at them through the open window of the truck–conflicts with the physical evidence suggesting that the window was closed when the officers shot it out. She even submitted an expert affidavit concluding that the 'shards of glass visible around the entire perimeter of the driver's side window' constitute 'proof that the driver's window was broken when the window was in a complete rolled-up position.' The State Bureau of Investigation echoed that view in its report on the incident, noting that the window was 'in an upward position' when it was shot out. Moreover, Ingle presented a plausible argument that such videotapes may actually exist. She asserted, and defendants' counsel confirmed at oral argument, that the APD instituted a policy of installing cameras in its vehicles in April 2001, several months before the shooting. While it may be that at the time of the shooting no cameras had yet been installed or were operative in any of the six APD vehicles at the scene, or the three additional APD vehicles located along Holiday Inn Drive, this policy clearly distinguishes Ingle's Rule 56(f) motion from cases where 'the evidence sought was almost certainly nonexistent or was the object of pure speculation.'").

Ingle v. Yelton, 2008 WL 398327, at *3 (4th Cir. Feb. 14, 2008) ("[T]he defendants and APD provided numerous affidavits, depositions, and evidence of two thorough investigations. All evidence confirmed that the APD had not produced a videotape and did not possess one. We cannot conclude that the district court abused its discretion in limiting discovery at this point and denying Ingle's motion to compel.") DiMeglio v. Haines, 45 F.3d 790, 795 (4th Cir. 1995) ("A district court may deny a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity and allow discovery to proceed only if it has addressed the threshold immunity question, and concluded (1) that the plaintiff alleged a violation of a clearly established right, but (2) that there existed a material factual dispute over what actually occurred, and (3) under the defendant's version, a reasonable official could have believed that his conduct was lawful. In instances where there is a material dispute over what the defendant did, and under the plaintiff's version of the events the defendant would have, but under the defendant's version he would not have, violated clearly established law, it may be that the qualified immunity question cannot be resolved without discovery. In such circumstances, it simply may be impossible to protect the defendant from all of the burdens that attend the pretrial process. Of course, after discovery and upon a proper motion, the district court may reconsider the question of qualified immunity.")

H.H. v. Chesterfield County School Bd., 2007 WL 4246487, at *5 (E.D.Va. Nov. 29, 2007) ("Having determined that plaintiffs' complaint does allege the violation of a constitutional right, and that the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, the Court now must inquire as to whether any facts material to defendants' claim of qualified immunity are in dispute. The parties dispute whether defendants kept H.H. restrained in her wheelchair for long periods of time, and this disputed issue of material fact is central to defendants' qualified immunity claim. The Fourth Circuit has held that 'ordering discovery on the issue of immunity ... [is] well within the discretion of the district court.' American Civil Liberties Union, Inc. v. Wicomico County, 999 F.2d 780, 787 (4th Cir.1993). The Court finds that it must permit plaintiffs to conduct discovery to obtain the facts from Moffett and Minguzzi necessary to resolve the disputed issue of material fact before it can rule on defendants' qualified immunity claim. Accordingly, the Court will deny defendants' motion for protective order.").

Delph v. Trent, 86 F. Supp.2d 572, 575-77 (E.D. Va. 2000) ("[T]here is a complex intersection between qualified immunity and supervisory liability. If a plaintiff can establish the requisite indifference in the face of a policy or widespread and pervasive abuses caused by a policy, the plaintiff may hold the responsible official liable in a supervisory capacity. However, if the official can respond that a reasonable person would not have known of the effects of the policy or that the policy violated clearly established laws, then that official is entitled to qualified immunity from suit. . . . To permit the plaintiff to seek discovery would expose an official to the types of abuses qualified immunity was intended to prevent. . . .[T]he Court has constructed two hurdles the plaintiff must overcome to win the right to discovery. First, the trial court must insure that plaintiff has alleged a cognizable injury with sufficient specificity that officials are not subject to burdensome or unnecessary discovery. . . The trial court may require the plaintiff to make specific factual allegations or may grant motions by defendant for more definite statements under Rule 12(e). Second, once plaintiff has made a sufficient allegation, the trial court must then resolve the threshold issue of immunity before proceeding to discovery. In doing so, the trial court must determine whether the officials violated clearly established law, assuming the plaintiff's allegations as true. If so, plaintiff may be entitled to discovery, subject to the discretion of the trial court and the limits of Rule 26. . . . After he receives the requested information, plaintiff will either be able to establish supervisory liability or he will not find sufficient proof of widespread abuse. If plaintiff cannot prove supervisory liability, there is no need to reach the issue of qualified immunity and plaintiff's action may be dismissed. If plaintiff can prove supervisory liability, then the Court may proceed to determine defendants' qualified immunity defense.").

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Collie v. Barron, No. 17-10935, 2018 WL 4182173, at *4 (5th Cir. Aug. 30, 2018) (per curiam) (not reported) ("Contending that the district court abused its discretion in denying him the opportunity to take discovery before it entered summary judgment, Collie decries that practice. He fears it will furnish 'rogue officers and poorly managed police departments' a 'virtual how-to booklet' to shield themselves from accountability. Collie asserts other Fort Worth Police officers had more information about the events that took place before Officer Barron shot Collie. Thus, discovery would have permitted him to prove Officer Barron either knew or should have known Collie did not fit the description of the robbery suspects and could not be the armed suspect. As relevant here, the goals of qualified immunity counsel no more than a minimum of necessary discovery before the court determines whether the defense attaches: 'Until this threshold immunity question is resolved, discovery should not be allowed.'. . This court has previously recognized '[o]ne of the most salient benefits of qualified immunity is protection from pretrial discovery.'. . The Supreme Court has emphatically directed, 'qualified immunity is an immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability.'. .Collie's position fails in several ways – beginning with the fact that he failed to preserve this argument for appeal. Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 56(d) requires a non-movant to present affidavits and evidence if he feels he needs discovery to properly defend against a summary judgment motion. . . Collie never sufficiently invoked Rule 56(d) in the trial court. Further, '[w]hen a defendant pleads the defense of qualified immunity, the district court may ban discovery at this threshold pleading stage and ... need not allow any discovery unless it finds that plaintiff has supported his claim with sufficient precision and factual specificity to raise a genuine issue as to the illegality of defendant's conduct at the time of the alleged acts.'. . Here, the parties' competing evidence convinced the court that Collie could not overcome the defense of qualified immunity. The court did not abuse its discretion or misapply the law when denying additional discovery.")

Patel v. Texas Tech University, No. 17-11234, 2018 WL 3045463, at *1 (5th Cir. June 19, 2018) (not reported) (" '[T]his court has established a careful procedure under which a district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of that defense.' Backe v. LeBlanc, 691 F.3d 645, 648 (5th Cir. 2012). The plaintiff 'must plead specific facts that both allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the harm he has alleged and that defeat a qualified immunity defense with equal specificity.'. . 'After the district court finds a plaintiff has so pled, if the court remains "unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts," it may issue a discovery order "narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim."'. . 'An order that simultaneously withholds ruling on a qualified immunity defense while failing to constrain discovery to develop claimed immunity is by definition not narrowly tailored.'. .It appears that the district court did not follow this court's 'careful procedure.' The record shows that the court held that the qualified immunity defense had been improperly raised in a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss, and should instead be raised in a later motion for summary judgment. Whether this decision intimated further that Appellants' motion was not well taken, because Plaintiff sufficiently carried his pleading burden, we cannot discern. In any event, the district court further failed 'to constrain discovery to develop claimed immunity' after apparently refusing to pass on qualified immunity in the first instance. . . The record, in sum, does not demonstrate that the court followed the procedures laid out in Backe v. LeBlanc and Lion Boulos v. Wilson. It must do so on remand.")

Bustillos v. El Paso Cty. Hosp. Dist., 891 F.3d 214, 223 (5th Cir. 2018) ("Both motions for protective orders noted that the Doctors had asserted qualified immunity. 'One of the most salient benefits of qualified immunity is protection from pretrial discovery ....' Backe v. LeBlanc, 691 F.3d 645, 648 (5th Cir. 2012). Thus, '[b]efore allowing discovery in a matter where qualified immunity is alleged, the district court must first find "that the plaintiff's pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome" a qualified immunity defense.'. . Because Bustillos' claims could not overcome the clearly-established prong of the qualified immunity defense, the district court did not err by declining to grant Bustillos' discovery requests.")

Randle v. Lockwood, 666 F. App'x 333, ___ & nn. 5, 6 (5th Cir. 2016) ("The district court's failure to address the question of qualified immunity violated the tenet that '[q]ualified immunity questions should be resolved "at the earliest possible stage in the litigation."'. . Regardless of the pleading standard applicable to Randle's claims, the district court was required to address whether the jailers were entitled to qualified immunity because the jailers asserted this defense in both their motions to dismiss and their objections to the magistrate judge's report and recommendation. By failing to address qualified immunity, the district court's order undercuts the doctrine of qualified immunity's goal of shielding public officials from 'unwarranted demands customarily imposed upon those defending a long drawn out lawsuit.'. . As a result, the jailers will likely be exposed to 'costly, time-consuming, and intrusive' pre-trial discovery before Randle is required to demonstrate that his allegations defeat the jailers' qualified immunity defense. . . . While the district court's order did not explicitly allow any discovery, discovery is the next logical step in the litigation process following the denial of a motion to dismiss. And the magistrate judge's report explicitly references the need for discovery before 'passing on the merits' of Randle's claim. Therefore the district court's denial of the motions to dismiss, if left undisturbed, is likely to lead to discovery. . . . For these reasons, we conclude that the district court erred by failing to address the jailers' qualified immunity defense when denying their motions to dismiss. . . . Nor does the district court's order satisfy the narrow exception to the general rule that qualified immunity should be decided as early in the litigation as possible. Under this exception, 'a district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of [the qualified immunity] defense.'. . But in order to properly defer the decision on qualified immunity, the district court must follow the 'careful' two-step procedure that we have established. . . First, it must 'determine "that the plaintiff's pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity."'. . Second, if the district court finds a plaintiff has so pleaded, it can then 'defer its qualified immunity ruling and order limited discovery if "the court remains unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts.'"' Here, the district court did not complete either step of this procedure.")

Mendez v. Poitevent, 823 F.3d 326, 336-37 (5th Cir. 2016) ("Plaintiffs also contend that the district court abused its discretion in ruling on defendants' motions for summary judgment before discovery, implicitly denying plaintiffs' request for a continuance to conduct discovery. Plaintiffs bore a heavy burden below because they sought discovery 'to disprove the applicability of an immunity-derived bar to suit because immunity is intended to shield the defendant from the burdens of defending the suit, including the burdens of discovery.'. . Courts are authorized under Rule 56(d) to defer ruling on a summary judgment motion and allow discovery, but 'Rule 56 does not require that any discovery take place before summary judgment can be granted.'. . And under Rule 56(d), deferring summary judgment and ordering discovery is appropriate only if the 'nonmovant shows by affidavit or declaration that, for specified reasons, it cannot present facts essential to justify its opposition.'. . A party 'may not simply rely on vague assertions that additional discovery will produce needed, but unspecified, facts.'. . Plaintiffs' affidavit here fell short. Plaintiffs' counsel alleged that they had no opportunity to depose Poitevent and the witnesses to the shooting. In support of the motion, counsel asserted that '[t]he testimony of these witnesses and others bear[s] upon the acts and omissions of Taylor Poitevent, and the reasonableness of his conduct in shooting Juan Mendez, Jr.' But plaintiffs did not identify below any reason why it could not obtain the testimony of the witnesses to the shooting through, for example, affidavits; indeed, plaintiffs submitted a declaration from one of them. And the witnesses' accounts were already incorporated into the record through the Texas Rangers' investigation report. In addition, Poitevent himself submitted his own testimony. Plaintiffs presented no reason why either Poitevent's affidavit or the witness accounts in the investigation report were insufficient, and their contention that summary judgment was inappropriate before they were able to depose Poitevent is unsupported. . . Plaintiffs did not, moreover, identify specific facts below that would alter the district court's analysis. . . Instead, they vaguely assert before this court that deposing the witnesses would have 'permitted [plaintiffs] to further discover the facts from the witnesses who saw the scuffle.' In other words, plaintiffs did not demonstrate below 'how the additional discovery [would] likely create a genuine issue of material fact.'. . Instead, the result of the discovery they sought was 'wholly speculative.'. .We thus hold that the district court did not abuse its discretion in implicitly denying plaintiffs' motion for a continuance to conduct discovery.")

Zantiz v. Seal, 602 F. App'x 154, 159-63 (5th Cir. 2015) ("We generally lack jurisdiction to review discovery orders. . . But we have jurisdiction to review certain discovery orders in cases involving the qualified immunity defense. . . In particular, we have jurisdiction to review such a discovery order if the district court does not first determine whether the plaintiff's pleadings, taken as true, are sufficient to overcome the qualified immunity defense. . . We also have jurisdiction to consider a discovery order that has not been 'narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.'. . We review such orders for abuse of discretion. . . We have jurisdiction to review such an order if it does not follow the two-step procedure that we have mandated in qualified immunity cases. . . First, the district court must determine that the plaintiff's well-pleaded facts, taken as true, would overcome the qualified immunity defense. . . Second, 'if the court remains unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts, it may issue a discovery order narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.'. . Such an order must 'identify any questions of fact [the district court] need[s] to resolve before it would be able to determine whether the defendants [are] entitled to qualified immunity.'. . We conclude that we have jurisdiction to review the discovery order here because it did not fulfill either step of this analysis. First, the order did not explicitly hold that Zantiz's pleadings, taken as true, overcame the qualified immunity defense. While some of the language in the discovery order implies that the magistrate judge thought that the pleadings overcame the qualified immunity defense, we have held that this holding must be made explicitly. . . The discovery order also fails the second step of Zapata. Even a 'limited discovery' order does not satisfy the second step if 'he district court [does] not identify any questions of fact it need[s] to resolve before it would be able to determine whether the defendants [are] entitled to immunity.'. . Here, the discovery order fails under this standard because it does not identify the questions of fact that needed to be resolved before the qualified immunity issue could be addressed. Thus, we conclude that the magistrate judge abused his discretion in issuing a discovery order that did not perform either of the steps described in Zapata.")

Doe v. Robertson, 751 F.3d 383, *7 (5th Cir. 2014) ("Plaintiffs claim that assessing the Service Agreement violations in isolation is not our task, as discovery has not been taken. In Plaintiffs' view, focusing solely on the contractual violations presumes that no other evidence could support their Bivens claim. Plaintiffs accordingly assert that they have a 'right to seek discovery ... to build the necessary record in the case at hand.' Plaintiffs misunderstand our standard of review at the motion to dismiss stage. We recognize that the question of whether an official 'had the requisite knowledge of a substantial risk is a question of fact' generally best resolved by discovery and fact-finding, should a claim survive a motion to dismiss. . . But here, at the motion to dismiss stage, we are tasked with deciding whether Plaintiffs have stated a plausible 'claim upon which relief can be granted.'. . In so doing, we cannot accept Plaintiffs' invitation to apply the 'no set of facts' test, which the Supreme Court has firmly rejected. Twombly . . . . It is, of course, conceivable that some set of facts could make Plaintiffs' claim plausible. Hypothetically, for example, Robertson and Rosado might have known of Dunn's dangerous proclivities, or they might have ignored contemporaneous distress calls from victims of or witnesses to the assaults. But 'a plaintiff armed with nothing more than conclusions' cannot 'unlock the doors of discovery.'. . Here, Plaintiffs have proffered a legal conclusion that Robertson and Rosado were deliberately indifferent, and for the reasons detailed above, their factual allegations, even assumed as true, do not make this conclusion plausible. . . Accordingly, the Complaint gives Plaintiffs no right to discovery.")

Morgan v. Hubert, 335 F. App'x 466, 2009 WL 1884605, at *5, *6 (5th Cir. July 1, 2009) ("The failure of specificity is no fault of Morgan's, however, because he has not yet had the benefit of discovery, and is bound by Rule 11 to allege only those facts for which he has or will likely have evidentiary support. As we said in Schultea, we do not require a plaintiff to plead facts 'peculiarly within the knowledge of defendants,'. . . and the facts omitted fall squarely within that category. We are mindful that the protection afforded by qualified immunity applies to the lawsuit itself, and not merely to liability, and thus the issue should be resolved as early as possible. . .Thus, we are reluctant to allow the case to proceed to full discovery with important questions regarding qualified immunity left unanswered. Schultea points the way forward. We noted there the district court's ability to tailor discovery to the defense of qualified immunity . . . . Such a course is called for here. Because key facts are unknown, and because these facts are solely within Hubert's possession, we do not consider the parties' remaining arguments regarding deliberate indifference. Instead, we vacate the district court's denial of qualified immunity and remand for discovery limited to that issue. We instruct the district court to carry the issue of qualified immunity and decide it anew once that discovery is complete.") [See also Morgan v. Hubert, 459 F. App'x 321 (5th Cir. 2012) (holding that because warden was not deliberately indifferent, warden was entitled to qualified immunity with respect to inmate's § 1983 Eighth Amendment claim.]

Dreyer v. Yelverton, No. 07-10970, 2008 WL 3911072, at *5 (5th Cir. Aug. 25, 2008) ("Contrary to Dreyer's assertions, Schultea does not expressly preclude a district court's rendering summary judgment without discovery. Dreyer is correct, however, that district courts may be required to allow discovery before ruling on a summary-judgment motion. On the other hand, it is incumbent upon counsel to properly move, under Rule 56(f), for such discovery. Restated, 'if a party cannot adequately defend [against a summary-judgment] motion, Rule 56(f) is his remedy'. Washington v. Allstate Ins. Co., 901 F.2d 1281, 1285 (5th Cir.1990) (citations omitted). But, 'Rule 56(f) does not require that any discovery take place before summary judgment can be granted.' Id.")

Hinojosa v. Johnson, No. 07-20030, 2008 WL 1924216, at *6 n.12 (5th Cir. May 1, 2008) ("Although qualified immunity is immunity from suit, including discovery, discovery may proceed against a government official where 'the plaintiff's allegations state a claim of violation of clearly established law,' Mitchell v. Forsyth, 472 U.S. 511, 526 (1985), as long as such discovery is ' Anarrowly tailored" to the question of qualified immunity.' Maxey by Maxey v. Fulton, 890 F.2d 279, 283 (10th Cir.1989).").

Alice L. v. Dusek, 492 F.3d 563, 565 (5th Cir. 2007) ("Dusek argues that her appeal of the district court's denial of qualified immunity is so broad as to divest the district court of jurisdiction to compel her compliance with discovery requests made related to the Title IX claims against Eanes ISD. We disagree. . . . Even though the factual basis of the Title IX claims and the § 1983 claim overlap, the claims are legally distinct–notably, Dusek does not and cannot assert qualified immunity from the Title IX claim against Eanes ISD. To the extent that Dusek is subject to discovery requests on claims for which she does not or cannot assert qualified immunity, such discovery requests do not implicate her right to qualified immunity . The district court may compel discovery disclosures related to the plaintiffs' Title IX claims because doing so does not interfere with any aspect of Dusek's appeal.").

Heitschmidt v. City of Houston, 161 F.3d 834, 840 (5th Cir. 1998) ("Heitschmidt argues on appeal that he should have been allowed limited discovery before the district court granted defendant's motion for qualified immunity. The district court dismissed Heitschmidt's claims on the basis that his pleadings did not state facts sufficient to overcome the qualified immunity defense. Qualified immunity is a defense from both liability and suit. . . Our Court has held that '[e]ven limited discovery on the issue of qualified immunity must not proceed until the district court first finds that the plaintiff's pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity.' . . Heitschmidt's motion for limited discovery was denied before the district court's decision on the defendants' motion to dismiss. There was, therefore, no error in that decision. Now that Heitschmidt's pleadings have been judged adequate to at least potentially state a claim, however, discovery can proceed on remand. We do not hold that Heitschmidt will eventually be able to establish a violation of his Fourth Amendment rights, but rather, that his pleadings are sufficient to create that possibility. . . Should further discovery lead to the conclusion that there is no genuine issue of fact which could support such a claim, there will be no procedural or substantive barrier to the filing of a motion for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity.").

Lion Boulos v. Wilson, 834 F.2d 504, 507, 508 (5th Cir.1987) ("Harlow, Mitchell and Jacquez make clear that qualified immunity does not shield government officials from all discovery but only from discovery which is either avoidable or overly broad. Discovery designed to flesh out the merits of a plaintiff's claim before a ruling on the immunity defense or discovery permitted in cases where the defendant is clearly entitled to immunity would certainly fall within this category. Immediate appeal would lie from these orders because Mitchell, Harlow and Jacquez require that immune defendants be exempt from avoidable, burdensome pretrial matters. However, a second class of discovery permitted before a ruling on a defendant's motion to dismiss does not encroach upon his qualified immunity claim. Discovery orders entered when the defendant's immunity claim turns at least partially on a factual question; when the district court is unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts; and which are narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim are neither avoidable nor overly broad. Such orders are not immediately appealable. The instant case falls within the latter category, not the former.").

Dyer v. City of Mesquite, Texas, No. 3:15-CV-2638-B, 2017 WL 118811, at *10–11 (N.D. Tex. Jan. 12, 2017) ("Above, the Court found that Plaintiffs satisfied the first part of the Fifth Circuit's "careful procedure" in that they pled facts which, if true, overcome the Officer Defendants' defense of qualified immunity. . . The Court, however, remains unable to rule on the Officer Defendants' immunity defense without further clarification of the facts because the facts provided do not allow the Court to analyze qualified immunity as to each individual defendant. . . As discussed above, Courts must examine each public official's actions independently to determine whether he or she is entitled to qualified immunity. . . While Plaintiffs recognize that they can name each Officer Defendant who was involved during the night, they cannot identify which individual engaged in what specific conduct. . . Consequently, the Court determines that the Officer Defendants' identities in relation to each action alleged—who did what that night—is a question of fact that can be resolved only with additional information through discovery. This information is essential before the Court can determine if each Officer Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity from the independent, unlawful actions alleged by Plaintiffs. Other courts have faced a similar qualified immunity dilemmas where plaintiffs cannot identify which of several responding police officers engaged in what specific conduct without discovery. . . . Here, Plaintiffs have demonstrated that, even with their independently-obtained redacted video and police report, they cannot supply the necessary information to ascertain which of the Defendant Officers did which of the alleged unlawful acts. Compounding the problem is that Graham, the only eye-witness aside from the officers, is deceased. And despite their insistence to the contrary, the Officer Defendants' reliance on their version of events contained in their Answer is unavailing to them at this stage of the case, where the Court, to the extent plausible, must accept the Plaintiffs' version of events. . . Therefore, similar to the courts in Khansari and Crisp, the Court finds that discovery is appropriate, albeit narrowly tailored to the limited issue of which of the individual officers were involved in the specific acts of alleged excessive force and denial of medical care and whether those officers are correspondingly entitled to qualified immunity. The specific and narrow scope of that discovery will be defined, with input from the parties, at a hearing before this Court, on a date to be set shortly. . . In the meantime, the Court does not deny but DEFERS its ruling on the Officer Defendants' qualified immunity defense, finding that limited discovery is necessary to resolve qualified immunity through summary judgment briefing.")

Sanders v. Vincent, No. 3:15-CV-2782-D, 2016 WL 5122115, at *13 (N.D. Tex. Sept. 21, 2016) ("The court denies . . . Sanders' requests that he be permitted to conduct discovery. First, with regard to his request to conduct discovery as to qualified immunity, such discovery should not be permitted until Sanders can satisfy the applicable heightened pleading. See Morin, 77 F.3d at 120 ("Public officials are entitled to qualified immunity from suit under § 1983 unless it is shown by specific allegations that the officials violated clearly established law."); Schultea, 47 F.3d at 1434 ("The district court need not allow any discovery unless it finds that plaintiff has supported his claim with sufficient precision and factual specificity[.]"). And he does not need discovery to the extent the court holds that qualified immunity is not available to Officer Bagley on Sanders' excessive force claim.Second, as for his request that he be permitted to conduct discovery regarding policies of the Town of Addison, Sanders has not demonstrated why he needs discovery to ascertain policies that—assuming they exist—should be determinable from public sources.")

Martone v. Livingston, 4:13-CV-3369, 2014 WL 3534696, *9, *13 (S.D. Tex. July 16, 2014) ("The Fifth Circuit delineated 'a careful procedure under which a district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of that defense.' Backe v. LeBlanc, 691 F.3d 645, 648 (5th Cir.2012). The Court must find that the plaintiff has pled 'specific facts that both allow the court to draw the reasonable inference that the defendant is liable for the harm he has alleged and that defeat a qualified immunity defense with equal specificity.'. . '[I]f the court remains "unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts," it may issue a discovery order "narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim."'. . In this case, Plaintiff has pled specific facts that allow this Court to draw the reasonable inference that the TDCJ [Texas Dep't of Criminal Justice] Defendants are liable under § 1983 for violations of Mr. Martone's Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights, and that defeat the TDCJ Defendants' assertion of qualified immunity. The Court remains unable to rule on the second prong of the qualified immunity defense given outstanding factual questions. Pursuant to the procedure established in Backe, the Court DEFERS ruling on qualified immunity and allows limited discovery to resolve the issue. Discovery is limited to the personal knowledge and personal conduct of each Defendant as it relates to Mr. Martone and the circumstances that led to his death. . . . As with the TDCJ Defendants, the Court remains unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts, particularly as they relate to the reasonableness question. In addition, the Court requires more information as to the delay resulting from Dr. Murray's policy of leaving the Huntsville Unit's infirmary unstaffed overnight. Pursuant to the procedure established in Backe, the Court DEFERS ruling on qualified immunity and allows limited discovery. Discovery is limited to the personal knowledge and personal conduct of Dr. Murray as it relates to Mr. Martone and the circumstances that led to his death.")

Khansari v. City of Houston, 14 F.Supp.3d 842, 861 (S.D. Tex. 2014) ("The Fifth Circuit has established a careful procedure under which a district court may defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of [the qualified immunity] defense. See Backe v. LeBlanc, 691 F.3d 645, 648 (5th Cir.2012) . . . As explained in Backe, once a district court has found that, if true, plaintiffs' factual allegations are sufficient to overcome defendants' assertions to qualified immunity, 'if the court remains "unable to rule on the immunity defense without further clarification of the facts," it may issue a discovery order "narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim."'. . .Absent further clarification of the facts to show which, if any, officers other than Officer Rutherford deployed their tasers against Corey, or which, if any, of the other officers had an opportunity to prevent, but chose not to prevent, the use of excessive force against Corey Khansari, the court is not able to rule on the defendant officers' assertions of qualified immunity to the plaintiffs' claims for the use or failure to prevent the use of excessive force against Corey. Limited discovery will be able to flesh out the remaining details of which officer or officers tasered Corey or wrongfully failed to prevent their fellow officers from tasering Corey. . . Since the court has concluded that plaintiffs' pleadings are adequate to at least potentially state a claim, discovery may proceed on the limited issue of which of the individual officers tasered Corey and whether those officers are entitled to qualified immunity. The court has not concluded that plaintiffs will eventually be able to establish a violation of Corey's Fourth Amendment rights, but only that the pleadings are sufficient to create that possibility. Should discovery lead to the conclusion that there is no genuine issue of fact that could support such a claim, there will be no procedural or substantive barrier to the filing of a motion for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity.")

Jones v. Tyson Foods, Inc., 971 F.Supp.2d 648, 655 (N.D. Miss. 2013) ("As a preliminary matter, the Court addresses Plaintiff's contention in his response that the Court should allow discovery prior to ruling on these Defendants' qualified immunity motion. The Court has freely allowed immunity-related discovery throughout this litigation; the only stay imposed on discovery was for discovery on the merits. . . Qualified immunity is 'both a defense to liability and a limited entitlement not to stand trial or face the other burdens of litigation. Provided it turns on an issue of law, a district-court order denying qualified immunity conclusively determines that the defendant must bear the burdens of discovery and is conceptually distinct from the merits of the plaintiff's claim.'. . Thus, engaging in discovery on the merits is not necessary, nor is it proper, prior to a ruling on the present qualified immunity motion. In fact, the United States Supreme Court has stated: 'Unless the plaintiff's allegations state a claim of violation of clearly established law, a defendant pleading qualified immunity is entitled to dismissal before the commencement of discovery.'. . For these reasons, the Court finds that it should rule on the present qualified immunity summary judgment motion at this time, but the Court will note if merits-discovery is needed to resolve certain issues presented in the motion.")

O'Dwyer v. Louisiana, No. 06-7280, 2008 WL 4452106, at *1 (E.D. La. Sept. 25, 2008) ("Without some clear legal authority, the Court finds that it is unjust for all parties to enjoy the benefits of the stay for those claiming qualified immunity . The Court's previous order limiting the scope of discovery will be rescinded and the matter referred to the magistrate judge for the formulation of a discovery plan.").

Gilbert v. City of Dallas, No. Civ. 3:99CV1463X, 2000 WL 748153, at 1-3 (N.D. Tex. June 8, 2000) ("In order to ensure the utmost protection from broad-reaching discovery, qualified immunity should be treated as a threshold issue which acts as a bar to a court's ability to hear the petitioner's claim. . . .[D]iscovery must not proceed until the District Court first finds that the plaintiff's pleadings assert facts which, if true, would overcome the defense of qualified immunity. . . . If the complaint sufficiently alleges facts to surmount the qualified immunity defense, the court must then determine whether discovery is necessary to 'clarify those facts upon which the immunity defense turns.' Wicks, 41 F.3d at 995. . . . After meeting the heightened pleading requirement, the court may permit discovery to enable Gilbert to ascertain only the facts that could overturn the defendants' right to qualified immunity. . . . The City of Dallas is not entitled to qualified immunity status. Therefore, discovery directed by the plaintiff against the City should be allowed to proceed. Individual defendants argue that if discovery is permitted against the City it will require their involvement and threaten the protections provided through qualified immunity. . . . However, 'parties who may be entitled to qualified immunity are not necessarily exempt from discovery when called as a witness to claims against a non-immune defendant.' Sorrells, 192 F.R.D. at 210 n. 8").

Estate of Sorrells v. City of Dallas, 192 F.R.D. 203, 207-09 (N.D. Tex. 2000) ("This case is a prime example of a troubling trend in civil rights cases. Time after time, individual defendants seek a stay of all discovery until the issue of qualified immunity is resolved. Yet these defendants do not seek a ruling on their immunity defense until they move for summary judgment. Invariably, the summary judgment motion is not limited to the issue of qualified immunity but covers the underlying substantive claims as well. Such maneuvering perverts the purposes of the discovery stay, creates inefficiency and confusion in the resolution of qualified immunity cases, and unfairly blind-sides plaintiffs by forcing them to respond to evidence before they have an opportunity to conduct discovery. The Court intends to end this practice today. . . . [T]he defendant should promptly move for dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6) if the complaint and Rule 7(a) reply fail to allege sufficient facts to overcome the immunity defense. . . . Only if more time is needed to develop the facts through discovery or otherwise should a defendant wait until the summary judgment stage to seek dismissal on the grounds of immunity. . . . Defendants never asked plaintiffs to file a Rule 7(a) reply. Nor did they move for dismissal under Rule 12(b)(6). Undoubtedly, this is because defendants realize that plaintiffs have alleged facts which, if proved, would overcome their immunity defense. Defendants themselves recognize the importance of the underlying historical facts because their pending summary judgment motion is supported by the affidavits of six police officers who participated in the events giving rise to this suit. Yet they vigorously oppose plaintiffs' efforts to conduct any discovery until the issue of qualified immunity is decided. The absurdity of this scenario should be plain. The only reason the question of qualified immunity is still unresolved is because defendants chose not to engage it as a threshold matter. Instead, defendants first raised the issue in a fact-intensive motion for summary judgment. They now hide behind the shield of qualified immunity to deny access to evidence solely within their control while using that same evidence against plaintiffs. Limiting discovery in these circumstances is inherently unfair.").

Jones v. City of Grand Prairie, No. Civ. 3:97-CV-1907-H, 1998 WL 119532, *2 (N.D. Tex. Mar. 6, 1998) (not reported) ("Jones surpassed Schultea's heightened threshold. However, Jones erroneously believes because he met this standard, he is entitled to full discovery. After meeting the heightened pleading requirement, the court may permit discovery to enable Jones to ascertain only the facts that could overturn the defendants' right to qualified immunity. [citing Wicks] In Jones' response, he requests discovery in order to 'investigate his case.'. . Before subjecting officials to broad and far-reaching discovery, the defendant's qualified immunity defense must be overturned. Jones may not develop his case against the individual defendants until the qualified immunity issue has been resolved. Jones' argument is devoid of any indication as to why he needs discovery to resolve factual disputes regarding defendants' qualified immunity defense.").

Cassanova v. Marullo, No. CIV. A. 94-376, 1995 WL 448005, *2 (E.D. La. July 27, 1995) (not reported) ("Because the issues for the defendants relating to their defense of qualified immunity and the issues relating to their defense on the merits are so similar, it would be impossible to separate discovery on the question of whether the defendants acted reasonably so as to be entitled to immunity from discovery on the question of whether 'they would have fired [Mr. Cassanova] even had [he] not exercised [his] right to free speech.' ... [T]his ruling does not violate the principles of qualified immunity. While the defendants may still be able to prevail on their defense of qualified immunity before trial, they may no longer rely on that defense to excuse them from the costs of broad-reaching discovery.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Robertson v. Lucas, 753 F.3d 606, 623, 624 (6th Cir. 2014) ("In the context of qualified immunity, deferential review of a district court order limiting discovery is imperative. . . .Discovery is disfavored in this context, but 'limited discovery may sometimes be necessary before the district court can resolve a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity.' Crawford–El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, 593 n. 14, 118 S.Ct. 1584, 140 L.Ed.2d 759 (1998). In Crawford–El, after noting the 'many options' a district court judge has in conducting discovery in a qualified immunity case, the Supreme Court explained: 'Of course, the judge should give priority to discovery concerning issues that bear upon the qualified immunity defense, such as the actions that the official actually took, since that defense should be resolved as early as possible.'. .Appellants assert that the district court erred when it permitted the appellants to depose certain appellees but limited the depositions to the qualified immunity issue. The district court, after briefing on the issue, authorized three-hour depositions of Verhiley, Cross, Mayer, Faith, Metcalf, and two non-defendant law enforcement officers. This was after appellees had voluntarily disclosed a tremendous number of documents. . . .The district court followed the Supreme Court's dictates on discovery in qualified immunity cases precisely. . . .Because a plaintiff cannot sustain a § 1983 or Bivens claim without a showing of personal responsibility on the part of the defendant, . . . appellants' Fourth Amendment claims—and the accompanying qualified immunity defenses—turned in large part on the individual actions of the defendants in this case. The same is true for the alleged Brady violations. Finally, as to appellants' argument that the conspiracy claims necessitated information about the wider investigation, no conspiracy can exist without the appellees' participation. The district court therefore did not err when it limited discovery to information pertaining to appellees' conduct.")

Reilly v. Vadlamudi, 680 F.3d 617, 628 (6th Cir. 2012) ("The district court understandably struggled with granting Defendants immunity at an early stage in the litigation. However, as previously emphasized, the purpose of qualified immunity is 'to ensure that insubstantial claims against government officials are resolved at the earliest possible stage in litigation.'. . For that reason, district courts in some cases 'will be able to establish entitlement to qualified immunity ... even before discovery.'. . This is one of those cases. A thorough review of the pleadings reveals that Dr. Vadlamudi and nurse Payne may have been negligent in diagnosing or treating Plaintiff. However, neither negligent medical care, nor the delay in providing medical care, can rise to the level of a constitutional violation absent specific allegations of sufficiently harmful acts or omissions reflecting deliberate indifference.").

Alspaugh v. McConnell, 643 F.3d 162, 168 (6th Cir. 2011) ("We . . . note that it is not proper to grant summary judgment without giving Alspaugh an opportunity to engage in discovery merely because the state defendants asserted qualified immunity as a defense. While we held in Summers v. Leis, 368 F.3d 881, 886 (6th Cir.2004), that a district court must address the question of qualified immunity prior to discovery, we did not hold that any time qualified immunity is asserted it is proper to dismiss on that ground prior to allowing any discovery. Rather, we merely instructed the district court to scrutinize the plaintiff's complaint to determine whether a violation of a clearly established constitutional right was alleged. . . In Adams v. Metiva, 31 F.3d 375, 387 (6th Cir.1994), we made clear that where the issue of qualified immunity turns on contested issues of fact, its determination is not one for summary judgment.")

Short v. Oaks Correctional Facility, No. 03-2089, 2005 WL 1002011, at *5 (6th Cir. Apr. 29, 2005) (unpublished) ("The plaintiff in Skousen failed to respond to the defendants' motion for summary judgment on the issue of qualified immunity and failed to file a Rule 56(f) affidavit explaining her inability to file affidavits in opposition to the defendants' motion. Faced with similar circumstances in the present case, the district court found that there were no facts material to Plaintiff-Appellant's claims that were genuinely at issue and, therefore, it was proper to consider the motions prior to discovery.").

Summers v. Leis, 368 F.3d 881, 886, 887(6th Cir. 2004) ("This Court has held on multiple prior occasions that, when faced with a motion based on qualified immunity, a district court can not avoid ruling on the issue. . . In the case of Skousen v. Brighton High School, we concluded that a district court committed legal error in dismissing a motion for summary judgement based on qualified immunity solely because discovery was not complete . . . We held that, because the defense of qualified immunity is a threshold question, if the defense is properly raised prior to discovery, the district court has a duty to address it. . . Rather than dismiss the [summary judgment] motion because discovery was not complete, the district court was required to determine–prior to permitting further discovery–whether [Plaintiff's] complaint alleged the violation of a constitutional right at all, and if so, whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. . . Only after the court inquires into whether any facts material to Plaintiff's claims are genuinely at issue, and only upon a finding that material facts are in fact in dispute is a court at liberty to hold a motion for summary judgment in abeyance pending additional discovery. . . Because the order denying summary judgment was premised on the legal question of qualified immunity rather than the existence of a genuine issue of material fact, the Court retained jurisdiction and found that an interlocutory appeal was proper. . . As mentioned above, the district court's denial of Leis's summary judgment motion was based on an apparent belief that any decision regarding qualified immunity was premature and should await the close of discovery. When a motion for summary judgment is filed, the party opposing the motion may, by affidavit, explain why he is unable to present facts essential to justify the party's opposition to the motion. . . The burden is on the party seeking additional discovery to demonstrate why such discovery is necessary. . .In this instance, in order to adequately oppose Leis's motion for summary judgment, Summers should have filed a Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(f) affidavit explaining his need for additional discovery.")

Wallin v. Norman, 317 F.3d 558, 563, 564 (6th Cir. 2003) ("This court has recently held that a district court's failure to rule on a motion for summary judgment until discovery was complete was legal error. [citing Skousen v. Brighton High School] Even though the defendants are free to renew their motion later, they would in the meantime be forced to go through a large part of the litigation process that the qualified immunity doctrine seeks to avoid. By failing to elaborate on why further discovery was necessary to properly decide the motion, the district court erroneously denied the defendants the benefit of their defense from suit (if that defense is, indeed, meritorious). We therefore conclude that the district court's refusal to address the merits of the defendants' motion based on qualified immunity was a conclusive determination for the purpose of allowing an interlocutory appeal. . . . Pursuant to Rule 56(f), a party opposing a motion for summary judgment is allowed to state that he or she is unable to present facts essential to justify the party's opposition. In that situation, the district court may permit further discovery so that the nonmoving party can adequately oppose the motion for summary judgment. But it is up to the party opposing the motion to state why more discovery is needed. . . . Wallin did not file such an affidavit. In its absence, there is no justification for the district court's blanket statement that a motion for summary judgment will be premature until the close of discovery.").

Skousen v. Brighton High School, 305 F.3d 520, 527 (6th Cir. 2002) ("The district court's failure to rule on the merits of Rambo's summary judgment motion was legal error. Rather than dismiss the motion because discovery was not complete, the district court was required to determine–prior to permitting further discovery–whether Skousen's complaint alleged the violation of a constitutional right at all, and if so, whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation. At that point, the court should have turned to the question of whether any facts material to Skousen's claims were genuinely at issue, an inquiry that required the court to review the motion and its supporting documents as well as the plaintiff's opposition and its supporting documents. Only then, and only on a finding that material facts were in dispute, was the court at liberty to hold the motion in abeyance pending discovery.").

Mcmillen v. Windham, No. 3:16-CV-558-CRS, 2018 WL 652830, at *2–3 (W.D. Ky. Jan. 31, 2018) (Federal Magistrate Judge Colin Lindsay) ("The Court acknowledges the position taken by Movants and the language in the Supreme Court and Sixth Circuit decisions that they cite. Indeed, the Sixth Circuit has stated broadly that '[t]he entitlement to qualified immunity involves immunity from suit rather than a mere defense to liability.'. . 'The philosophy behind the doctrine of qualified immunity "is a desire to avoid the substantial costs imposed on government, and society, by subjecting officials to the risks of trial."'. . 'Thus, when a defendant seeks dismissal on the basis of qualified immunity, "[a] stay of discovery is properly granted until the issue of immunity is resolved."'. . .While cognizant of that background, the Court emphasizes that it is not required to grant Movants' motion to stay. As the Sixth Circuit has noted, 'its prior holdings should not be interpreted as standing for the proposition that "any time qualified immunity is asserted it is proper to dismiss on that ground prior to allowing any discovery."'. . 'Thus, discovery may be permitted, even where qualified immunity is raised, if it is appropriate to frame the immunity issue.'. . In a 2013 decision from this district, Locke v. Mooney, 2013 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 102473 (W.D. Ky. July 22, 2013), for example, the Court permitted limited discovery when a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity was pending. . . . In Locke, the Court also permitted discovery to proceed on certain other claims that would survive regardless of the resolution of the motion to dismiss on the basis of qualified immunity. . . In this case, the Court is persuaded that discovery should not be stayed pending resolution of Movants' motion to dismiss. As Plaintiffs emphasize, arguments regarding qualified immunity are typically resolved at the summary judgment stage, rather than by a Rule 12(b)(6) motion to dismiss. . . In this case, Movants seek to resolve the issue through a motion to dismiss and argue that the qualified immunity issue is solely a question of law that does not require any discovery. Plaintiffs, on the other hand, argue in response to the motion to stay that qualified immunity is a fact-intensive issue that turns on the particular circumstances of each case. . . This argument is consistent with Plaintiffs' position in response to the motion to dismiss, in which they argue that the motion to dismiss should be converted to a motion for summary judgment and more discovery permitted prior to resolving the qualified immunity issue. . . Moreover, while they argue that discovery should be stayed, Movants concede that they served written discovery requests on Plaintiffs and participated in a deposition of Plaintiffs' expert witness. . . Based on the foregoing, the Court concludes that Movants are more amenable to participating in discovery during the pendency of their motion to dismiss than they profess to be in the motion to stay.")

Doe v. Ohio State Univ., No. 2:15-CV-2830, 2016 WL 6581843, at *14 (S.D. Ohio Nov. 7, 2016) (" 'Although an officer's "entitle[ment] to qualified immunity is a threshold question to be resolved at the earliest possible point," that point is usually summary judgment and not dismissal under Rule 12.' Wesley v. Campbell, 779 F.3d 421, 433–34 (6th Cir. 2015) . . . The concern at the Rule 12 stage is whether the plaintiff has alleged 'facts which, if true, describe a violation of a clearly established statutory or constitutional right of which a reasonable public official, under an objective standard, would have known.' Kennedy v. City of Cleveland, 797 F.2d 297, 299 (6th Cir. 1986). Even if the plaintiff has done so, the defendant may still be entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity 'if discovery fails to uncover evidence sufficient to create a genuine issue as to whether the defendant in fact committed those acts.'. . Doe cites a Fifth Circuit case for authority that 'a district court "may defer its qualified immunity ruling if further factual development is necessary to ascertain the availability of that defense.' Backe v. LeBlanc, 691 F.3d 645, 648 (5th Cir. 2012). The Sixth Circuit has not been explicit, like the Fifth Circuit has, about adopting a plan of narrowly tailored discovery to determine the issue of qualified immunity, but such a plan is consistent with the purposes of qualified immunity, namely, that 'insubstantial claims against government officials be resolved....at the earliest possible stage in litigation.'. . But whether the Court defers its ruling or simply denies Defendants' motion to dismiss, the Court will not make a final ruling on the issue of qualified immunity until after limited discovery. Here, the Court will grant in part and deny in part the motion to dismiss and permit limited discovery. If discovery fails to uncover sufficient evidence that the Administrators violated Doe's due process rights, then the Administrators may be entitled to qualified immunity.")

Porter v. City of Dyersburg*, *TN, No. 07-2638 B/P, 2008 WL 2222693, at *2 (W.D. Tenn. Instead, Porter asks that the court allow him to proceed to engage in discovery relating essentially to all issues in this litigation. . . . . For these reasons, the motion for leave to permit discovery is DENIED, and all discovery in this matter is STAYED until the court decides the issue of qualified immunity.")

Hagan v. City of Cleveland, 2007 WL 893825, at 6-8 (N.D. Ohio Mar. 22, 2007) ("Thus, the court finds that 'limited discovery' is necessary before the merits of Franko's motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds can be resolved. . . The Supreme Court has instructed that such discovery should be tailored specifically to the question of the officer's qualified immunity. . . The court should limit discovery to those issues that bear upon the qualified immunity defense, 'such as the actions that the official actually took.'. . . The constitutional violation alleged here is excessive (deadly) force, not an improper pursuit, nor an arguably ill-advised decision to enter a building in pursuit, without backup assistance. . . . Here, the crime suspected by the police was possession or sale of drugs, and Renshaw was apparently attempting to evade further investigation or arrest by flight. What is contested is whether Renshaw posed an immediate threat to the safety of Officer Franko, or whether he was actively resisting arrest, at the time of their confrontation on the apartment building stairway. No eyewitnesses (other than Franko) to the shooting itself are known to exist. The specific discovery as sought by Hagan cannot be characterized as 'limited.' Although Hagan acknowledges that an investigation into the shooting resulted in a Use of Deadly Force Investigation Team report, Hagan apparently seeks to reconstruct that entire investigation step-by-step. Thus, he seeks to depose at least 23 individuals, but only after 'complete responses to interrogatories and document requests because that information will be used during the depositions.'. . . Hagan acknowledges that he has already received relevant evidence from the defendants through an open records act request. . . . The court finds that limited discovery into facts underlying the assertion of qualified immunity is appropriate. That discovery shall be limited to that evidence which would directly relate to the disputed events on the stairway that led to Renshaw's death. In other words, discovery shall be limited to that which would shed light on the factual basis supporting (or not) Officer Franko's assertion of the necessity of the use of force at that point, such as the forensic evidence, the autopsy, evidence that would indicate the location of the parties at the time of the shooting, and so forth. Hagan is directed to narrow his discovery requests in light of this ruling, and to propound such amended requests to the defendants.").

O'Neil v. Kiser, Civil No. 03-CV-10001-BC, 2005 WL 579719, at *3, *4 (E.D. Mich. Mar. 8, 2005) ("It is true that the purpose of the qualified immunity defense is to protect government officials from 'the broad-ranging discovery that can be peculiarly disruptive of effective government.'. . However, the issue of qualified immunity requires an exploration of the contours of the constitutional rights in issue in the context of the specific facts of the case. . . Those questions, in turn, will involve exploration of 'the circumstances with which the official is confronted, and often on the information that he possesses.'. . The critical inquiry is 'whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation confronted.'. .All the dimensions of that 'situation,' therefore, are the proper subject of discovery. . . .The matter has been referred to the magistrate judge for pretrial case management, where it soon will return. The Court has no doubt that the magistrate judge is more than equal to the task of managing discovery within the proper framework as outlined by circuit precedent.").

Hansen v. Cannon, No. 01-3076, 2001 WL 1637660, at *2 (7th Cir. Dec. 18, 2001) (Not published) ("On appeal the Hansens first argue that the district court improperly stayed discovery pending the outcome of the defendants' motions for summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. As the district court observed, one purpose of qualified immunity is to protect public officials from 'broad-ranging discovery' that can be 'peculiarly disruptive of effective government.' . . . But qualified immunity does not shield public officials from discovery entirely. If the Hansens' allegations stated a claim that the defendants violated a clearly established law, and the parties disagreed as to what actions the law enforcement officers took, discovery may be appropriate for the limited purpose of addressing the issue of qualified immunity.") Trombetta v. Bd. of Education, Proviso Township High School District 209, No. 02 C 5895, 2004 WL 868265, at 2-5 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 22, 2004) ("In their present motion, the District and Jackson seek reconsideration of the Court's denial of their motions in limine nos. 4 and 10. In those motions, defendants sought an order barring questioning of any School Board members at trial regarding their motivations for what they characterize as the reorganization (plaintiff characterizes it as a termination of his employment) on the grounds of legislative immunity from suit, as well as any comment about those motivations by Trombetta or his attorneys (motion # 4), and any reference to their motives regarding the 'termination' (motion # 10). . . . Defendants' request to preclude any inquiry or mention of their motives amounts to a request for entry of summary judgment. Were the Court to grant what defendants request, the case would be over. A claim of retaliation for the exercise of First Amendment rights requires the plaintiff to prove that he suffered adverse action because of his exercise of protected rights, or, to put it another way, that 'the defendants' actions [were] motivated by [the plaintiff's] constitutionally protected speech.'. . The plaintiff cannot conceivably prevail without introducing evidence of, and arguing, the motivation of those who made the decision he attacks–in this case, Superintendent Jackson, Mayor Serpico, and the Board as a whole. Thus if defendants prevail on their motion for reconsideration, they are entitled to judgment in their favor. This request amounts to a motion for summary judgment which is not made in timely fashion. . . . There is another significant reason why defendants' claim is without merit. The District and Jackson argue that the Board members' legislative role entitles them to a testimonial privilege against inquiry about their reasons for acting. Even were this a viable claim, it is beyond question that the Board members have waived any such privilege. Each of the Board members appeared, without objection, for a deposition (nearly a year ago) and testified fully and completely about all of the events surrounding the termination / reorganization, including inquiries about their motives in acting as they did. If a testimonial privilege existed, it existed when the depositions were taken. Yet the Board members testified at their depositions about their reasons for acting, and they made no effort to seek a protective order barring inquiries about their reasons for acting as they did. . . . Finally, other than citing a plethora of cases, most of them either state-law decisions or non-controlling decisions of other district courts, defendants have made no effort to focus the Court in on any cases like this one in which the decision under attack is an employment-related decision by a public body and the plaintiff's claim is one that, as noted earlier, requires inquiry into the motivating factors for the decision. Based on our quick review, most of the cases appear to concern zoning matters, not the termination of a person's employment. If the purported evidentiary privilege proposed by the District and Jackson barred inquiry into the motivations of the members of a public entity that made employment decisions, it effectively would amount to a grant of immunity not just to the entity's individual members, but to the entity as a whole. If accepted, this would not only contravene Owen v. City of Independence, 445 U.S. 622 (1980), in which the Supreme Court held that municipal bodies sued under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 are not entitled to the immunities from suit available to government officials, but would also effectively abrogate prohibitions against employment discrimination (Title VII, the ADEA, the ADA) for any municipal body whose "legislative" members are given decision making authority over employment matters. Defendants have marshaled no support for such a sweeping rule.").

Kaufman v. Saari, 889 F. Supp. 1105, 1113 (E.D. Wis. 1995) ("The plaintiffs state that they have been prevented from engaging in discovery due to stays on discovery imposed by the court prior to resolution of the issue of qualified immunity. They contend that summary judgment is inappropriate because they have not had an opportunity to engage in discovery . . . . The plaintiffs ignore the instruction of the Supreme Court in Mitchell v. Forsyth that the doctrine of qualified immunity is intended to protect government officials from the burdens of litigation and the corresponding burden of discovery where a plaintiff has failed sufficiently to demonstrate a violation of clearly established law. [cite omitted] While I found the allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint sufficient to meet the minimal pleading standards imposed by Rule 8(a), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, I reserved judgment on the question of qualified immunity. The limited information presented by the plaintiffs in response to the defendant's motion shows that their claims are the type of 'insubstantial claims' which should be resolved under the doctrine of qualified immunity prior to the commencement of discovery. [cite omitted] The plaintiffs are expected to have some factual support for their claims prior to commencing their action.").

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Johnson v. Moody, 903 F.3d 766, 772-74 (8th Cir. 2018) ("The Supreme Court has repeatedly emphasized that qualified immunity is an immunity from suit that should be resolved 'at the earliest possible stage in litigation' to ensure that insubstantial damage claims against government officials are resolved 'prior to discovery.'. . When plaintiff has asserted a § 1983 claim requiring proof of wrongful motive, and defendant asserts a pre-discovery claim of qualified immunity, the district court 'may insist that the plaintiff put forward specific, nonconclusory factual allegations that establish improper motive,' 'should give priority to discovery concerning issues that bear upon the qualified immunity defense,' and has 'broad discretion to tailor discovery narrowly and to dictate the sequence of discovery.'. . . To defeat a motion for summary judgment based on qualified immunity, the plaintiff must put forth facts showing that the officer's conduct violated a constitutional right, and that the right was clearly established at the time of the alleged misconduct. . . The district court has discretion to decide 'which of the two prongs of the qualified immunity analysis should be addressed first in light of the circumstances in the particular case at hand.'. . Thus, when Defendants moved for summary judgment based on qualified immunity for Moody and Mathis, supported by their testimony at the state court suppression hearing and the state court's finding—however limited—of no bad faith, Plaintiffs were required to respond with affirmative evidence of bad faith if bad faith was an essential element of their Count I claims. . . . Here, in response to Defendants' qualified immunity motion, Plaintiffs presented no evidence tending to refute or contradict Defendants' strong evidence from the state court proceedings that their conduct in investigating C.P.'s serious allegation of sexual misconduct, however questionable or incomplete, was not conscious-shocking behavior as a matter of law. Rather, Plaintiffs asked the district court to defer ruling on qualified immunity until after they subjected Moody and Mathis to extensive, burdensome discovery. The district court did not abuse its discretion in denying this request, consistent with the teaching of Crawford-El v. Britton and other Supreme Court and circuit court precedents. Based on the summary judgment record, the district court concluded, as Pearson v. Callahan expressly authorized, that Moody and Mathis were entitled to qualified immunity from the Count I claims, not simply because the law was not clearly established, but because their conduct in investigating did not violate Johnson's constitutional rights. This ruling was consistent with our decision in Akins v. Epperly, and Plaintiffs do not challenge it on appeal. Evidence that investigators ignored factual inconsistencies in the evidence, negligently failed to look into leads, and did not question the alleged victim's credibility is insufficient to establish that they investigated in a reckless, conscience-shocking manner. . . . Plaintiffs did not request additional discovery focused on the qualified immunity issue. The district court's determination that Plaintiffs presented no evidence refuting Defendants' showing of no bad faith or conscience-shocking investigation was essential in resolving the threshold qualified immunity issue. And that determination proved to be fatal to all of Plaintiffs' claims against the City and the Police Department Defendants as a matter of law. Plaintiffs requested time to conduct wide-ranging discovery into all aspects of the investigation and numerous Police Department policies. But they made no showing (i) that any sought-after facts are essential to resist summary judgment on any of their claims, or (ii) that any such evidence actually exists. Therefore, the district court did not abuse its discretion in denying Plaintiffs' Rule 56(d) request to defer its ruling until additional discovery was completed and in granting summary judgment dismissing all claims.") Janis v. Biesheuvel, 428 F.3d 795, 800, 801 (8th Cir. 2005) ("Janis further argues that she could prove that a genuine issue of material fact exists if she is permitted to engage in discovery. Qualified immunity is an immunity from suit, not simply from liability. . .Its purpose is to 'avoid Asubject[ing] government officials either to the costs of trial or to the burdens of broad-reaching discovery" in cases where the legal norms the officials are alleged to have violated were not clearly established at the time.'. . Accordingly, '[u]nless the plaintiff's allegations state a claim of violation of clearly established law, a defendant pleading qualified immunity is entitled to dismissal before commencement of discovery.'. . Janis claims to be seeking the following additional information: 1) what was demonstrated by the tape recordings of radio traffic between the people involved in the incident; 2) what the officers remember regarding the incident that is not contained in the police reports; 3) what Richards stated to officers at the scene; 4) what movements Richards made within his vehicle other than grabbing the steering wheel; 5) how long it took for officers to remove Richards; 6) whether the other officers involved remember the incident the same way as the two primary two officers; 7) what the training of each involved officer was; and 8) whether these officers required to participate in additional training because of other past incidents of excessive force. However, Janis already possessed police reports of the incident, a transcript of the radio traffic between a highway patrol trooper who was involved in the pursuit and the dispatcher, and the daily activity report from the Fall River County Dispatcher. Janis also had affidavits from both officers involved in removing Richards from his vehicle. Finally, Janis had a videotape from one of the officers' vehicles that provided a partially obstructed view of the events that transpired when Richards was pulled over. Thus, the district court reasonably concluded that Janis already had much of the information she might have found with further discovery. Accordingly, Janis failed to meet her burden of establishing that the amount of force used was objectively unreasonable. Therefore, the officers' actions do not constitute a violation of a constitutional right.")

Lovelace v. Delo, 47 F.3d 286, 287 (8th Cir. 1995) ("[I]f the plaintiffs' allegations state a claim of violation of clearly established law and the parties disagree as to what actions the law enforcement officers took, discovery may be appropriate for the limited purpose of addressing the issue of qualified immunity.").

McCabe v. Macaulay, 450 F.Supp.2d 928, 935, 936 (N.D. Iowa 2006) ("In sum, for the court to make a determination as to whether the Individual Federal Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, Plaintiffs are entitled to know what facts the Individual Federal Defendants were presented with at the time of Plaintiffs' arrests. . . The mere fact that the Individual Federal Defendants have asserted a qualified immunity defense does not completely eviscerate the Plaintiffs' right to conduct discovery. . . For the defense of qualified immunity to have meaning, however, discovery in this case must be narrowly tailored to only those facts essential to deciding whether the Individual Federal Defendants are entitled to that defense. . . . For example, in granting Plaintiffs' Rule 56(f) Motion, the court does not grant Plaintiffs the right to conduct far-reaching discovery to pursue their theory that a nationwide conspiracy existed within the highest levels of the Secret Service to suppress dissent at President Bush's re-election rallies. Whether or not such a conspiracy existed is immaterial to the qualified immunity defense presently before the court. . . Accordingly, the court shall grant in part Plaintiffs' Rule 56(f) Motion. Plaintiffs are entitled to limited discovery, that is, to know the circumstances surrounding their arrests, insofar as those facts might reveal what information the Individual Federal Defendants possessed at the time each acted. . . In other words, only discovery that is 'essential' to resolve the Individual Federal Defendants' qualified immunity defenses shall be permitted.").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Costa v. County of Ventura, 680 F. App'x 545, ___ (9th Cir. 2017) ("The district court abused its discretion by denying all discovery after the defendants' assertion of qualified immunity. '[L]imited discovery, tailored to the issue of qualified immunity, will sometimes be necessary before a district court can resolve a motion for summary judgment.' Moss v. U.S. Secret Serv., 572 F.3d 962, 973 (9th Cir. 2009) (first citing Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 646 n.6 (1987);

then citing Crawford–El v. Britton, 523 U.S. 574, 593 n.14 (1998) (plurality opinion)). Specifically, if the actions alleged by the plaintiff are such that no reasonable officer could have believed them lawful, and if the officer alleges that she took actions different from those alleged by the plaintiff, 'then discovery may be necessary before [the plaintiff]'s motion for summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds can be resolved.' Anderson, 483 U.S. at 646 n.6. Here, the Estate alleged the violation of a clearly established right under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, namely the excessive force allegedly used by an officer, who the Estate claims shot Costa while Costa was immobilized by the officer's dog. This version of events conflicts with the officer's declaration that the dog did not succeed in immobilizing Costa. The district court denied the Estate the opportunity to conduct discovery, then granted summary judgment based on exhibits tendered by the defendants. In particular, it relied on the officer's affidavit and the unsworn interview of the other eyewitness. Under Anderson, the defendants' claim of qualified immunity did not prohibit the district court from allowing the Estate to obtain discovery. The district court therefore abused its discretion by precluding the Estate from taking the depositions of the only living individuals who witnessed the shooting and instead relying exclusively on the defendants' declarations supporting their version of the events. At a minimum, the denial of such discovery deprived the Estate of any opportunity to test the defendants' declarations through depositions, and it thereby prejudiced the Estate.")

Committee for Immigrant Rights of Sonoma County v. County of Sonoma, No. C 08-4220 PJH, 2009 WL 2382689, at *27, *28 (N.D. Cal. July 31, 2009) ("The parties argue at length about the applicability of Iqbal to this case in general and to discovery in particular. As should be apparent from the court's citation to Iqbal throughout this order, the court finds that notwithstanding the factual distinctions, the Supreme Court's latest pronouncement on pleading standards applies to this case, just as does Twombly. A quick Westlaw search reflects that Iqbal has been cited nearly 1000 times by district and appellate courts in the few months since its issuance, so the court's conclusion is no stretch. There is little case law, however, in the wake of Iqbal elucidating the relationship between the adequacy of the pleadings and the plaintiff's right to engage in discovery and the court has not yet determined exactly how it will apply the reasoning of that case to this and the hundreds of other pending cases on the court's docket. For now the court relies on Rule 26(c) under which County Defendants have brought their motion for a protective order, while looking to Iqbal for guidance. In attempting to reach an appropriate balance the court has considered several factors. Like Iqbal, this case raises significant issues of qualified immunity. Given that the purpose of a qualified immunity defense is not only to permit the accused government official to avoid liability, but also to free that official from the disruptions, inconvenience and expense of discovery, a goal that would be defeated if discovery were permitted. The court has already found that qualified immunity is a viable defense for the individual federal defendants and County defendants have indicated an intent to raise the defense after the claims are clarified in an amended complaint. On the other hand, this case, unlike Iqbal involves, in addition to government officials, government agencies which are not subject to qualified immunity. Given the sheer scope of the claims and the rulings in favor of plaintiffs that the court has made in this order, it is unlikely that this case will be entirely disposed of on any number of motions to dismiss. Thus, discovery is inevitable. On balance, the court finds that good cause exists to impose a limited stay of discovery. Thus, County Defendants' motion for a protective order is granted and plaintiffs' motion to compel is denied. County defendants need not respond to the outstanding discovery and no new discovery may be propounded pending plaintiffs' filing of the first amended complaint and County Defendants' response. Following the court's review it will be determined whether discovery should proceed against either the government agencies or the individual defendants or both.").

Tubar v. Clift, No. C05-1154JCC, 2006 WL 521683, at 2-4 (W.D. Wash. Mar. 2, 2006) ("The seemingly broad prohibition on discovery announced in Harlow has not gone unqualified, however. First, qualified immunity is available only to individual government officials, not governmental entities. . . Second, where there is a dispute as to both the reasonableness of the official's actions and the factual characterization of those actions, the U.S. Supreme Court has acknowledged that a plaintiff may be permitted to carry out a limited amount of discovery 'tailored specifically to the question of [an official's] qualified immunity.'[citing Anderson] In effect, the defense of qualified immunity only protects government officials from 'broad-reaching' discovery. . . With respect to the first and second categories of discovery requests that Defendants seek to stay, the Court finds that Defendant Clift is entitled to protection against discovery requests propounded to him personally. However, because there appears to be a factual dispute as to the underlying events in this case, Defendant Clift should be required to answer any discovery seeking information relating to the actual events giving rise to his qualified immunity defense. Therefore, Clift individually is required to provide responses to requests for written discovery and documents if those requests specifically relate to the parties' factual disputes concerning the shooting incident at issue in the present case. Further, Defendant Clift may be deposed, but the scope of the deposition must be strictly limited to questioning regarding the events giving rise to his qualified immunity defense. Any discovery that is outside this limited inquiry will be stayed. . . The Court must undertake a more detailed analysis with respect to the written discovery requests propounded to Defendant City. At the outset, the Court notes that Defendants' motion to stay has been filed on behalf of both Officer Clift and the City. However, Defendant City is not permitted to assert a defense of qualified immunity and is accordingly not entitled to a stay of discovery on the written discovery enumerated in the motion, even if such requests seek personal information concerning Defendant Clift . . . . Although the Court is mindful of the various policy justifications for the Harlow rule, the Court does not read Harlow so broadly as to necessarily prohibit any and all discovery relating to a government official asserting a defense of qualified immunity. . . . Accordingly, a stay on Plaintiff's written discovery requests to Defendant City merely because the information concerns Defendant Clift would exceed the proper reach of a stay justified by Defendant Clift's assertion of qualified immunity in this case. Defendant City argues, however, that certain items of discovery directed to it can only be answered by Defendant Clift and that the mere fact that Plaintiff has directed discovery to the City in name only should not undermine Defendant Clift's protection from discovery in this matter. . . This argument has merit, because allowing such conduct would circumvent the policy underlying Harlow. Accordingly, the Court finds that Defendant City is required to answer Plaintiff's requests for written discovery. However, in keeping with the protection from discovery of Defendant Clift himself, the Court makes the following exception to the City's requirement to answer discovery. To the extent that an answer to any of Plaintiff's requests (1) legitimately would require Defendant Clift's personal knowledge or consultation of documents exclusively under his control, and (2) bears upon matters beyond an inquiry into the actual events giving rise to the qualified immunity defense, Defendant City need not include that information in its responses. However, as to requests that do bear upon the actual events giving rise to the qualified immunity defense, Defendant City must provide answers, even if such answers require consulting Defendant Clift, because Defendant Clift is not protected from such discovery. Further, in the event that Defendant Clift's qualified immunity defense is denied, Defendant City will be required to supplement its responses in accordance with the discovery rules. The limited stay on discovery ordered here is not an invitation for Defendants to avoid legitimate discovery requests by trumpeting Defendant Clift's qualified immunity defense. Accordingly, Defendants are advised to review written discovery responses to ensure that they are consistent with the dictates of Federal Rules of Civil Procedure 26(g) and 37(g).").

TENTH CIRCUIT

Stonecipher v. Valles, 759 F.3d 1134, 1148, 1149 (10th Cir. 2014) ("The Stoneciphers make one last procedural argument. They contend the district court abused its discretion when they were denied the opportunity for additional discovery before it granted the defendants' motions for summary judgment. . .But because qualified immunity protects against the burdens of discovery as well as trial, a district court may stay discovery upon the filing of a dispositive motion based on qualified immunity. . . The court may grant pre-discovery summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity if the plaintiffs cannot explain 'how discovery will enable them to rebut a defendant's showing of objective reasonableness.'. . If, however, the district court determines it cannot rule on the immunity defense without clarifying the relevant facts, the court 'may issue a discovery order narrowly tailored to uncover only those facts needed to rule on the immunity claim.'. .The district court concluded, and we agree, that Valles possessed arguable probable cause for the arrest and charging decision. The Stoneciphers do not explain how discovery would enable them to rebut this showing. In their reply brief, the Stoneciphers mention that discovery would allow them to obtain the complete correspondence between Valles and Jennings, but they do not explain how this material would rebut the finding of arguable probable cause. . . Both Valles and Jennings averred that Jennings independently reviewed Mr. Stonecipher's file. Because the Stoneciphers do not explain how discovery will allow them to rebut the finding of objective reasonableness, the district court did not err in granting summary judgment for the defendants without allowing for discovery.")

Jones v. Hernandez, 2007 WL 4269052, at *3, *4 (10th Cir. Dec. 6, 2007) ("While a ruling on qualified immunity 'should be made early in the proceedings,' . . . discovery as to evidence central to the qualified immunity analysis must be allowed. . . On the record before the district court, there was doubt as to whether the scoring protocol employed by the interview panel was subjective or objective. The district court should not have granted summary judgment while that factual dispute was still unresolved. . . . For the same reason, the court's dismissal of Ms. Jones' claims against Sheriff Hernandez was erroneous. Ms. Jones has alleged and may be able to prove that she had a property interest in promotion, based on a nondiscretionary mode of selection. Ms. Jones' claims against Sheriff Hernandez cannot be resolved in his favor as a matter of law, but require factual development, along with the claims against the other defendants.").

Mee v. Ortega, 967 F.2d 423, 430 (10th Cir. 1992) (factual disputes required more development before district court could rule on qualified immunity).

Lewis v. City of Ft. Collins, 903 F.2d 752, 754, 758 (10th Cir. 1990) ("Qualified immunity is not a shield from all discovery. . . In some cases, discovery may be necessary to determine whether the defendants' challenged conduct violated clearly established law and thus, whether defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. However, until the threshold immunity question is determined, discovery shall be limited to resolving that issue alone. [cites omitted] Based on the record before us, the order of the district court does not limit discovery to the resolution of the qualified immunity issue. As such, defendants have been denied their entitlement to be free from the burden of overbroad discovery. Accordingly, we have jurisdiction over this appeal. . . . Liberal application of rule 56(f) should not be allowed to subvert the goals of Harlow and its progeny. [cite omitted] Accordingly, in response to a summary judgment motion based on qualified immunity, a plaintiff's 56(f) affidavit must demonstrate 'how discovery will enable them to rebut a defendant's showing of objective reasonableness' or, stated alternatively, demonstrate a 'connection between the information he would seek in discovery and the validity of the [defendant's] qualified immunity assertion.' [cite omitted] To that end, it is insufficient for the party opposing the motion to merely assert that additional discovery is required to demonstrate a factual dispute or 'that evidence supporting a party's allegation is in the opposing party's hands.'" [cites omitted]).

Lowery v. County of Riley, 2008 WL 3562061, at *1, *2 (D. Kan. Aug. 12, 2008) ("There are three alternatives available to the Court concerning the scheduling of discovery in this case while awaiting a ruling by the Supreme Court on a Petition for Writ of Certiorari: (1) allow only discovery on the Monell claims to proceed; (2) stay all discovery; or (3) allow all discovery to proceed. The alternative to allow only Monell discovery presents problems that the Court has previously discussed. It would be very difficult, if not impossible, to delineate precisely the scope of any discovery that could take place during pendency of the Petition for Writ of Certiorari on the Monell claims so that it did not include evidence related to the qualified immunity claims Defendants are attempting to vindicate. . . It was this blurred line between discovery related to Monell claims and discovery related to the Defendants' qualified immunity claims which concerned the Court during the Tenth Circuit appeal. As previously stated in the December 27, 2007 Memorandum and Order, if the Court were to allow 'limited' discovery to proceed (only on the Monell claims), there was a very real possibility that there would be a duplication of discovery in the future, particularly if the decision denying qualified immunity were affirmed. This would be both expensive and inefficient. Defendants argue that this fact justifies the second alternative– the continued stay of all discovery in this case pending decision by the U.S. Supreme Court. The Court might agree had there been a dissenting opinion in the Tenth Circuit appeal or some indication that the decision by the Tenth Circuit was in conflict with those of other circuits or was a case of first impression. None of these circumstances are present in this case. There was no dissenting opinion, and only one judge out of the thirteen judges who considered the Petition for Rehearing En Banc voted to grant the motion. Nothing in the Tenth Circuit opinion indicates that it presents a case of first impression on a unique issue of law or that it is contrary to decisions of other circuits. While this is no guarantee that the Supreme Court will deny a petition for certiorari, it is a major indication of the difficulty Defendants face in convincing the Supreme Court that discretionary review is justified in this case. . . Thus, the present circumstances are significantly different than they were at the time this court previously refused to allow discovery to proceed during the Tenth Circuit appeal.Considering all the facts, the Court believes that the third alternative is the appropriate result. It is now time to move forward and complete all discovery so that there will be no further delays in setting a trial on the merits of Plaintiffs' claims. The case has been on file since March 2004, and Defendants have had ample opportunity to make their case for a finding of qualified immunity on the major claims brought by Plaintiffs. While there is still a chance that Defendants will prevail on their claim of qualified immunity in the Supreme Court, weighing that chance against the continued delay to Plaintiffs from their day in court leads the Court to deny the motion for any continued stay of discovery.").

Howse v. Atkinson, No. Civ.A. 04-2341GTV-DJW, 2005 WL 994572, at *2 (D. Kan. Apr. 27, 2005) (not reported) ("The Court recognizes that staying discovery as to all Defendants has consequences to Plaintiff in that there are risks that witnesses' memories will fade, witnesses may relocate, and documents may get misplaced or destroyed. The Court, however, finds that in this case the risk is slight because Defendants are only seeking to [sic] a temporary stay of discovery until the Court rules on the Motion to Dismiss, filed on February 25, 2005 and fully briefed on April 11, 2005. The Court finds that Defendant KUPI would be prejudiced from having to proceed with bifurcated discovery while the Court resolves the immunity issues raised by Defendants Atkinson and Hagedorn. The Court further finds that bifurcation of discovery would be inefficient. Although Defendant KUPI has not asserted an immunity defense that would warrant staying discovery pending a ruling on a dispositive motion, the Court finds that the risk of prejudice to Defendant KUPI from proceeding with bifurcated discovery while the Motion to Dismiss is pending outweighs any risk of prejudice to Plaintiff from a temporary stay of discovery as to all parties.")

Rome v. Romero, 225 F.R.D. 640, 643, 644 (D. Colo. 2004) ("Although the Supreme Court recognizes that a well-supported claim of qualified immunity should shield a defendant from 'unnecessary and burdensome discovery,' Crawford-El, 523 U.S. at 598, invocation of the defense is not a bar to all discovery. . . . Even where a qualified immunity defense is asserted, some limited discovery is still permitted. As the Supreme Court in Crawford-El observed, qualified immunity does not protect an official from all discovery, but only from that which is 'broad-reaching.' . . Limited discovery may be necessary when the doctrine is asserted in a motion for summary judgment on contested factual assertions. . . . A plaintiff faced with a defense of qualified immunity in a motion for summary judgment may also be entitled to conduct discovery to explore facts essential to justify opposition to the motion as provided for by Fed.R.Civ.P. 56(f). . . . In addition, discovery up to the point when the qualified immunity issue is presented for adjudication may be appropriate. The protection of the governmental actor is best served when the issue of qualified immunity is raised at the earliest possible stage of the litigation. . . Because the official controls when the issue is presented for adjudication, he cannot be said to be unduly burdened if he foregoes an opportunity to address the issue prior to the commencement of discovery, and instead waits to assert it until some point later in the litigation. In such circumstances, it may be appropriate to stay discovery only after the official presents the issue, and to require responses to existing discovery requests. . . .The foregoing discussion explores the type of discovery that the individual Defendants should be protected against: namely, discovery requests (i) directed against the individual Defendants, (ii) in support of a claim for monetary damages,[footnote omitted] (iii) which seek information other than that relating to disputed factual issues regarding the actual events giving rise to the qualified immunity defense. By contrast, discovery requests directed at the institutional Defendants; relating to any claim for declaratory or injunctive relief; or seeking information regarding the individual Defendants' version of the incidents in question are properly made, notwithstanding the pendency of the Motion for Summary Judgment.").

Sonnino v. University of Kansas Hospital Authority, 220 F.R.D. 633, 639 (D. Kan. 2004) ("In this case, the Individual Hospital Defendants have filed neither a motion to dismiss nor a motion for summary judgment. They have only raised qualified immunity as a defense in their answer to Plaintiff's Complaint. . . By failing to assert the defense in a dispositive motion, the Individual Hospital Defendants have failed to place the issue of qualified immunity before the Court. While the Court recognizes that defendants are generally entitled to have the Court determine the issue of qualified immunity prior to their being subjected to discovery, they must take the necessary steps to bring the issue before the Court for resolution. Defendants are not entitled to an indefinite suspension of discovery while they ponder whether and when to file a motion to dismiss or for summary judgement. . . . In light of the above, the Court overrules the qualified immunity objections that the Individual Hospital Defendants have asserted in response to many of Plaintiff's discovery requests."), reconsidered in part, 221 F.R.D. 661 (D. Kan. 2004).

Quinn v. City of Kansas City, No. Civ.A. 98-2236-KHV, 1998 WL 919129, at *2, *3 (D.Kan. Nov. 6, 1998) (unpublished) ("[W]hile qualified immunity is a powerful defense in other contexts, in excessive force cases the substantive inquiry is the inquiry that decides whether the qualified immunity defense is available to the government actor. . .If plaintiff alleges that police used excessive force in violation of the Fourth Amendment, the qualified immunity inquiry becomes indistinguishable from the merits of the underlying claim. Whether police used excessive force in a case under Section 1983 has always been seen as a factual inquiry best answered by the fact finder.").

Van Deelen v. City of Eudora, No. 96-4040-SAC, 1997 WL 445821, at *2, *3 (D. Kan. May 8, 1997) (not reported) ("The defendant Diehl offers no authority for his argument that he cannot be compelled to participate in discovery as a witness to the claims against the other defendants. His protection from discovery extends only to the claims which are brought against him and to which he has properly asserted an immunity defense. Diehl does not contest the magistrate judge's finding that his deposition 'is necessary in order to complete discovery against the other defendants.'. . Consequently, the magistrate judge correctly permitted the deposition of Diehl to proceed as to the claims against the other defendants. The magistrate judge also allowed the deposition to 'include the claims against Diehl since these claims may be factually intertwined with the other claims.' The defendant Diehl does not contest the possibility of a factual relationship between the claims against him and the claims against the other defendants. Diehl simply sets up his right to avoid discovery on claims against him until the district court finally resolves his immunity defenses. In Diehl's opinion, any intrusion denies him immunity. In this situation, the district court would agree that the deposition of the party asserting an immunity defense generally should proceed subject to the following conditions. The witness may be asked questions which relate to matters that are relevant to the claims against the other defendants or which are likely to lead to matters that are relevant to the claims against the other defendants. The witness may not be asked questions which do not satisfy either of the above relevance standards and which are related to the claims which the witness has asserted an immunity defense. The magistrate judge here avoided this more involved approach in favor of permitting Diehl's deposition to proceed without a subject-matter limitation but with a time limitation. The magistrate judge balanced the interests of the other parties against the interests of Diehl in avoiding discovery. The magistrate judge found that a deposition limited to two hours was a minor intrusion to Diehl in contrast to the other parties' interests in moving the litigation forward on the other claims.The district court finds that the magistrate judge did not clearly err in allowing Diehl's deposition to proceed on certain conditions.").

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

R.F.J. v. Fla. Dep't of Children & Families, No. 16-17560, 2018 WL 3752227, at *2–3 (11th Cir. Aug. 7, 2018) (not published) ("Brady and Perry argue that the district court erred by deferring its ruling on their qualified-immunity defenses until after discovery is completed. . . We agree. Qualified immunity is not a last exit before liability. Instead, qualified immunity is a right to be free from litigation altogether once the defense is established. . . . Otherwise, parties could be required to expend significant time, money, and energy only to go 90 miles down the road of a dead-end drive. . . The district court's deferral of its decision violates these principles. And it is not in keeping with our prior precedent in Howe. Like in this case, the district court in Howe delayed ruling on the officers' qualified immunity and directed them to commence discovery. . . We vacated that order and directed the district court to resolve the immunity defense 'before requiring that the parties litigate Howe's claims any further.'. . .Although we understand the district court's decision below, given the flurry of facts from outside the complaint, Brady and Perry are entitled to a ruling sooner rather than later. Consequently, we must vacate the district court's order of November 18, 2016, and remand for the district court to take one of two actions: (1) enter a substantive ruling on Brady's and Perry's pending motion to dismiss or (2) grant Plaintiffs' motion for leave to file a third amended complaint. . . and deny as moot Brady's and Perry's pending motion to dismiss. Should the district court make the latter choice and should Brady and Perry again move to dismiss on qualified-immunity grounds, the district court should resolve those motions before requiring the parties to litigate the claims any further.")

Howe v. City of Enterprise, 861 F.3d 1300, 1302-03 (11th Cir. 2017) ("In the present case, the district court's order not only reserved ruling on the defendants' claims to immunity until after Howe filed a second amended complaint, it also instructed the parties to confer and develop their Rule 26(f) report. Under Rule 26(f), the parties must confer and develop a proposed discovery plan, and '[i]n conferring, the parties must consider the nature and basis of their claims and defenses and the possibilities for promptly settling or resolving the case ....' . . . The part of the order requiring the parties to confer and discuss settlement before the court ruled on the defendants' motion to dismiss on immunity grounds is inconsistent with our decision in Bouchard Transportation. And the part of the order requiring the parties to develop their Rule 26(f) report before the court ruled on the immunity defenses is also inconsistent with Bouchard Transportation and other decisions which establish that immunity is a right not to be subjected to litigation beyond the point at which immunity is asserted. The district court's order of March 31, 2016, is vacated except to the extent that it denies without prejudice the motion to dismiss on immunity grounds and directs Howe to amend his complaint again. After Howe has filed his second amended complaint, the defendants may file another motion to dismiss that includes assertions of immunity from suit. . . If they do so, the district court should decide those immunity issues before requiring that the parties litigate Howe's claims any further.")

S.D. v. St. Johns County School Dist. No., 3:09-cv-250-J-20TEM, 2009 WL 4349878, at 1-4 (M.D. Fla. Nov. 24, 2009) ("In Iqbal, the primary issue resolved by the Supreme Court related to the pleading requirements under Rule 8 and Rule 9(b) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, not whether discovery must be stayed pending a motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds. [discussing Iqbal, Siegert, Harlow, Mitchell, Anderson] The Court notes that the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals has used language that discovery should be delayed 'if possible' while dispositive motions are resolved to decrease costs to the litigants and save judicial resources. [discussing Eleventh Circuit cases] In the instant matter, unlike many of the aforementioned cases (if not all), the dispositive motion by the lead defendant, St. Johns County School District, has been resolved against it. Thus, the case will proceed. While the defense of qualified immunity with respect to the Individual Defendants have not yet been resolved, their knowledge of the underlying facts regarding this case would appear relevant to the claim against the School District. . . . Although the Court acknowledges that discovery should likely be stayed in situations where the granting of the motion to dismiss could dispose of the entire action, the facts that pertain to the instant matter are unique in the sense that Plaintiffs' claims against the School District have survived the motion to dismiss stage of the proceedings . . . . Unless the Court stays all discovery, the Individual Defendants will nevertheless be subject to pretrial discovery as fact witnesses. . . . [T]he Court will amend its Order to the extent that any discovery sought from the Individual Defendants shall be limited to factual issues relevant to the suit against the School District. Discovery of facts relevant only to individual liability as to the named Individual Defendants is premature at this juncture; therefore, the Individual Defendants shall not be subject to such discovery. . . unless their motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity grounds is denied.”).

Martinez v. McCord, No. 1:06-CV-636-WKW, 2008 WL 2003789, at *6 n.9 (M.D. Ala. May 8, 2008) (“The court is mindful of the broad scope of qualified immunity and frequently faces pre-discovery motions to dismiss in § 1983 cases involving law enforcement actions. As the Eleventh Circuit has acknowledged in dicta, it is important to ‘purs[ue] discovery to a reasonable extent so as to permit appropriate factual showings [because] anything less may result in grants of summary judgment solely because of inadequate discovery.’. . With that in mind, however, the court is vested with ‘broad discretion to tailor discovery narrowly and to dictate the sequence of discovery,’ and expects to hear motions to ‘limit the time, place, and manner of discovery, or even bar discovery altogether on certain subjects,’ . . . so as to ‘ Aprotect [ ] the substance of the qualified immunity defense.”‘)

Marshall v. West, 2007 WL 1540231, at *9 (M.D. Ala. May 24, 2007) (“[T]he critical question is whether West and/or Hutson were aware of facts which arguably would have justified a reasonable suspicion of illegal activity. . . Plaintiff essentially has argued that, without the benefit of discovery, it is impossible for him to allege those facts because he does not know what, if any, information Defendants possessed when they initiated the traffic stop. . . . Given the unique circumstances of this case, the court finds that it is appropriate to deny the motion to dismiss because the qualified immunity inquiry turns on facts which are within the knowledge and control of Defendants. . . . No proper purpose would be served by penalizing Plaintiff and dismissing his claim prior to discovery because he failed to plead facts of which he says he is unaware. As recited in the margin, other courts have denied qualified immunity at the Rule 12(b)(6) stage on similar grounds.[collecting cases]”).

K.M. v. Alabama Department of Youth Services, 209 F.R.D. 493,495 (M.D. Ala. 2002) (“The defendants [argue] that the claims against all of the defendants are so intertwined that allowing discovery to proceed against one is tantamount to allowing discovery to proceed against them all. According to the defendants, to preserve their immunity, should that immunity be found to exist on appeal, requires the prohibition of all discovery for all defendants during the pendency of the appeal. The court agrees that the discovery stay should generally extend to all discovery in this case, as there is no ascertainable line between that discovery needed in the case of the claims against Ziegler and Aseme and the claims of the other defendants. However, there is also equity in saying that this discovery stay should not result in unfair prejudice to the rights of the plaintiffs and their claims against Ziegler and Aseme, from the loss of records or witnesses occasioned by the delay on appeal by the other defendants. . . Therefore, some leeway is appropriate to give the plaintiffs the assurance that this passage of time will not irrevocably prejudice their claims against the non-appealing defendants. They should be allowed to collect limited information in order to identify potentially critical witnesses and to preserve documents that may well be central to their litigation as to the non-appealing defendants. Because the parties are in the best position to advise the court as to how to achieve this goal with the interest of all taken into consideration, the court will order that the parties confer and submit to the court a joint "preservation" plan that satisfies the goals expressed in this order.").

VI. WHEN IS RIGHT "CLEARLY ESTABLISHED?"

A. What Law Controls?

U.S. SUPREME COURT

District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 591 n.8 (2018) ("We have not yet decided what precedents--other than our own-- qualify as controlling authority for purposes of qualified immunity. See, e.g., Reichle v. Howards, 566 U. S. 658, 665-666 (2012) (reserving the question whether court of appeals decisions can be 'a dispositive source of clearly established law'). We express no view on that question here. Relatedly, our citation to and discussion of various lower court precedents should not be construed as agreeing or disagreeing with them, or endorsing a particular reading of them. See City and County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 575 U. S. ___, ___, n. 4 (2015) (slip op., at 14, n. 4). Instead, we address only how a reasonable official 'could have interpreted' them. Reichle, supra, at 667.")

Taylor v. Barkes, 135 S. Ct. 2042, 2044-45 (2015) (per curiam) ("No decision of this Court establishes a right to the proper implementation of adequate suicide prevention protocols. No decision of this Court even discusses suicide screening or prevention protocols. And 'to the extent that a "robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority"' in the Courts of Appeals 'could itself clearly establish the federal right respondent alleges,'. . . the weight of that authority at the time of Barkes's death suggested that such a right did not exist. [collecting cases] The Third Circuit nonetheless found this right clearly established by two of its own decisions, both stemming from the same case. Assuming for the sake of argument that a right can be 'clearly established' by circuit precedent despite disagreement in the courts of appeals, neither of the Third Circuit decisions relied upon clearly established the right at issue.")

> See also Weishaar v. County of Napa, No. 14-CV-01352-LB, 2016 WL 7242122, at *11 (N.D. Cal. Dec. 15, 2016) ("Combining all this — the general rules on qualified immunity, the Supreme Court's decision in Taylor, and the Ninth Circuit's in Van Orden — the pivotal question in this case might be phrased thus: On the 'particular facts' of this case, in this 'specific context,' did Mr. Foster pose a 'serious risk of suicide' so that any 'reasonable,' 'competent' officer would have known that they could not be 'deliberately indifferent' to his plight, and that by failing to do more than they did to protect him from suicide — because what is in question is 'the violative nature of [the defendants'] particular conduct,' Hamby, 821 F.3d at 1091 — they were clearly violating his constitutional rights? Viewing the evidence most favorably to the plaintiff, the court thinks that a jury question exists on this point. A reasonable juror could conclude that Mr. Foster presented a

> 'serious risk of suicide,' which would have triggered the 'clearly established right' that the Ninth Circuit recognized in Van Orden. On the one hand, when asked directly, Mr. Foster repeatedly denied being suicidal. . . On the other, one of Mr. Foster's intake forms related that, after being arrested, he told the transporting officers that 'he wished he would die.'. . Prison officials also knew that he had a history of psychiatric illness, for which he was then on medication, and that he had previously attempted suicide. . . The court cannot summarily hold Commander Wilson immune on these facts. The question must be put to the fact-finder. The court thus declines to grant summary judgment to Commander Wilson on the ground that she is qualifiedly immune from suit. The court recognizes that this holding reflects a tension in the law. On the one hand, in Taylor the Supreme Court has said that, at the time of Mr. Foster's death in November 2012, through to June 1, 2015 (when Taylor was released), nothing in its precedent established a clear constitutional right to suicide-screening or -prevention protocols. Taylor, 135 S. Ct. at 2044 45. On the other hand, in a decision that followed Taylor by about a month, the Ninth Circuit held that, since 'at least' 2005, there has been a clearly established constitutional right that protects inmates from deliberate indifference when they present a serious risk of suicide. Van Orden, 609 F. App'x at 475. This would suggest that if inmates exhibit a serious suicide risk, then they have a constitutional right guaranteeing that corrections officers attend to their needs. As precedent stands, reading both Taylor and Van Orden, this court holds that a reasonable jury could find that Mr. Foster presented a 'serious risk of suicide' that triggered his 'clearly established right' to something more than 'deliberate indifference.'")

City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Calif. v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1776 (2015) ("[E]ven if 'a controlling circuit precedent could constitute clearly established federal law in these circumstances,' Carroll v. Carman, 574 U.S. ——, ——, 135 S.Ct. 348, 350, 190 L.Ed.2d 311 (2014) (per curiam), it does not do so here.")

Carroll v. Carman, 135 S. Ct. 348, 350 (2014) ("Here the Third Circuit cited only a single case to support its decision that Carroll was not entitled to qualified immunity—Estate of Smith v. Marasco, 318 F.3d 497 (C.A.3 2003). Assuming for the sake of argument that a controlling circuit precedent could constitute clearly established federal law in these circumstances, see Reichle v. Howards, 566 U.S. ——, ——, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2094, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012), Marasco does not clearly establish that Carroll violated the Carmans' Fourth Amendment rights.")

Reichle v. Howards, 132 S. Ct. 2088, 2094 (2012) ("Assuming arguendo that controlling Court of Appeals' authority could be a dispositive source of clearly established law in the circumstances of this case, the Tenth Circuit's cases do not satisfy the 'clearly established' standard here.")

Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 615, 616 (1999) (The Court concluded general Fourth Amendment principles did not apply with obvious clarity to the officers' conduct in this case. Furthermore,

A[p]etitioners [had] not brought to [the Court's] attention any cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule on which they [sought] to rely, nor [had] they identified a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.").

United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 269 (1997) [Note: case involved criminal prosecution under 18 U.S.C. § 242] ("[I]n applying the rule of qualified immunity under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and Bivens . . . we have referred to decisions of the Courts of Appeals when enquiring whether a right was 'clearly established.'. . . Although the Sixth Circuit was concerned, and rightly so, that disparate decisions in various Circuits might leave the law insufficiently certain even on a point widely considered, such a circumstance may be taken into account in deciding whether the warning is fair enough, without any need for a categorical rule that decisions of the Courts of Appeals and other courts are inadequate as a matter of law to provide it.").

Elder v. Holloway, 114 S. Ct. 1019, 1023 (1994) ("Whether an asserted federal right was clearly established at a particular time, so that a public official who allegedly violated the right has no qualified immunity from suit, presents a question of law, not one of 'legal facts.' [cites omitted] That question of law, like the generality of such questions, must be resolved de novo on appeal. [cite omitted] A court engaging in review of a qualified immunity judgment should therefore use its 'full knowledge of its own [and other relevant] precedents.'").

D.C. CIRCUIT

Bame v. Dillard, 637 F.3d 380, 384, 386 (D.C. Cir. 2011) ("In this case the principle of constitutional avoidance counsels that we turn directly to the second question. As the Court recognized in Pearson itself, 'There are cases in which it is plain that a constitutional right is not clearly established but far from obvious whether in fact there is such a right.'. . This is such a case. Therefore the first and, as it happens, only question we address is whether it was clearly established in September 2002 that strip searching an arrestee before placing him in a detention facility without individualized, reasonable suspicion was unconstitutional. To answer this question, 'we look to cases from the Supreme Court and this court, as well as to cases from other courts exhibiting a consensus view,' Johnson v. District of Columbia, 528 F.3d 969, 976 (D.C.Cir.2008)–if there is one. . . . We conclude the law in 2002 did not clearly establish that strip searching all male arrestees prior to placement in holding cells at the Superior Court violated the Fourth Amendment. The governing precedent was then, as it is now, Bell v. Wolfish, and nothing in Bell requires individualized, reasonable suspicion before strip searching a person entering a detention facility. . . . We are aware of no Supreme Court case . . . that suggests a reasonable officer could not have believed his actions were lawful despite a consensus among the courts of appeals when a precedent of the Supreme Court supports the lawfulness of his conduct. A different reading of Bell by the several circuits to have considered the issue before 2002 could not 'clearly establish' the unconstitutionality of strip searches in this context. That Powell and Bull came down after 2002 is of no moment; those opinions simply accord with our own understanding that Bell did not establish the unconstitutionality of a strip search under conditions like those present here. . . . Because there was in 2002 no clearly established constitutional prohibition of strip searching arrestees without individualized, reasonable suspicion, we need not consider whether Dillard had individual suspicion as to each of the plaintiffs.")

Dormu v. District of Columbia, Civil Action 08-00309(HHK), 2011 WL 2632330, at *8 (D.D.C. June 7, 2011) ("This case presents the question of whether, at the time of Dormu's arrest, an individual had a clearly established right to be free from a police officer's injury-inducing application of handcuffs after the individual complained that the cuffs were too tight. Neither the D.C. Circuit nor the Supreme Court have specifically addressed this question. The consensus among other courts, however, is overwhelming. Almost every Court of Appeals has held that overly tight handcuffing can constitute excessive force, where the handcuffing has resulted in injury or where an individual complains about the overly-tight cuffing. [collecting cases] Thus, it was clearly established at the time of Dormu's arrest that he had the right to be free from injury-inflicting handcuffing where Dormu complained about the tightness of the cuffs.")

Afifi v. Lynch, 101 F.Supp.3d 90, (D.D.C. 2015) ("The Court finds that the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on both of the plaintiff's Bivens claims because, as discussed more fully below, neither the Fourth Amendment nor First Amendment rights he seeks to vindicate in this suit were clearly established at the time and in the place where the challenge conduct occurred. . . . The plaintiff argues that at the time the individual defendants employed the GPS device, such warrantless use was deemed unconstitutional by this Circuit in United States v. Maynard, 615 F.3d 544, 555–56 (D.C.Cir.2010) . . . . The plaintiff also notes that for purposes of the qualified immunity analysis, a court ordinarily looks to 'cases of controlling authority in [its] jurisdiction.'. . As a result, the plaintiff argues that the individual defendants' warrantless use of a GPS device was squarely in violation of binding Circuit precedent and therefore violated clearly established law. This argument ignores two salient features of the present dispute. First, the Circuits were split regarding the constitutionality of the warrantless use of a GPS device at the time of the conduct at issue. . . Second, the warrantless use of a GPS device was lawful under Ninth Circuit precedent at the time of its use in the present case. In other words, the individual defendants' warrantless use of the GPS device was valid in California, the jurisdiction in which the individual defendants used the GPS device. . . Thus, not only were the Circuits split at the time of the individual defendants' conduct, but the conduct was lawful in the jurisdiction in which it occurred. Both factors favor the grant of qualified immunity to the individual defendants. . . . To avoid the implication of the Circuit split, the plaintiff seizes upon Youngbey v. March for the proposition that '"[i]n determining whether the legal rules at issue are clearly established,"' a court must look only to cases of controlling authority in its own jurisdiction. . . Yet, Youngbey did not address the issue of qualified immunity where the defendants acted in a jurisdiction different from the forum of the lawsuit. In such situations, '[w]hen faced with inconsistent legal rules in different jurisdictions, national officeholders should be given some deference for qualified immunity purposes, at least if they implement policies consistent with the governing law of the jurisdiction where the action is taken.'. . Indeed, the Supreme Court has described the refusal to grant qualified immunity as 'especially troubling' where a defendant's actions 'were lawful according to courts in the jurisdiction where he acted.'. . A contrary rule would permit plaintiffs to forum shop and might otherwise deter 'national officeholders ... from full use of their legal authority.'. . Such deterrence warrants 'caution by the Judicial Branch' in refusing to grant qualified immunity, 'particularly in the area of national security.'. . Applying these principals to the present case, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity as their actions, in following the binding precedent of the relevant jurisdiction, were not 'plainly incompetent' and did not violate clearly established law. . . .The plaintiff has failed to cite a single case from any Circuit holding that the warrantless use of a GPS device violates an individual's First Amendment rights. To be sure, the qualified immunity analysis does not require a 'case directly on point,' Al–Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2083, but a court must take caution in properly defining the scope of the right violated . . . . In this regard, the plaintiff's silence is telling as 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. .The plaintiff's inability to cite a single case in support of his contention that the warrantless use of a GPS device violated his First Amendment rights dooms his claim. . .The Court need not decide whether the individual defendants' warrantless use of a GPS device violated the plaintiff's First Amendment rights because the law regarding the issue was not clearly established at the time of the conduct. . . As a result, qualified immunity shields the individual defendants from the plaintiff's First Amendment Bivens claim.")

Alfano v. Lynch, 847 F.3d 71, 76, 79 (1st Cir. 2017) ("In applying the test for clearly established law, the focus must be on federal precedents. . . Courts may consider state precedents, though, to the extent that they analyze the relevant federal issue. . . . Federal courts of appeals typically look only to precedents from the United States Supreme Court, federal appellate courts, and the highest court of the state in which a case arises to gauge whether a particular right is clearly established. . . . To say more about the clearly established nature of the law would be to paint the lily. We hold that, in July of 2014, controlling and persuasive authority combined to give a reasonable officer fair and clear warning that the Fourth Amendment required probable cause to take an individual into protective custody, handcuff him, transport him to a police station miles away, and confine him in a jail cell")

McCue v. City of Bangor, 838 F.3d 55, 61-65 (1st Cir. 2016) ("After reviewing de novo all of the magistrate judge's determinations, the district court adopted the Recommended Decision in full. This appeal followed. The only issue before us is the pretrial denial of qualified immunity as to the plaintiff's allegation that the officers used excessive force after McCue had ceased resisting, as well as the corresponding denial of immunity under the MTCA for the state law assault claim. . . . Johnson and its progeny foreclose assertion of appellate jurisdiction over the defendants' interlocutory appeal. The magistrate judge's opinion, fully affirmed by the district court, denied summary judgment precisely '[b]ecause the record includes factual disputes regarding Plaintiff's claim that Defendants used excessive force after Mr. McCue allegedly ceased resisting.'. . In particular, the record contains facts that, when viewed most favorably to the plaintiff, could support a finding that McCue stopped resisting at some point during his encounter with the officers, and that the officers should have realized that he had stopped resisting, but that the officers 'continued to exert significant force ... no longer necessary to subdue Mr. McCue or to reduce the threat that he posed to himself or others.'. . And they continued to use such force after McCue told them that they were hurting his neck. In light of these remaining factual issues, we cannot assume jurisdiction over the defendants' interlocutory appeal. Maintaining that they do not dispute the facts for the purposes of their appeal, the defendants argue that we have appellate jurisdiction notwithstanding the district court's identification of material factual disputes. They repeatedly assert that they construe the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and that even so construed, 'the videotape evidence conclusively establishes that there is at most a timeframe of 66 seconds for which the trial court could have concluded that Mr. McCue may have stopped resisting arrest and the Defendants may have continued to apply force.' They further argue that 'this momentary continuance of force' for up to 66 seconds did not violate McCue's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure. Plaintiff disagrees and says that the record supports a finding that 4 minutes and 25 seconds is the true period involved. As a matter of law, our circuit has assumed interlocutory appellate jurisdiction where the defendant 'accepted as true all facts and inferences proffered by plaintiffs, and [where] defendants argue[d] that even on plaintiffs' best case, they [we]re entitled to immunity.' Mlodzinski, 648 F.3d at 28. Even 'a defendant who concedes arguendo the facts found to be disputed is not barred by Johnson from taking an interlocutory appeal on a legal claim that the defendant is nevertheless entitled to qualified immunity on facts not controverted.' . . But this avenue is not available to the defendants here because, contrary to their protests, they have not in fact accepted the version of the facts most favorable to the plaintiff. In at least four different places in their brief, the defendants stress that, construing the Car 22 video in the most plaintiff-favorable light, there was at most 66 seconds in which they might have continued to apply force after McCue had stopped resisting. The defendants appear to have arrived at this number by misconstruing a statement of fact by the magistrate judge. Explaining why Blanchard punched McCue's lower back, buttocks, or thigh region after the officers had secured both his wrists and ankles, the magistrate judge observed that Blanchard might have done so because McCue 'squeezed' Blanchard's injured hand 'extremely hard' or, alternatively, in order to 'facilitate bringing together Mr. McCue's ankles and wrists to complete the five-point restraint.'. . The defendants inaccurately characterize this observation, asserting that the magistrate judge found that Blanchard could have punched McCue because 'McCue was resisting the Defendants' efforts to put him in a five-point restraint.' Pinpointing this moment when Blanchard punched McCue as the last moment in which the magistrate judge found that McCue had resisted, the defendants count 66 seconds from that point to the point when McCue is lifted off the ground. This insistence on 66 seconds both mischaracterizes the magistrate judge's statements about the facts and fails to present those facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff. First, neither reason that the magistrate judge cited to account for Blanchard's punch (to prevent McCue from squeezing his hand or to facilitate the five-point restraint) necessarily equates to resistance by McCue. At this point, McCue's wrists and ankles had already been cuffed, thus minimizing his range of movements and the danger that he posed to his own and others' safety. Simply put, there is no indication in the Recommended Decision that the hand squeeze should be construed as continued resistance, much less resistance justifying the force used. The defendants' inference as such, of course, also demonstrates their failure to accept the version of facts most favorable to the plaintiff. Second, our independent assessment of the Car 22 video, construed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, discredits the defendants' 66-seconds theory. . .The video, from 2:18 to 2:22, captures McCue resisting detainment by kicking his legs, thrashing his torso, and shouting an expletive at the officers. In contrast, from 2:22 until the officers lift him off the ground at 7:08, McCue periodically growls and makes other noises but does not kick or thrash his body again. He also complains that the officers are hurting his neck, but we cannot ascertain from the video if the officers adjusted their positions in response. Viewed in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, McCue's noises and slight movements after the 2:22 mark -- and even his squeezing of Blanchard's hand – 'may not constitute resistance at all, but rather a futile attempt to breathe while suffering from physiological distress.'. . In short, McCue's movements after 2:22 of the Car 22 video are not dispositive of whether he continued resisting. And from this perspective, there could be close to five minutes -- not 66 seconds -- during which the officers continued to exert force on a nonresisting McCue. Because the defendants have not, in fact, accepted the plaintiff's best version of the facts, we hold that there remains a genuine dispute of fact that precludes appellate jurisdiction over the denial of summary judgment. Finally, this factual dispute is material to the question on the merits. Depending on the amount of time for which the officers exerted force on McCue after he had ceased resisting, a jury could find that the officers' actions were unconstitutional under law that was clearly established in September 2012, the month of McCue's fatal encounter with the officers. The defendants argue that they should win because there was no clearly established law on this point. They are wrong. We 'adhere[ ] to a two-step approach to determine whether a defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.' Stamps v. Town of Framingham, 813 F.3d 27, 34 (1st Cir. 2016). First, we ask whether the facts as alleged by the plaintiff make out a violation of a constitutional right. If so, we next ask whether that right was 'clearly established' at the time of the alleged violation. . . In determining whether the law was clearly established, we 'ask "whether the legal contours of the right in question were sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer would have understood that what he was doing violated the right," and then consider "whether in the particular factual context of the case, a reasonable officer would have understood that his conduct violated the right."'. . Here, we focus on the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity analysis. This circuit has recognized that a 'First Circuit case presenting the same set of facts' is not necessary to hold that defendants 'had fair warning that given the circumstances, the force they are alleged to have used was constitutionally excessive.'. . We have also looked to the case law of sister circuits in determining whether a right was clearly established. . . Even without particular Supreme Court and First Circuit cases directly on point, it was clearly established in September 2012 that exerting significant, continued force on a person's back 'while that [person] is in a face-down prone position after being subdued and/or incapacitated constitutes excessive force.' Weigel v. Broad, 544 F.3d 1143, 1155 (10th Cir. 2008) (quoting Champion v. Outlook Nashville, Inc., 380 F.3d 893, 903 (6th Cir. 2004)). At least four circuits had announced this constitutional rule before the events in question here. . . .[A]s the abundant case law demonstrates, a jury could find that a reasonable officer would know or should have known about the dangers of exerting significant pressure on the back of a prone person, regardless of any lack of formal training. In sum, the disputed factual issue -- when McCue ceased resisting and for how long after that moment the officers continued to apply force on his back -- is material to the question of whether qualified immunity is proper.")

Maldonado v. Fontanes, 568 F.3d 263, 270, 271 (1st Cir. 2009) ("An individual's interest in his pet cat or dog does fall within the Fourth Amendment's prohibition of unreasonable seizures, though we have not addressed the question before. . . . We reject the Mayor's argument that this law was not clearly established because this court had not earlier addressed the questions of effects and seizure. Against the widespread acceptance of these points in the federal circuit courts, the Mayor's argument fails. These are principles of law, and the law was sufficiently recognized by courts to be clearly established. . . . We cannot say on the basis of the pleadings alone that an objective official in the Mayor's position, as a matter of law, would have reasonably concluded his actions in implementing and executing the pet policy were not a violation of the Fourth Amendment. The district court was correct to deny the Mayor qualified immunity on the Fourth Amendment claims based on the pleadings.")

Starlight Sugar, Inc. v. Soto, 253 F.3d 137, 143-45 (1st Cir. 2001) ("When determining whether a constitutional right is clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity, state, as well as federal, decisions can be considered. . . . In turning to both the state and federal case law in this instance, we find a potential conflict. In Trailer Marine, as noted, we held that the dormant Commerce Clause applies to Puerto Rico; the Puerto Rico Supreme Court took a different view in the R.C.A. case. . . . We conclude that the applicability of the dormant Commerce Clause to Puerto Rico is disputed, and, thus, appellees' attendant constitutional right is not clearly established. Our holding is consistent with and respects the role of state systems in identifying and defining federal constitutional rights on a parallel basis with the federal courts with ultimate supervisory authority to harmonize any potential conflicts residing in the United States Supreme Court.").

Hatch v. Dep't for Children, Youth and Their Families, 274 F.3d 12, (1st Cir. 2001) ("To determine the contours of a particular right at a given point in time, an inquiring court must look not only to Supreme Court precedent but to all available case law.").

Brady v. Dill, 187 F.3d 104, 115 (1st Cir. 1999) ("The Supreme Court recently held that an asserted right was not clearly established where the plaintiffs were unable to cite 'any cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule on which they [sought] to rely,' and equally failed to 'identif[y] a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.' [citing Wilson] The Wilson Court's reasoning is perfectly tailored to the circumstances here. Thompson, which represents the governing law of this circuit, plainly did not render the troopers' actions unlawful, and the tenuous status of Gay falls far short of the 'persuasive authority' that Wilson envisions.").

Lynch v. City of Boston, 180 F.3d 1, 13, 14 (1st Cir. 1999) ("We assume, without deciding, that the opportunity to serve as a volunteer could constitute the type of valuable governmental benefit or privilege the deprivation of which can trigger First Amendment scrutiny. . . .However, neither the Supreme Court nor this court has ever held that the rule forbidding denial of valuable governmental benefits in reprisal for protected speech announced in Perry v. Sindermann and its progeny extends to the denial of non-compensated positions on voluntary boards. Scant authority in support of such an extension of the doctrine currently exists. Lynch relies primarily upon a Ninth Circuit decision in which the court, applying its own precedents, held that volunteer status is a valuable governmental privilege that cannot be denied on the basis of protected speech. See Holland v. Wonder, 972 F.2d 1129, 1135 (9th Cir.1992). . .A single decision from another court of appeals applying its own precedents is plainly insufficient to meet the requirement 'that in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent' to a reasonable government official.").

El Dia, Inc. v. Rossello, 165 F.3d 106, 110 n.3 (1st Cir. 1999) ("[W]e are not inclined to adopt either a hard-and-fast rule that precedent from another circuit is always determinative of whether a law is clearly established . . . or a rule that such precedent is always irrelevant . . . . Among other factors, the location and level of the precedent, its date, its persuasive force, and its level of factual similarity to the facts before this Court may all be pertinent to whether a particular precedent 'clearly establishes' law for the purposes of a qualified immunity analysis." citing Johnson-El v. Schoemehl, 878 F.2d 1043, 1049 (8th Cir.1989).).

Begin v. Drouin, No. 1:16-CV-00092-JCN, 2017 WL 1411470, at *8 n.11 (D. Me. Apr. 20, 2017) ("While '"the salient question ... is whether the state of the law" at the time of an incident provided "fair warning" to the defendants "that their alleged [conduct] was unconstitutional,"'. . . Plaintiff is not required to identify a First Circuit case with the same or similar facts to provide notice to Defendants of Plaintiff's rights. McCue v. City of Bangor, Maine, 838 F.3d 55, 64 (1st Cir. 2016) ("We have also looked to the case law of sister circuits in determining whether a right was clearly established."); Mlodzinski v. Lewis, 648 F.3d 24, 38 (1st Cir. 2011) ("Even without a First Circuit case presenting the same set of facts, defendants would have had fair warning that given the circumstances, the force they are alleged to have used was constitutionally excessive.").")

Masonoff v. Dubois, No. CIV.A.94-10133-RCL, 2004 WL 2137369, at *8 (D. Mass. Sept. 17, 2004) ("Here, the plaintiffs seek redress for the defendants' failure to maintain reasonably adequate, non-toxic, and sanitary means to dispose of human waste. The right to 'adequate and hygienic means to dispose of [a prisoner's] bodily wastes' was clearly established at the time of the violation, which began. . . in 1991. . . Although I can find no First Circuit authority holding unlawful the precise conduct at issue in this case, the First Circuit long ago held that 'the prison administration must see to it that unsanitary conditions do not continue unabated [just] because the conditions were first caused by the inmates themselves.'. . Furthermore, a chorus of courts in other jurisdictions had held by 1991 that prisons must provide reasonably sanitary facilities, especially when the inmates are confined for long periods of time. . . . By 1983, the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts had held that when prisoners must 'eat and sleep next to buckets into which they must urinate and defecate,' the prison conditions, including the procedure for emptying the buckets, constituted cruel and unusual punishment. . . The Supreme Court of the United States had also made it clear that the conditions of confinement may not deprive inmates of 'the minimal civilized measure of life's necessities.' . . Consequently, I think it too plain to be reasonably questioned that, by 1991 it was clearly established that reasonably adequate 'sanitation is one of the basic human needs guaranteed by the [E]ighth [A]mendment.'").

Rodriguez Esteras v. Solivan Diaz, 266 F. Supp.2d 270, 282 (D.P.R. 2003) ("In light of the near unanimity among the Circuits and the factual support found in the persuasive authority, we believe that a reasonably prudent state actor would have realized that failing to divulge exculpatory evidence at the arraignment and other preliminary hearings, thereby causing the detention of a criminal defendant, would violate the Fourth Amendment. Since the parameters of the right to be free from malicious prosecution were sufficiently clear at the time of the alleged incident, Defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Soto v. Bzdel, 223 F.Supp.2d 332, 333 (D. Mass. 2002) ("This court does not believe that the Hope elaboration, recently echoed by the First Circuit in Suboh v. District Attorney's Office of the Suffolk District, 298 F.3d 81, 92-94 (1st Cir.2002), so fundamentally changes the qualified immunity analysis as to necessitate a different result here. First, unlike the situation in Hope, the facts alleged by Plaintiff do not form the basis of an 'apparent' constitutional violation. Second, the court neither now nor at the time it issued its summary judgment decision believes that the 'state of the law' in October of 1999 gave Defendants 'fair warning' that their alleged treatment of Plaintiff 'was unconstitutional.' In reaching this conclusion, the court did not rigidly confine itself, as Plaintiff contends, to either 'published precedent on all fours' or even to cases with 'materially similar' facts. . . In addition to addressing cases having facts similar to the case at bar, the court, as indicated, considered whether there was 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.' . . The court also examined case law which was indirectly on point and still found scant support for Plaintiff's position. . . Finally, the court specifically addressed the affidavit of the clerk- magistrate of the Northampton District Court, urged upon the court again, and found it wanting. . . The court determined that the affidavit, while informative as to the system concerning recalled warrants, insufficiently demonstrated that any constitutional right was clearly established in October of 1999. . . Unfortunately for him, Plaintiff's preference that the 'state of the law' be statutory, not constitutional, cannot win the day.").

Rodriguez v. Penobscot County Jail, No. 00-253-B-S, 2001 WL 376453, at 3-5 (D. Me. Apr. 11, 2001) (not published) ("The First Circuit has yet to address whether the Sandin analysis applies to pre-trial detainees. The Ninth and the Seventh Circuits have concluded that Sandin does not apply to disciplinary procedures of pre-trial detainees when disciplinary segregation is the imposed punishment. In those cases the liberty interest in not being punished without the full procedural protections requires adherence to rigorous procedures. [citing cases] Other circuits, albeit in unpublished opinions, have determined that the Sandin analysis is appropriate to apply to pretrial detainee complaints concerning disciplinary sanctions. [citing cases] While such cases have questionable value as precedent on the underlying issue of whether or not Sandin should be applied to pretrial detainees, they do form the basis for determining the first element of the defendants' asserted claim of qualified immunity. The law in this regard is not clearly established. . . . Given the lack of 'clearly established' post-Sandin case-law regarding the procedural due process issues raised by Rodriguez and the clear First Circuit precedent which authorizes reasonable disciplinary sanctions against pre-trial detainees, Defendants in this case are entitled to qualified immunity as to any civil damage claim").

SECOND CIRCUIT

Garcia v. Does, 779 F.3d 84, 95 n.12 (2d Cir. 2015) ("Plaintiffs also cite two out-of-circuit cases denying qualified immunity to officers who arrested protesters after arguably sanctioning their traffic violations through their own directives. See Vodak v. City of Chicago, 639 F.3d 738, 743–44 (7th Cir.2011); Buck v. City of Albuquerque, 549 F.3d 1269, 1283 (10th Cir.2008). We have not been altogether unequivocal as to the relevance of out-of-circuit cases in our assessment of whether a right is clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity. Compare, e.g., Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 105 (2d Cir.2010) ("Even if this or other circuit courts have not explicitly held a law or course of conduct to be unconstitutional, the unconstitutionality of that law or course of conduct will nonetheless be treated as clearly established if decisions by this or other courts clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue, even if those decisions come from courts in other circuits.") (internal quotation marks omitted), with Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 255 (2d Cir.2006) ("When neither the Supreme Court nor this court has recognized a right, the law of our sister circuits and the holdings of district courts cannot act to render that right clearly established within the Second Circuit."). But we need not resolve that tension here, because the out-of-circuit precedent cited by plaintiffs has not placed the question at issue in this case 'beyond debate.'. . Extending Cox beyond its due process holding, and agreeing on neither the constitutional right at stake nor its contours, Vodak and Buck—even assuming arguendo that their holdings might otherwise be relevant in the specific factual context of this case—do not foreshadow the law of which a reasonable officer in this circuit should be aware.")

Terebesi v. Torreso, 764 F.3d 217, 231 & n.12 (2d Cir. 2014) ("To determine whether the relevant law was clearly established, we consider the specificity with which a right is defined, the existence of Supreme Court or Court of Appeals case law on the subject, and the understanding of a reasonable officer in light of preexisting law. . . Even if this Court has not explicitly held a course of conduct to be unconstitutional, we may nonetheless treat the law as clearly established if decisions from this or other circuits ' "clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue."'. . . We do not think that, as some decisions in this Circuit have suggested, '[o]nly Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent existing at the time of the alleged violation is relevant in deciding whether a right is clearly established.' Moore v. Vega, 371 F.3d 110, 114 (2d Cir.2004) (emphasis added) (citing Townes v. City of New York, 176 F.3d 138, 144 (2d Cir.1999), cert. denied, 528 U.S. 964). (The author of this opinion was a member of the panel in Moore.) Townes correctly stated that we consider "whether the Supreme Court or the Second Circuit had affirmed the existence of the right," Townes, 176 F.3d at 144, but the opinion also made clear that, "[e]ven in the absence of binding precedent, a right is clearly established if the contours ... are sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right." Id. (citing Anderson, 483 U.S. at 640) (internal quotation marks and brackets omitted). Though not directly binding on this Court, the decisions of other circuits may reflect that the contours of the right in question are clearly established.")

Scott v. Fischer, 616 F.3d 100, 105 (2d Cir. 2010) ("Even if this or other circuit courts have not explicitly held a law or course of conduct to be unconstitutional, the unconstitutionality of that law or course of conduct will nonetheless be treated as clearly established if decisions by this or other courts 'clearly foreshadow a particular ruling on the issue,' Varrone v. Bilotti, 123 F.3d 75, 79 (2d Cir.1997) (internal quotation marks omitted), even if those decisions come from courts in other circuits, see, e.g., id.; Weber v. Dell, 804 F.2d 796, 801 n. 6, 803-04 (2d Cir.1986) (relying on decisions by seven other circuits finding similar searches unconstitutional, even though this Circuit had not yet reached the issue, in concluding that the defendant was not entitled to immunity), cert. denied, 483 U.S. 1020 (1987).")

Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 254, 255 (2d Cir. 2006) ("At the time of Pabon's Hepatitis C treatment, it was clearly established that the Fourteenth Amendment confers the right to refuse medical treatment. . . The concomitant right to medical information was not clearly established, however, because neither this court nor the Supreme Court had recognized such a right at that time. Thus, no official would have been aware that the failure to provide Pabon with such information as a reasonable patient would find necessary to make an informed decision regarding treatment was a violation of his substantive due process rights. We do not agree with Pabon that White, Benson, and Clarkson render this right to medical information clearly established. When neither the Supreme Court nor this court has recognized a right, the law of our sister circuits and the holdings of district courts cannot act to render that right clearly established within the Second Circuit.").

Hanrahan v. Doling, 331 F.3d 93, 98 n.6 (2d Cir. 2003) ("We note that the extent to which district court decisions may be taken into account in evaluating whether a right is clearly established for qualified immunity purposes is far from clear.")

Anobile v. Pelligrino, 303 F.3d 107, 125, 126 (2d Cir. 2002) ("We believe that the issue presented in this case, whether dormitories located on the premises of a highly regulated business deserve the same Fourth Amendment protections afforded to private residences, was hardly clearly established in December 1997. At the time of the search, competing Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent potentially applied to this issue. On one hand, some cases hold that warrantless administrative searches are permissible where the regulatory scheme concerns an important government interest, and the scheme provides notice to the proprietors of commercial premises of the likelihood of searches. . . On the other hand, some cases hold that homes, and even private rooms, are accorded the highest Fourth Amendment protections. . . As of the time of the search at issue, no decision of this Court had addressed, even generally, the permissibility of searching residential rooms on the grounds of a highly regulated commercial enterprise. We therefore agree with the district court that the law governing the searches of dormitories on racetrack grounds was not clearly established at the time of this search.").

African Trade & Information Center, Inc. v. Abromaitis, 294 F.3d 355, 361 (2d Cir. 2002) ("[T]he question before us is whether, as of September 1998, a bidder or applicant for a new government contract who lacked a preexisting commercial relationship with the government had a clearly established right not to be denied the contract in retaliation for his or her protected speech. Neither the Supreme Court nor this Court has yet addressed that question, and thus the right asserted by plaintiffs has not been established by decisions of those courts. This is not necessarily an insurmountable barrier to a finding that the right exists, as the Supreme Court has left open the possibility that a right may be 'clearly established' by decisions of other lower courts. . . Although we have consistently held that our own decisions may support the existence of the right in question, as we recently observed in Poe v. Leonard, 282 F.3d 123 (2d Cir.2002), our decisions send conflicting signals as to whether the decisions of other circuits may do so as well. . . We need not resolve the issue in this case because the right has not been clearly established by any court.").

Poe v. Leonard, 282 F.3d 123, 142 n.15 (2d Cir. 2002) ("It is unclear the extent to which we may rely on the case law of other circuits to determine whether the law was clearly established. The Supreme Court cases, Anderson and Harlow, from which the 'clearly established' rule derives do not provide a clear answer, as the Anderson Court does not discuss the issue, 483 U.S. at 639-40, and the Harlow Court expressly avoids deciding the question, see Harlow v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818 n. 32 (1982). Our opinions have differed on this issue. [citing cases] . . . . Given that the factual situation presented here is unusual in the sense that Pearl was not performing the police functions we usually encounter in such cases and that Leonard, who is indirectly implicated in Pearl's violation, is the individual whose understanding needs to be evaluated, we rely primarily on our cases to ascertain whether the law was clearly established but discuss other circuits' cases because they are instructive.").

Charles W. v. Maul, 214 F.3d 350, 353, 360, 361 (2d Cir. 2000) ("A right may be said to be clearly established when it has been recognized either by the Supreme Court or by the applicable Circuit Court. Whether a right recognized only by a trial court or by a state court is clearly established presents a closer question. . . . The district court held that a single state trial court decision can 'clearly establish' the relevant constitutional right in a case such as this one. It reasoned that when the government defendants are the very ones who litigated and lost the relevant state court case, they should not later be permitted to plead ignorance of its holding. We see no need to reach this somewhat problematic question. . . . Although Ritter defined a right with reasonable specificity, the right it posited was at odds with this Circuit's applicable law. In claiming the existence of a constitutional right, plaintiff may not exploit a lower state court opinion–inconsistent with this Circuit's precedent–as clearly establishing that right sufficient to deprive state officials, regardless of the level of their positions, of a qualified immunity defense. As a consequence, the right upon which McGhie relies can not be said to have been clearly established. We therefore dismiss McGhie's equal protection claim against defendant Sarkis.").

Russell v. Selsky, 35 F.3d 55, 60 (2d Cir. 1994) ("We conclude that in the absence of Supreme Court or Second Circuit precedents prescribing a right to have separate review and hearing officers in a state prison disciplinary hearing, there is no such clearly established right . . . .").

Jermosen v. Smith, 945 F.2d 547, 550 (2d Cir. 1991) ("In determining whether a particular right was clearly established at the time defendants acted, this Court has considered three factors: (1) whether the right in question was defined with 'reasonable specificity'; (2) whether the decisional law of the Supreme Court and the applicable circuit court support the existence of the right in question, and (3) whether under preexisting law a reasonable defendant official would have understood that his or her acts were unlawful.").

Soto v. City of New York, No. 12-CV-6911 RA, 2015 WL 3422155, at *3 n.1 (S.D.N.Y. May 28, 2015) ("There does not appear to be Supreme Court precedent directly on point and, to date, the Supreme Court has left open the question of whether, in the absence of controlling Supreme Court precedent, controlling circuit precedent constitutes clearly established federal law. See Sheehan, 2015 WL 2340839, at *9 (citing Carroll v. Carman, 135 S.Ct. 348, 350 (2014) (per curiam)). The Second Circuit, however, has instructed courts to 'look to Supreme Court and Second Circuit precedent existing at the time of the alleged violation.' Garcia, 779 F.3d at 92 (quoting Okin v. Vill. of Cornwall–On–Hudson Police Dep't, 577 F.3d 415, 433 (2d Cir.2009)). Moreover, the ' "absence of a decision by [the Second Circuit] or the Supreme Court directly addressing the right at issue will not preclude a finding that the law was clearly established" so long as preexisting law "clearly foreshadow[s] a particular ruling on the issue."' Id. (quoting Tellier v. Fields, 280 F.3d 69, 84 (2d Cir.2000)).")

Franklin v. County of Dutchess, 225 F.R.D. 487, 494 (S.D.N.Y. 2005) ("The Second Circuit has held that the law cannot be 'clearly established' for qualified immunity purposes by district court opinions, but only by the decisions of the applicable circuit court or the Supreme Court. . . Therefore, this Court's decision in Murcia is not sufficient to put Sheriff Anderson on notice, as of the date of that decision, that the indiscriminate strip searching of newly-arrived felony detainees was unlawful, nor is the law 'clearly established' for qualified immunity purposes. That being so, I conclude that, until the Court of Appeals clearly extends the reach of Weber/Walsh/Wachtler/Shain I to a new class of persons–felony detainees–reasonable law enforcement officials in Sheriff Anderson's position could come to different conclusions about what the law permits with respect to on-arrival strip searches of such individuals. Thus, to the extent that Ramona Franklin seeks to hold the sheriff liable for enforcing a policy that required the strip searching of accused felons who arrived at the DCJ, the Sheriff is entitled to qualified immunity.").

THIRD CIRCUIT

Hubbard v. Taylor, 538 F.3d 229, 236, 238 (3d Cir. 2008) (Neither the Supreme Court nor the Third Circuit has Aestablished a right of pretrial detainees to be free from triple-celling or from sleeping on a mattress placed on the floor. . . . In the absence of direct authority from the Supreme Court or this Court, the Defendants in this case were not obliged to familiarize themselves with, and adhere to, the decisions of district courts outside their jurisdiction when the very court to whose jurisdiction they were subject repeatedly approved of their practices at Gander Hill.").

Williams v. Bitner, 455 F.3d 186, 194 (3d Cir. 2006) ("In sum, we hold that the Prison Officials are not entitled to qualified immunity from Williams's First Amendment claim. Although we had not yet addressed the issue raised here at the time of the incident, the Fifth, Seventh, and Eighth Circuits had addressed First Amendment claims similar to Williams's and held that prison officials must respect and accommodate, when practicable, a Muslim inmate's religious beliefs regarding prohibitions on the handling of pork. Moreover, decisions from the Supreme Court and this Court support the principles underlying the right asserted by Williams. We therefore conclude that the state of the law at the time the violation occurred gave the Prison Officials 'fair warning' that their alleged treatment of Williams was unconstitutional.").

Doe v. Delie, 257 F.3d 309, 321 (3d Cir. 2001) ("District court opinions may be relevant to the determination of when a right was clearly established for qualified immunity analysis. [footnote surveying circuits in terms of weight afforded district court opinions in clearly-established-law analysis] However, in this case, the absence of binding precedent in this circuit,. . . the doubts expressed by the most analogous appellate holding, together with the conflict among a handful of district court opinions, undermines any claim that the right was clearly established in 1995.").

Pro v. Donatucci, 81 F.3d 1283, 1291-92 (3d Cir. 1996) ("We agree with the district court that Pro's right to respond to the subpoena without fear of retaliation was clearly established at the time Donatucci acted. . . . Bieregu [v. Reno, 59 F.3d 1445, 1459 (3d Cir. 1995)]found law to be clearly established despite a circuit split, as long as 'no gaping divide has emerged in the jurisprudence such that defendants could reasonably expect this circuit to rule' to the contrary. . . Thus, the split between the Courts of Appeals for the Fifth and the Fourth [footnote omitted] Circuits at the time of Donatucci's actions does not preclude our deciding that Pro's right to respond to the subpoena was clearly established.").

Brown v. Grabowski, 922 F.2d 1097, 1118 (3d Cir. 1990) ("We believe that Thurman,. . . a lone district court case from another jurisdiction, cannot sufficiently have established and limned the equal protection rights of a domestic violence victim . . . to enable reasonable officials to '"anticipate [that] their conduct [might] give rise to liability for damages."' [cites omitted]).

Brothers v. Lawrence County Prison Bd., 2008 WL 146828, *13 & n.10 (W.D.Pa. Jan.14, 2008) ("Defendants argue that the law of the United States Supreme Court and the Third Circuit did not clearly establish that Plaintiff had a First Amendment right not to be strip searched by a female nor was any other constitutional right not to undergo a cross gender strip search clearly established. The Defendants appear to assume, at least in part, that when this court conducts a clearly established analysis, the only proper precedent to look to is that emanating from either the Supreme Court or from within the Third Circuit. However, this court is not convinced that there are such limitations. [reviewing cases] In light of this, and in light of the fact that the Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit held as early as 1999 in Moore v. Carwell, 168 F.3d 234 (5th Cir.1999), that a cross gender strip search could violate the constitution where no exigent circumstances required a cross gender, as opposed to a same gender strip search, Defendants have not carried their burden at this stage to show the law was not clearly established. . . . .Because the Defendants relied upon their mistaken view of the proper analysis to be undertaken to find 'clearly established' they simply stated that there were no Supreme Court or Third Circuit cases establishing the right not to be stripped searched. Now that they are relieved of their mistaken belief, any denial of their motion to dismiss based upon a claim of qualified immunity is without prejudice to them reasserting their qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage, by making the argument that they are entitled to qualified immunity based on the state of the law even outside this Circuit. It may be that the Fifth Circuit's decision in Moore v. Campbell is aberrational, or that there is a great deal of conflicting Circuit Court opinion but this will be for the Moving Defendants to ferret out, not this court.").

FOURTH CIRCUIT

Booker v. South Carolina DOC, 855 F.3d 533, 539-46 (4th Cir. 2017), cert. denied¸ 138 S. Ct. ___ (U.S. Jan. 16, 2018) ("The Supreme Court, in an opinion authored by Chief Justice Rehnquist, articulated that courts may rely on 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority' to determine whether a 'reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.'. . Since Wilson, the Supreme Court has reaffirmed that 'qualified immunity is lost when plaintiffs point either to "cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident" or to "a consensus of cases of persuasive authority."'. . . And in evaluating whether a right is clearly established in a given circuit, the Supreme Court has looked to precedent from other circuits. [citing Pearson and Brosseau] . . . . At the outset, we preempt a possible point of confusion—Booker did not allege in his complaint that he has an absolute right to file prison grievances pursuant to the First Amendment. Rather, Booker alleged that he has a First Amendment right to be free from retaliation when he does file a grievance pursuant to an existing grievance procedure. . . More particularly, Booker asserts that this right is rooted in the First Amendment's Petition Clause, which guarantees individuals the right 'to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.'. . Booker contends that an inmate's right to petition is violated when he is retaliated against for filing a grievance. . . . Booker's detailed factual allegations and his reference to the First Amendment provide a more-than-sufficient basis for us to analyze whether the right was clearly established under the Petition Clause. . . .The clearly established inquiry asks whether the state of the law gave a reasonable prison official 'fair warning' that retaliating against an inmate who files a prison grievance was unconstitutional. It is 'well established' in this Circuit that a 'public official may not misuse his power to retaliate against an individual for the exercise of a valid constitutional right.'. . . Thus, if an inmate exercises his First Amendment right when he files a prison grievance, retaliation against him for doing so is unconstitutional. The pertinent question in this appeal, then, is whether it was clearly established that an inmate exercises a First Amendment right to petition for redress of grievances when he files a prison grievance. Framed differently, we must determine whether it was clearly established that an inmate's right to petition is violated when he is retaliated against for filing a grievance. . . . Adams [v. Rice, 40 F.3d 72 (4th Cir. 1994)] establishes a clear rule: inmates have no constitutional entitlement or due process interest in access to a grievance procedure. An inmate thus cannot bring a § 1983 claim alleging denial of a specific grievance process, for example. But Adams is entirely silent on the issue in this case—whether an inmate's First Amendment right is violated when he is retaliated against for submitting a grievance pursuant to an existing grievance procedure. That a prison is not required under the Constitution to provide access to a grievance process does not mean that prison officials who retaliate against inmates for filing grievances do not violate the Constitution. . . .The Eighth Circuit is not alone in finding that although inmates do not have a constitutional entitlement to and/or due process interest in accessing a grievance procedure, they have a First Amendment right to be free from retaliation when they do file. [collecting cases from other Circuits] In short, Adams concerns whether inmates have a constitutional entitlement to or liberty interest in accessing grievance procedures. It says nothing about whether a prison official violates an inmate's First Amendment rights by retaliating against the inmate for submitting a grievance. Therefore, contrary to Appellees' suggestion, Adams does not speak to the right at issue. As such, neither party has cited cases from courts of controlling authority—the Supreme Court, this Court, or the Supreme Court of South Carolina—that explicitly address an inmate's First Amendment right to be free from retaliation for filing a prison grievance. . . .We therefore agree with the district court's conclusion that no published decision from the Supreme Court, this Court, or the Supreme Court of South Carolina squarely addresses whether filing a grievance is protected First Amendment conduct. The district court, after determining there were no binding cases that squarely established the specific First Amendment right, concluded that the right was not clearly established. . . But the clearly established inquiry was not complete: as this Court has stated, and as Booker recognizes, the 'absence of controlling authority holding identical conduct unlawful does not guarantee qualified immunity.'. . The district court failed to consider whether, despite the lack of directly on-point, binding authority, the right was clearly established based on general constitutional principles or a consensus of persuasive authority. We now proceed to that task. . . .In the absence of controlling authority that specifically adjudicates the right in question, a right may still be clearly established in one of two ways. A right may be clearly established if 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law [ ] appl[ies] with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . A right may also be clearly established based on a ' "consensus of cases of persuasive authority" from other jurisdictions.'. . Here, Booker argues that his First Amendment right was clearly established in both ways. Arguably, the prohibition on retaliating against inmates for filing grievances was obviously unconstitutional given longstanding principles articulated in controlling authority. It is beyond dispute that prison officials cannot retaliate against inmates for exercising a constitutional right. . . And Booker presents a logical and compelling argument that, in light of binding Supreme Court precedent, he exercised his constitutional right to petition the government for redress of grievances when he filed an administrative grievance seeking redress for what he believed was the improper handling of his legal mail. . . In addition to Supreme Court precedent, this Court has long held that prison officials may not retaliate against prisoners for exercising their right to access the courts, . . . which is a component of the right to petition for redress of grievances [.] . . . Given the close relationship between an inmate filing a grievance and filing a lawsuit—indeed, the former is generally a prerequisite for the latter—our jurisprudence provided a strong signal that officials may not retaliate against inmates for filing grievances. Regardless of whether Booker's right was obvious or 'manifestly apparent' from broader principles in the decisional law, we find that it was clearly established based on a robust 'consensus of persuasive authority.' The Second, Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, Eleventh, and D.C. Circuits have all recognized in published decisions that inmates possess a right, grounded in the First Amendment's Petition Clause, to be free from retaliation in response to filing a prison grievance. . . .The Sixth, Seventh, Eighth, Ninth, Eleventh, and D.C. Circuits have likewise recognized that inmates possess a First Amendment petition right to be free from retaliation for filing grievances. [collecting cases] Even more, the Third, Fifth, and Tenth Circuits have recognized an inmate's right to be free from retaliation for filing a grievance under the First Amendment (albeit without referencing a particular clause). [collecting cases] Given the decisions from nearly every court of appeals, we are compelled to conclude that Booker's right to file a prison grievance free from retaliation was clearly established under the First Amendment. Consistent with fundamental constitutional principles and common sense, these courts have had little difficulty concluding that prison officials violate the First Amendment by retaliating against inmates for filing grievances. Rarely will there be such an overwhelming consensus of authority recognizing that specific conduct is violative of a constitutional right. The unanimity among our sister circuits demonstrates that the constitutional question is 'beyond debate,' and therefore we find that the right at issue was clearly established. . . . Our 'conclusion that "a reasonable person would have known," Harlow [v. Fitzgerald, 457 U.S. 800, 818 (1982)], of the violation is buttressed by' the South Carolina Department of Correction's internal policies. . . Although officials 'do not lose their qualified immunity merely because their conduct violates some statutory or administrative provision,'. . . the Supreme Court has analyzed prison regulations in combination with case law to determine whether an individual had fair warning[.] [citing Hope] Here, the SCDC's detailed policy document concerning the 'Inmate Grievance System'. . .expressly provides that '[n]o inmate will be subjected to reprisal, retaliation, harassment, or disciplinary action for filing a grievance or participating in the resolution of a grievance.'. . The record further indicates that this prohibition was communicated to prison officials. . . . Again, the fundamental inquiry for purposes of qualified immunity is whether a reasonable official in Jones's position had 'fair warning' that the alleged conduct was unconstitutional. . . The unequivocal language of SCDC's own policies provides additional support for our finding that Jones had such warning here. In sum, given the authority discussed above, we conclude that a reasonable prison official had fair warning that retaliating against an inmate who filed a prison grievance was unlawful. Because an inmate's First Amendment right to be free from retaliation for filing a grievance was clearly established, we find that Appellees are not entitled to qualified immunity on that basis and therefore the district court erred in granting their motion for summary judgment.")

Booker v. South Carolina DOC, 855 F.3d 533, 547-53 (4th Cir. 2017) (Traxler, J., dissenting), cert. denied, 138 S. Ct. ___ (U.S. Jan. 16, 2018) ("Relying on decisions from other circuits, the majority concludes that a prisoner's right to be free from retaliation for filing a grievance was clearly established in 2010, when the actions giving rise to this lawsuit took place. Even assuming that that right may have been clearly established in other circuits, the case law from this circuit in 2010 could reasonably be understood as foreclosing that claim. See Adams v. Rice, 40 F.3d 72 (4th Cir. 1994). Because the controlling law in this circuit did not put the prison officials on notice that their conduct violated Booker's constitutional rights, I believe the prison officials are entitled to qualified immunity. Accordingly, I respectfully dissent. . . . I do not disagree that the weight of authority outside this circuit holds that the First Amendment is violated when prison officials retaliate against an inmate for filing a grievance under an established grievance system. Where I disagree with the majority is in its conclusion that case law from this circuit was silent on the relevant First Amendment question. In my view, this court's decision in Adams v. Rice could reasonably be understood as holding that an inmate's use of a prison grievance system does not implicate the First Amendment and that grievance-based retaliation against the inmate likewise does not implicate the First Amendment. Because Adams can reasonably be understood to permit the actions of the prison officials at issue in this case, the majority erred by looking outside the circuit to conclude otherwise. . . .[I]f filing a grievance implicates no constitutional right, then retaliation against the inmate because of the grievance does not violate the Constitution. . . . I simply see no basis for concluding, as the majority apparently does, that the act of filing a grievance -- an act that is not constitutionally protected -- somehow imbues the filing with constitutional protections. Accordingly, it seems to me that this court's decision in Adams affirmatively closes the door to the retaliation claim being asserted here. . . .In my view, Adams directly, though not explicitly, forecloses Booker's retaliation claim. But even if the distinction between this case and Adams that the majority apparently embraces were viable, a reasonable prison official could still conclude that the actions alleged in this case were permissible under this court's decision in Adams. . . . I therefore believe that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. . . .In Adams, this court held that 'there is no constitutional right to participate in grievance proceedings.' 40 F.3d at 75 (emphasis added). Because inmates participate in grievance proceedings by filing a grievance, our decision in Adams must be understood as holding that inmates have no constitutional right to file a grievance. The filing of a grievance therefore implicates no constitutional right of the inmate and cannot support a retaliation claim against prison officials. . . .Adams is binding authority that directly rejects the constitutional right asserted in this case. The majority errs by ignoring Adams and relying instead on out-of-circuit cases that are inconsistent with our holding in Adams in order to declare that an inmate's right to be free from retaliation for filing a grievance was clearly established. Accordingly, for the foregoing reasons, I believe that the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, and I therefore respectfully dissent from the majority's contrary conclusion.")

Owens by and through Owens v. Lott, 372 F.3d 267, 279, 280 (4th Cir. 2004) ("Whether a right has been specifically adjudicated or is manifestly apparent from broader applications of the constitutional premise in question, we look ordinarily to 'the decisions of the Supreme Court, this court of appeals, and the highest court of the state in which the case arose.'. . When there are no such decisions from courts of controlling authority, we may look to 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority' from other jurisdictions, if such exists. . . There is no controlling authority that informs our analysis in this case. As we have already noted, the Supreme Court has not addressed the circumstances, if any, under which an 'all persons' provision in a search warrant is constitutional, . . . nor has this court done so. The vast majority of the decisions from other jurisdictions considering the validity of 'all persons' warrants–mostly state decisions–conclude that a search warrant authorizing the search of 'all persons' found on the premises does not violate the Fourth Amendment per se. Beyond that broad conclusion, however, courts impose different requirements for what is necessary to sustain the validity of such a warrant. . . . Moreover, these decisions provide no clear view, let alone a consensus, regarding what factors are most significant in deciding whether sufficient probable cause exists to support the search of 'all persons' found in a private residence being searched for drugs. . . . We conclude that at the time of the search, the law was not sufficiently clear to strip defendants of qualified immunity.")

Rogers v. Pendleton, 249 F.3d 279, 287, 288 (4th Cir. 2001) ("In determining whether a right is clearly established, we may rely upon cases of controlling authority in the jurisdiction in question, or a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.' Wilson, 526 U.S. at 617. While a consensus of cases of persuasive authority may clearly establish a right for qualified immunity purposes, the inverse is also true: if there are no cases of controlling authority in the jurisdiction in question, and if other appellate federal courts have split on the question of whether an asserted right exists, the right cannot be clearly established for qualified immunity purposes. . . Therefore, having determined that the United States Supreme Court has, in Oliver and Dunn, established the right to be free of searches of the curtilage based merely on reasonable suspicion, we must survey the cases cited by the officers to determine whether these cases could cause a reasonable officer to believe that the search planned by the officers in this case was constitutional. . . . Because the officers do not claim to have had a warrant, exigent circumstances, or probable cause, it follows that their contemplated search was illegal, and it was plainly so based upon clearly established law at the time of the search.").

Snyder v. Ringgold, 133 F.3d 917 (Table), 1998 WL 13528, *3 (4th Cir. Jan. 15, 1998) ("The right for which plaintiff contends has not been clearly established by specific adjudication. No Supreme Court or Fourth Circuit case has held that reporters have a constitutional right of equal or nondiscriminatory access to government information that need not otherwise be made available to the public. In fact, the district court opinion below relied only on three, relatively old federal district court decisions and one state court of appeals decision in support of its holding that Ringgold had violated Snyder's First Amendment rights. . . .On appeal, the plaintiff has cited cases from the First, Second, and District of Columbia Circuit Courts of Appeals that consider issues that she believes to be analogous to the issue in this case. . . . The plaintiff's resort to these out-of-circuit cases merely underscores the lack of Fourth Circuit and Supreme Court law establishing the right for which she contends.").

FIFTH CIRCUIT

Vincent v. City of Sulphur, 805 F.3d 543, 548-51 (5th Cir. 2015) ("The cited cases, however, do not reflect clearly established law in this circuit under these facts. . .Although the Supreme Court decisions amply support the proposition that there is a general right to go to or remain on public property for lawful purposes, none comes near the level of specificity needed to put 'beyond debate' the related but distinct proposition that a person under investigation for threatening deadly violence against city officials has a right to notice and a hearing before being banned from entering city buildings. . . None of the Supreme Court cases mirrors the facts or the district court's legal reasoning—in fact, none of them addresses an Eldridge-type procedural-due-process claim at all. The cases from the Sixth and Eleventh Circuits and the Texas intermediate court come somewhat closer—they at least address procedural-due-process claims in the context of the right to enter or remain on government property. But two out-of-circuit cases and a state-court intermediate appellate decision hardly constitute persuasive authority adequate to qualify as clearly established law sufficient to defeat qualified immunity in this circuit. A review of the decisions on which the district court relied demonstrates their insufficiency for a 'clearly established' finding. . . . The district court also relied on three out-of-jurisdiction lower-court decisions to support its conclusion that the procedural-due-process right was clearly established. Unlike the Supreme Court cases cited above, those three cases—two from our sister circuits and one from an intermediate Texas state court—do deal specifically with procedural due process in the context of the right to go about lawfully in public areas. And Kennedy, . . . even goes so far as to find that a procedural-due-process right in this context is clearly established. But those decisions, taken together, cannot support a finding of a clearly established right here. First, two cases from other circuits and one from a state intermediate court do not, generally speaking, constitute persuasive authority defining the asserted right at the high degree of particularity that is necessary for a rule to be clearly established despite a lack of controlling authority. In any event, those three cases address matters that are sufficiently legally or factually distinguishable as to make a finding of clearly established law improper. . . .In summary, as we have explained, the alleged constitutional right was not clearly established, so the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. We need not reach the question whether the officers in fact committed a procedural-due-process violation. We therefore REVERSE the order denying summary judgment and REMAND for further proceedings as needed.")

Breen v. Texas A & M University, 485 F.3d 325, 339, 340 (5th Cir. 2007) ("Applying the principles of McClendon to this case, we conclude that the state-created danger theory was not clearly established law in this circuit, with respect to the specific facts here or otherwise, by November 18, 1999, and, accordingly, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from plaintiffs' section 1983 claims. . . . .In light of this court's historical reticence towards adopting the state-created danger theory. . . neither this court's discussions of the theory nor our sister circuits' adoption of it convinces us that a reasonable official in any of the defendants' shoes would have had fair notice on or before November 18, 1999 that his conduct with respect to the danger created by the Texas A & M bonfire stack could violate the students' constitutional rights. Because this court's pre-November 1999 decisions evince substantial uncertainty as to the existence of even the general right that the plaintiffs claim has been violated, those decisions cannot be said to have given defendants fair warning that any of their actions or omissions with respect to the 1999 Texas A & M bonfire construction could violate the affected students' constitutional rights. Moreover, similar to the situation in McClendon, any consensus of the other federal circuits in adopting various formulations of the state-created danger theory is insufficient for this court to find that the theory was clearly established in this circuit as applied to these cases. Although a majority of federal circuits had approved of the state-created danger theory in a general sense by November 18, 1999, there was not a consensus among those courts as to the contours of the underlying substantive due process right, . . . and the plaintiffs have not pointed to (and this court has not found) any pre-collapse cases in which an appellate court applied the state-created danger theory on facts even remotely analogous to the facts of these cases. Accordingly, we find that the adoption of the state-created danger theory in other circuits before November 1999 was insufficient to give the University officials fair notice that their conduct violated the students' constitutional rights.").

McClendon v. City of Columbia (McClendon II), 305 F.3d 314, 329-31 (5th Cir. 2002) (en banc)("[L]anguage in Wilson clearly suggests that, in the absence of directly controlling authority, a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' might, under some circumstances, be sufficient to compel the conclusion that no reasonable officer could have believed that his or her actions were lawful. . . . Because the Supreme Court's method of analysis in Wilson is inconsistent with the rule predicated in Shipp, Shipp's statement that 'we are confined to precedent from our circuit or the Supreme Court' in analyzing whether a right is clearly established for the purposes of qualified immunity analysis, see 234 F.3d at 915, is overruled. . . . As we have recognized on numerous subsequent occasions, our decision in Salas did not address the viability of the state-created danger theory or define the contours of an individual's right to be free from state-created dangers. . . . Salas simply held that, even under the most expansive articulations of the state-created danger doctrine sanctioned by other courts at that time, the plaintiffs had not stated a cognizable claim. This discussion in Salas would not have provided a reasonable officer with 'fair warning' that creating or increasing a danger to a known victim with deliberate indifference towards that victim violates the victim's substantive due process rights. Furthermore, our Salas decision was certainly insufficient to provide a reasonable officer with 'fair warning' that Detective Carney's particular actions in loaning Loftin a gun would violate McClendon's substantive due process rights. Turning to the law of our sister circuits, we note that six circuits had sanctioned some version of the state-created danger theory in July of 1993, at the time of Detective Carney's allegedly unlawful actions. . . . Moreover, as McClendon correctly points out, no circuit had explicitly rejected the state-created danger theory in July of 1993. While both of these factors are relevant to our determination whether there was a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' sufficient to provide Detective Carney with 'fair warning' that his acts were unlawful, the mere fact that a large number of courts had recognized the existence of a right to be free from state-created danger in some circumstances as of July, 1993 is insufficient to clearly establish the unlawfulness of Detective Carney's actions. The Supreme Court has recognized on numerous occasions that the operation of the 'clearly established' standard depends substantially upon the level of generality at which the relevant legal rule is defined.").

Doe v. State of Louisiana, 2 F.3d 1412, 1416 n.8 (5th Cir. 1993) ("In examining preexisting law, [a]s a general proposition, we will not rigidly define the applicable body of law in determining whether relevant legal rules were clearly established at the time of the conduct at issue. [citations omitted]. Relying solely on Fifth Circuit and Supreme Court cases, for example, would be excessively formalistic, but they will loom largest in our inquiries. In determining what the relevant law is, then, a court must necessarily exercise some discretion in determining the relevance of particular law under the facts and circumstances of each case, looking at such factors as the overall weight of authority, and the status of the courts that render substantively relevant decisions, as well as the jurisdiction of the courts that render substantively relevant decisions." [quoting Melear v. Spears, 862 F.2d 1177, 1184 n. 8 (5th Cir.1989)]).

Strickland v. City of Crenshaw, Miss., 114 F. Supp. 3d 400, 417-18 (N.D. Miss. 2015) ("[T]he court concludes that plaintiffs have presented insufficient authority to 'clearly establish' the parameters of any permissible 'pointing of weapons' at occupants of a home during the execution of a search warrant, so as to overcome the qualified immunity defense raised by each individual defendant in this case. As quoted above, plaintiffs cite a single decision from a different circuit, Holland v. Harrington, 268 F.3d 1179, 1192–93 (10th Cir.2001) on this issue, but this is plainly insufficient to clearly establish the law in this regard. . . Plaintiffs' reliance upon a single decision from another circuit is particularly lacking in light of the fact that the Supreme Court has stated that, to overcome a qualified immunity defense, the defendant must have violated 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . While it may be rather fictional to assume that officers would even be aware of Fifth Circuit authority on this issue, plaintiffs have a particularly poor argument on this point in relying on a single decision from another circuit. Some indication of the quantum of authority which might suffice in this regard can be gleaned from recent U.S. Supreme Court precedent, where the Court has suggested that either a decision from that Court or a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority in the Courts of Appeals' would be necessary to 'clearly establish the federal right respondent alleges' in qualified immunity cases. . .Clearly, a single decision from one circuit court does not constitute a 'robust consensus' among the federal circuits, and plaintiffs have therefore failed to 'clearly establish' the parameters of the legal duty which they claim was violated in this case. Even assuming that there are other federal circuits which reached a similar result as the Tenth Circuit in Holland, it is clear that, in the qualified immunity context, plaintiffs have the burden of finding and citing that authority, and they have failed to do so. It appears likely to this court that any 'robust consensus' of federal appellate authority which might arise on this issue would need to take account of a number of difficult factors to ensure that the rights of plaintiffs and police officers are appropriately balanced. Courts would likely have to grapple, for example, with the seeming ease with which fact issues in this regard could be manufactured, if it were sufficient for a plaintiff to allege that a gun was pointed at him or a family member and that an emotional injury resulted. Indeed, it is difficult to discern how fact issues in this regard could ever be found lacking in such a legal context, if a plaintiff simply offered his own self-serving testimony in this regard. In the court's view, courts seeking to establish standards in this context would also likely need to consider the issue of whether an officer in question had reason to have drawn his weapon at all. In cases where an officer had such a reason (as when executing a search warrant of a suspected drug dealer's house), then it should seemingly be much more difficult for plaintiffs to establish that his actions in 'pointing' his weapon in a particular direction were objectively unreasonable than if he had no good reason to have pulled his weapon at all. That brings this court to a final weakness in plaintiffs' qualified immunity arguments. As discussed previously, the Supreme Court in Anderson v. Creighton emphasized that a central part of the qualified immunity analysis involves determining whether a reasonable officer in the position of the defendant could have believed that his actions were lawful. . .This necessarily requires the plaintiff to demonstrate that the specific circumstances which the officer encountered would have led a reasonable officer to understand that his actions were unlawful, in light of clearly established authority of which a reasonable officer would have known. In their arguments quoted above, plaintiffs do not offer either sufficient factual context or legal arguments to allow this court to make a determination in this regard, with regard to Linzy or any of the other defendants. Indeed, plaintiffs' qualified immunity arguments as a whole are quite brief and conclusory and do not reflect the facts that 1) they have the burden of proving that qualified immunity is inapplicable and 2) they are seeking to impose the expense and stress of trial upon officers whom the law does not lightly consider to be either 'plainly incompetent' or willful constitutional violators. In light of the foregoing, the court finds plaintiffs' proof and arguments insufficient to overcome a qualified immunity defense, and defendants' motion to dismiss the excessive force claims asserted against them will therefore be granted.")

Davis v. Southerland, No. Civ.A. G-01-720, 2004 WL 1230278, at *6 (S.D. Tex. May 21, 2004) ("The Circuit has not merely declined to recognize the state-created danger theory of substantive due process; it has scrupulously avoided it for more than ten years. The Fifth Circuit's reluctance to adopt the state-created danger theory is therefore not a mere neutral factor to be considered against the general consensus among other circuits, but a caution that the Fifth Circuit might not join that consensus. [footnote omitted] This Court therefore most respectfully concludes that the state-created danger theory of substantive due process was not clearly established at the time of Defendants' Bonfire-related activities. Because Plaintiffs' theory had not been adopted as a viable avenue to a substantive due process claim, a reasonable school official would not have been aware that the Fourteenth Amendment's Due Process Clause provided a constitutional right to be free from state-created danger, much less than an injury caused by a school administrator's failure to exercise control over an activity such as Bonfire would violate that right. Accordingly, Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from Plaintiffs' § 1983 claims.").

SIXTH CIRCUIT

Brown v. Battle Creek Police Dep't., 844 F.3d 556, 566-67, 572 (6th Cir. 2016) ("Based on the precedent set forth by a large number of this Court's sister circuits, we hold that as a matter of first impression there is a constitutional right under the Fourth Amendment to not have one's dog unreasonably seized. . . .As to Defendants' argument that it was not clearly established in 2013 that the seizure of a dog was a Fourth Amendment event, we hold that Defendants had reasonable notice that unreasonably shooting Plaintiffs' dogs would constitute the 'seizure' of an 'effect' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Every circuit that has considered this issue has concluded that the unreasonable killing of a dog constitutes an unconstitutional 'seizure' of personal property under the Fourth Amendment. . . .The Supreme Court and this Circuit have yet to decide this issue. Nevertheless, given the fact that every sister circuit that has confronted this issue has concluded that an individual has a property right in their dog, and that a district court within this Circuit has concluded the same, we hold that this right was clearly established in 2013 when the conduct in this action occurred. Therefore, we must next determine whether the seizures of the two dogs in the instant case were reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. . . .[T]he standard we set out today is that a police officer's use of deadly force against a dog while executing a warrant to search a home for illegal drug activity is reasonable under the Fourth Amendment when, given the totality of the circumstances and viewed from the perspective of an objectively reasonable officer, the dog poses an imminent threat to the officer's safety. . . .Similar to Altman, the officers here confronted two large pit bulls for the first time in an unsupervised environment where they were unleashed and in an enclosed space with the officers. Given Jones' criminal history, gang affiliations, the types of drugs he was suspected of distributing, the fact that the officers had no time to plan for the dogs, in addition to the officers' unrebutted testimony that the dogs either lunged or were barking aggressively at the officers, the nature and size of the dogs, the fact that the dogs were unleashed and loose in a small residence, all culminate into a finding that the officers acted reasonably when they shot and killed the two dogs. Viewing the facts and all reasonable inferences in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs, we find that a jury would conclude that Officer Klein, Officer Young, and Officer Case acted reasonably in shooting and killing Plaintiffs' dogs. Summary judgment was therefore appropriate.") Hall v. Sweet, 666 F. App'x 469, ___ & n.9 (6th Cir. 2016) ("A single district court opinion is not enough to pronounce a right is clearly established for purposes of qualified immunity. While a district court opinion may be persuasive in showing there is a clearly established right—perhaps by exposing a trend in non-precedential case law—it is not controlling on its own. . . . The same is true in other circuits. [collecting cases]; but see Tarabochia v. Adkins, 766 F.3d 1115, 1125 (9th Cir. 2014) ("[i]n the absence of binding precedent clearly establishing the constitutional right, we look to whatever decisional law is available including decisions of state courts, other circuits, and district courts") (internal quotations removed). . . .Further, even were we to consider O'Donnel, the proposition for which plaintiffs cite the case was extinguished by this circuit's directly contrary holding in Andrews. It cannot be said O'Donnel placed a constitutional question 'beyond debate' when later, in Andrews, this circuit found the very same question did not have a clear answer. In short, decisions from this court stand for the proposition that, between 2008 and 2011, it was not clearly established in any district of this circuit that the Fourth Amendment applied to social workers conducting a search of a home relating to the wellbeing of children. . . This uncertainty in whether the Fourth Amendment applies to investigations related to child wellbeing contributes to a finding that defendants were not on clear notice whether their conduct violated the law.")

Hall v. Sweet, 666 F. App'x 469, ___ (6th Cir. 2016) (White, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (not published) ("I disagree with the majority's conclusion that the law was not clearly established as to whether social workers are subject to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirements. The majority correctly identifies Andrews as the controlling precedent on this issue. There, this court reaffirmed that to determine whether there was a clearly established right, 'a district court looks to binding precedent by the Supreme Court, its court of appeals or itself.' Andrews v. Hickman Cty., Tenn., 700 F.3d 845, 862 n.7 (6th Cir. 2012). '[W]e look first to decisions of the Supreme Court, then to our own decisions and those of other courts within the circuit, and then to decisions of other Courts of Appeal.'. . As the majority notes, the Western District of Michigan, where this case originated, held in 2004 that 'the Fourth Amendment applies to [social workers], as it does to all other officers and agents of the state[.] ... There is ... no social worker exception to the strictures of the Fourth Amendment.' . . Since O'Donnel predated the challenged searches, it is sufficient to create a clearly established constitutional right in this context. This is especially true considering many other circuits had already decided that social workers are not exempt from the Fourth Amendment. [collecting cases] This large body of circuit authority, coupled with at least one case from the Western District of Michigan, clearly established at the time of the searches that social workers are subject to the Fourth Amendment's strictures. Because the second search violated Hall's clearly established Fourth Amendment rights, I would affirm the district court's denial of qualified immunity as to that search and remand for further proceedings.")

Brent v. Wenk, 555 F. App'x 519, 526, 527 (6th Cir. 2014) ("Collectively, Andrews and Kovacic indicate that before this court decided Andrews in 2012, a social worker entering a home without a warrant did not violate clearly established law, but a social worker removing a child without a warrant did. Brent does not allege that his children were removed in violation of the Fourth Amendment; he instead challenges the warrantless entry into his home. Andrews therefore controls this case, meaning that the social workers are entitled to qualified immunity on Brent's Fourth Amendment claim. Brent does not challenge this interpretation of Andrews, but instead argues that Andrews was wrongly decided. He relies on decisions of district courts within this circuit and the decisions of other circuits to establish that there has never been a social-worker exemption to the Fourth Amendment. Brent's argument is without merit. First, Andrews belies Brent's argument by holding that there was no clearly established law regarding a social worker exemption in 2008, when the events in Andrews took place. And Brent cites no case that would indicate a change in this circuit's law between 2008 and 2010, when the events of this case took place. Second, and relatedly, '[w]hen determining whether a constitutional right is clearly established, we look first to decisions of the Supreme Court, then to our own decisions and those of other courts within the circuit, and then to decisions of other Courts of Appeal.' Andrews, 700 F.3d at 853. Brent's reliance on district court cases within this circuit and on the law of other circuits is therefore unavailing. Because our circuit in Andrews held that there was no clearly established law regarding the Fourth Amendment's applicability to social workers in 2008, that determination controls this case. We therefore reverse the judgment of the district court and grant the social workers qualified immunity on Brent's Fourth Amendment claims.")

Toms v. Taft, 338 F.3d 519, 527 n.5 (6th Cir. 2003) ("Although courts engaging in qualified immunity analyses often consider only case law when determining whether the right at issue was clearly established, the Supreme Court in Hope also considered a Department of Justice report and an Alabama Department of Corrections regulation in deciding whether the officials were on notice that their conduct violated the plaintiff's rights. . . In this case, therefore, while not dispositive, it is appropriate to consider the ODRC's policy, on which Brigano apparently relied, that 'all preparatory obligations, such as securing a marriage license, are the sole responsibility of the couple to wed,' in determining whether he knowingly violated plaintiffs' rights.").

Heggen v. Lee, 284 F.3d 675, 687 (6th Cir. 2002) ("Defendant's reliance on Cope is misplaced. This Court in Cope expressly stated that the parties had pointed to no law from the Sixth Circuit or the United States Supreme Court that would have put the county clerk on notice that her actions were unconstitutional. Defendant is foreclosed from arguing the same in the instant case because of Hall. The record shows that the actual duties of deputies in Hopkins County are essentially the same type of nonpolicymaking duties performed by the plaintiff in Hall. It is undisputed that Defendant informed Plaintiffs that they would not be rehired in late December 1998, more than a year after Hall was decided in October 1997. We believe that the right of these Plaintiffs to be free from patronage dismissals was 'sufficiently clear,' such that after Hall, a reasonable official would have understood that taking such an action against them for political reasons was unconstitutional.").

Risbridger v. Connelly, 275 F.3d 565, 569, 572 (6th Cir. 2002) ("A right is clearly established if there is binding precedent from the Supreme Court, the Sixth Circuit, the district court itself, or other circuits that is directly on point. . . . . Given the Supreme Court's express reservation of the question of whether a Fourth Amendment right to refuse to provide identification during a valid Terry stop renders invalid an arrest that is based on probable cause to believe the individual has violated a presumptively valid state or local law, as well as the lack of clear precedent from our circuit, we join the Seventh, Eighth, and Tenth Circuits and find that the contours of such a right were not sufficiently clear that the unlawfulness of plaintiff's arrest must have been apparent at the time.").

Williams v. Commonwealth of Kentucky, 24 F.3d 1526, 1537 (6th Cir. 1994) ("The First and Fifth Circuits have indicated in dicta without discussion that they would apply Loudermill to demotions. . . Two published opinions of district courts from other circuits have balanced the competing interests and found that a tenured public employee is entitled to a Loudermill hearing before being demoted. . . Therefore, the only authorities that clearly recognize a right to predemotion notice and hearing are the two district court opinions. . . . These decisions are not 'so clearly foreshadowed by' Loudermill or opinions in this circuit 'as to leave no doubt in the mind of a reasonable officer that' not giving a tenured employee notice and hearing before a demotion would violate the employee's due process rights.").

Long v. Norris, 929 F.2d 1111 (6th Cir. 1991) (look first to decisions of Supreme Court, then to decisions of this court and other courts within circuit, and finally to decisions of other circuits).

Ohio Civil Service Employees Association v. Seiter, 858 F.2d 1171, 1177 (6th Cir.1988) ("[I]n the ordinary instance, to find a clearly established constitutional right, a district court must find binding precedent by the Supreme Court, its court of appeals or itself. In an extraordinary case, it may be possible for the decisions of other courts to clearly establish a principle of law. For the decisions of other courts to provide such 'clearly established law,' these decisions must both point unmistakably to the unconstitutionality of the conduct complained of and be so clearly foreshadowed by applicable direct authority as to leave no doubt in the mind of a reasonable officer that his conduct. . . would be found wanting.").

XXL of Ohio, Inc. Commerce v. City of Broadview Heights, No. 1:01CV2514, 2003 WL 23219809, at *44 (S.D. Ohio Feb. 24, 2003) (not reported) ("In the instant case, qualified immunity cannot protect the mayor and city council members of Broadview Heights from liability. On January 21, 2000 the Federal District Court for the Northen District of Ohio issued its decision in North Olmsted. XXL offers evidence to support, and defendants do not deny, that attorneys for Broadview Heights drew defendants' attention to the decision in North Olmsted and warned that the decision indicated that Broadview Heights' sign code was problematic. The city began issuing citations to XXL for violations of the sign ordinance on August 20, 2000. Any reasonable official in the position of the mayor and city council members of Broadview Heights would have known in light of North Olmsted that enforcement of Broadview Heights' sign ordinance against XXL violated XXL's clearly established rights under the First Amendment.").

Coy v. Bd. of Education of the North Canton City Schools, 205 F. Supp.2d 791, 805, 806 (N.D. Ohio 2002) ("The defendants say that because neither the Sixth Circuit nor courts within the Sixth Circuit have addressed the issue of student websites and the First Amendment, the constitutional right at issue was not clearly established. . . . The Court disagrees. As discussed above, Tinker applies to this case. The Sixth Circuit has discussed and applied Tinker on numerous occasions. . . . And while the Sixth Circuit has not directly dealt with the issue of a student website and the First Amendment, other courts have. . . . Once it is determined that the right is clearly established, the Court must determine whether the plaintiffs have alleged facts supported by sufficient evidence to indicate Stanley's and Shoup's actions were objectively unreasonable in light of the clearly established constitutional right. . . . As discussed above, there are material issues of genuine fact as to the motivation behind Stanley's and Shoup's decision to discipline Jon Coy. Therefore, the Court holds that Defendants Stanley and Shoup are not entitled to qualified immunity.").

Estate of Clark v. Walker, 865 F.3d 544, 551-52 (7th Cir. 2017) ("Clark's right to be free from deliberate indifference to his risk of suicide while he was in custody was clearly established at the time of his death in 2012. . . .Walker responds to this substantial body of case law in several ways. First, he argues that it is 'doubtful' whether circuit precedent can clearly establish law for purposes of qualified immunity. He cites two Supreme Court cases, but both cases leave this question unanswered. See Taylor v. Barkes, 579 U.S. —, —, 135 S. Ct. 2042, 2045 (2015); City & County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 575 U.S. —, —, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1776 (2015). Other Supreme Court cases indicate circuit precedent is adequate for these purposes. See, e.g., Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 617 (1999) ("Petitioners have not brought to our attention any cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule on which they seek to rely."). In addition, we have exercised this authority for decades, including in this specific context of prison and jail suicides. See Hall, 957 F.2d at 404–05; see also Werner v. Wall, 836 F.3d 751, 762 (7th Cir. 2016). We see no reason to depart from these precedents.")

Werner v. Wall, 836 F.3d 751, 762 & n.28 (7th Cir. 2016) ("In conducting the clearly established inquiry, our first task is to consider controlling Supreme Court and Seventh Circuit precedent. . . Our earlier discussion makes evident that the precedent of the Supreme Court and of our court certainly did not provide adequate guidance to permit the defendants to understand their responsibilities in the face of the tangle of overlapping laws and regulations that Wisconsin had created. . . We therefore must 'cast a wider net' and look to whether 'all relevant case law' demonstrates "such a clear trend ... that we can say with fair assurance that the recognition of the right by a controlling precedent was merely a question of time.'. . In this respect, Mr. Werner identifies a line of Wisconsin state court decisions. . . .We are not alone in looking to trends in the decisional law of other jurisdictions once we are satisfied that controlling precedent in our own circuit does not clearly establish a particular legal right. [collecting cases]") Sutterfield v. City of Milwaukee, 751 F.3d 542, 551, 573-79 (7th Cir. 2014) ("It will no doubt be frustrating to Sutterfield and to the reader that we do not reach firm conclusions as to the merits of all of the claims she has asserted and instead, like the district court, resolve the case in part based on the doctrine of qualified immunity. We recognize the significant role that resolving the merits of each claim plays in the development of precedent and clarifying the boundaries of constitutional rights. . . But given the importance of the interests at stake, the lack of clarity in the case law, and the shallowness of the briefing as to the alternatives available to the police on the facts presented here, we believe that the tentative nature of some of our analysis is appropriate. . . .Sutterfield contends that because Wisconsin precedent would not bind this court on the merits of her claims, and because in particular we, in contrast to the Wisconsin courts, have refused to extend the community caretaking doctrine to anything but automobile searches, the Wisconsin cases are irrelevant in terms of whether the defendants have qualified immunity. Not so. Although it is true that in this court, the Wisconsin cases have persuasive value only on the merits of Sutterfield's federal claims, they remain relevant as to what the defendants might have thought the law, including the federal constitution, permitted them to do in executing the emergency statement of detention. Federal courts do not possess exclusive authority to decide Fourth Amendment issues; state courts resolve such issues every day. . . In the absence of a controlling decision by the United States Supreme Court, the Wisconsin cases are thus as relevant as our own precedents in evaluating what a Milwaukee police officer might have thought the law permitted in responding to a report that the occupant of a private dwelling was in danger of harming herself. . . . Although our decision in Pichany refused to extend the community caretaking exception recognized by the Supreme Court in Cady beyond the automobile context, Wisconsin courts have given the exception a much broader reach. They have relied on the community caretaking doctrine to justify warrantless entries into the home when the police have reason to believe that the occupant may be injured or otherwise in danger of harm. . . . Based on these decisions, the officers who forcibly entered Sutterfield's home could have believed that their entry was justified by the community caretaking doctrine as understood and applied by the Wisconsin courts. . . .The decision to forcibly open and search the locked compact disc case discovered in the course of the protective sweep presents a closer question in terms of the officers' qualified immunity, just as it does on the merits of Sutterfield's Fourth Amendment claim. No Wisconsin case that has been cited to us or that we have found has relied on the community caretaking doctrine to justify any search of the premises more intrusive than the sort of limited, protective sweep envisioned by Buie—that is, a search of places within the home that another person might be found. . .The gun, having been secured within a locked, opaque case, obviously was not in plain view, in contrast to the drugs found in both Horngren and Pinkard. Opening the case was a substantial step beyond the standard protective sweep, and constituted a more substantial intrusion on Sutterfield's privacy interests in her personal effects. . . . [T]he defendants are entitled to qualified immunity for the warrantless entry into Sutterfield's home, the search of the locked compact disc case, and the temporary seizure of the gun found inside of the case. The police were faced with a difficult situation in which they had reason to believe, based on her physician's report, that Sutterfield might pose a danger to herself, they were implementing an emergency detention of her person for evaluation pursuant to section 51.15, and they were logically attempting to find the firearm they had reason to believe Sutterfield possessed and to secure that firearm while Sutterfield was undergoing a mental health evaluation. Notwithstanding the uncertainty as to which legal framework best applies to the warrantless actions of the police in these circumstances, the police could have believed that Wisconsin precedents, if not the federal cases, authorized them to take these actions in order to protect Sutterfield's wellbeing as well as the well-being of anyone else, including her son, who might have access to her home in her absence. . . .Based on the Supreme Court's decision in Brigham City and this court's decision in Fitzgerald, we conclude that the warrantless entry into Sutterfield's home was justified. Under the circumstances confronting the defendant police officers, they had an objectively reasonable basis for believing that Sutterfield posed an imminent danger of harm to herself; the circumstances thus constituted an emergency which dispensed with the need for a warrant under the exigent circumstances exception to the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement. Alternatively, even if the entry into Sutterfield's home was inconsistent with the Fourth Amendment, a reasonable person would not have known that the entry violated Sutterfield's clearly established rights; the officers would therefore be entitled to qualified immunity on the unlawful entry claim. Similarly, although we have assumed arguendo that both the search of the compact disc case in Sutterfield's home and the seizure of the (lawfully-possessed) gun found inside of that case were contrary to the Fourth Amendment, we conclude that the defendant officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the unlawful search and seizure claims.")

Burgess v. Lowery, 201 F.3d 942, 944-46 (7th Cir. 2000) ("Even if our court had decided that strip searches of prison visitors were unconstitutional in the absence of reasonable suspicion, there might be enough doubt about the soundness of the decision, whether in light of decisions by other circuits before or after our decision or of intimations in Supreme Court decisions not squarely on point that our view might be erroneous, to justify the state in believing that the plaintiff's right was not yet 'clearly established' within the meaning of the cases on immunity. . . The Fifth Circuit has held the contrary, Brady v. Fort Bend County, 58 F.3d 173, 175 (5th Cir.1995); Boddie v. City of Columbus, 989 F.2d 745, 748 (5th Cir.1993), but with all respect we cannot believe that its view is correct. Suppose the only relevant case the Fifth Circuit had decided was very old, and every other circuit since had rejected the position taken in the Fifth Circuit's decision. It would be odd in such circumstances to suppose that right clearly established even in the Fifth Circuit, given that courts can and not infrequently do overrule decisions that seem clearly out of step with the rest of the legal universe. Equally, however, the absence of a decision by the Supreme Court or this court cannot be conclusive on the issue whether a right is clearly established in this circuit. There might be no decision in either court simply because the existence of the right was so clear, as a matter of the wording of a constitutional or statutory provision or decisions in other circuits or in the state courts, that no one thought it worth while to litigate the issue. . . To rule that until the Supreme Court has spoken, no right of litigants in this circuit can be deemed established before we have decided the issue would discourage anyone from being the first to bring a damages suit in this court; he would be certain to be unable to obtain any damages. . . . .The test, formulated with particular application to this case, ought to be whether a reasonable official in the position of these defendants, considering all relevant sources of guidance to the law, might have thought it reasonably possible that this court or eventually the U.S. Supreme Court would hold that strip searches of prison visitors are proper even without reasonable suspicion.").

McDonald v. Haskins, 966 F.2d 292, 294 (7th Cir. 1992) (plaintiff could rely on precedent from Third Circuit).

EIGHTH CIRCUIT

Jacobson v. McCormick, 763 F.3d 914, 918 (8th Cir. 2014) ("To overcome qualified immunity, a plaintiff typically must identify either 'cases of controlling authority in their jurisdiction at the time of the incident' or 'a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.' Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 617 (1999). Neither criterion is satisfied here. . . . In our view, two decisions from other circuits did not place the issue beyond debate, and a reasonable correctional officer in Minnesota could have believed—like the district court in this very case—that Jacobson's admission that he recently smoked a bowl of marijuana gave reasonable suspicion to believe that he could be secreting contraband in private areas of his body. McCormick and Voltaire are thus entitled to qualified immunity.")

Galarnyk v. Fraser, 687 F.3d 1070, 1076 (8th Cir. 2012) ('In McCabe, we held the '[l]ack of probable cause is a necessary element of' a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim. . . In Reichle v. Howards. . . the Supreme Court determined 'two federal law enforcement agents [were] immune from suit for allegedly arresting a suspect in retaliation for his political speech, when the agents had probable cause to arrest the suspect for committing a federal crime.' The Supreme Court concluded 'that, at the time of [the defendant's] arrest [in 2006], it was not clearly established that an arrest supported by probable cause could violate the First Amendment.'. . The Supreme Court declined to decide 'whether a First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim may lie despite the presence of probable cause to support the arrest,'. . . leaving our conclusion in McCabe intact. Accordingly, the district court did not err in holding the presence of probable cause to arrest Galarnyk for trespass defeated Galarnyk's First Amendment retaliatory arrest claim.')

Irving v. Dormire, 519 F.3d 441, 451 (8th Cir. 2008) ("It is true that we have on occasion afforded the protection of qualified immunity in situations in which a split of authority exists on the constitutional question at issue. . . . Nevertheless, and notwithstanding the lack of a decision squarely on point within our circuit, we conclude that, given the clear weight of authority in the circuits that have ruled on the question, Brigance was on fair notice that to falsely label an inmate a snitch is to unreasonably subject that inmate to the threat of a substantial risk of serious harm at the hands of his fellow inmates. After all, who better knows the opprobrium and consequent effect thereof that attaches to the label of snitch than those who work daily within the inmate population. Thus, we hold that a reasonable prison guard in Brigance's position would have known that to label Irving a snitch would violate his constitutional right to protection from harm.").

Hill v. McKinley, 311 F.3d 899, 910 (8th Cir. 2002) (Hansen, J. , dissenting) ("In examining our own case law, as well as that of the Supreme Court and other circuits, I conclude that at the time of Ms. Hill's arrest and detention, the officers had 'fair warning' that their treatment of Ms. Hill was unconstitutional.").

Turner v. Arkansas Insurance Dep't., 297 F.3d 751, 758 (8th Cir. 2002) ("When making the determination of whether the law was 'clearly established' at the time the alleged violation occurred, we are obligated to include the decisions of the district courts. . . A thorough review of these decisions show that the overwhelming majority of cases reaching the issue concluded that an employee's at-will status did not preclude the maintenance of an action under ' 1981. . . . This leads us to the question whether one Supreme Court case, which strongly implies that Turner's position is the correct one, plus two courts of appeals cases and fifteen district court opinions that expressly state that Turner's position is the correct one, is enough to show the law in question was 'clearly established.' We hold that it does. Determining whether the law is 'clearly established' is not a precise science. The determination is, however, a balancing of all available precedential decisional law on point, with the greatest effect given to decisions of the United States Supreme Court. Next, we look within our own circuit, and where there is no law on point we then canvass the other courts of appeals, the district courts, and state courts, [footnote omitted] giving each decision on point its requisite weight. In our view, the fact that two circuit cases and fifteen district court cases directly support a proposition and the Supreme Court implicitly supports that same position is sufficient to demonstrate that the law was 'clearly established' as of September 23, 1999.").

Turner v. Arkansas Insurance Dep't., 297 F.3d 751, 758 (8th Cir. 2002) (Bye, J., dissenting) ("The court deduces 'clearly established' law from a Supreme Court decision overruled by Congress, four evenly-divided circuit court decisions, and fifteen district court decisions against four. The court's approach (and its nose count) conflict with earlier cases in our circuit, and I can only wonder what the government and municipal lawyers practicing in our circuit will take from this case.").

Vaughn v. Ruoff, 253 F.3d 1124, 1129, 1130 (8th Cir. 2001) ("We subscribe to a broad view of the concept of clearly established law, and we look to all available decisional law, including decisions from other courts, federal and state, when there is no binding precedent in this circuit. . . . Even in the complete absence of any decisions involving similar facts, a right can be clearly established if a reasonable public official would have known her conduct was unconstitutional. . . . We have not found any cases with facts similar to those in this case. This does not, however, carry the day for Ruoff. Numerous pre-1994 cases show that minimum procedures regularly precede state compelled sterilizations, and some clearly establish that pre-sterilization procedures are constitutionally required. [citing cases from other jurisdictions]. . . Furthermore, any reasonable social worker–indeed, any reasonable person, social worker or not–would have known that a sterilization is compelled, not voluntary, if it is consented to under the coercive threat of losing one's children, and hence unconstitutional.").

Buckley v. Rogerson, 133 F.3d 1125, 1129-31 (8th Cir. 1998) ("[Defendant] bears the burden of proving that this right [a constitutional right to specific medical approval of segregation and restraint for prison mental patients] was not clearly established. As we have noted in previous cases, this court has taken a 'broad view' of what constitutes clearly established law for purposes of qualified immunity." Court relies on federal district court decisions from Missouri, Michigan and New York to find right clearly established.).

Johnson-El v. Schoemehl, 878 F.2d 1043, 1049 (8th Cir. 1989) (taking into consideration identity of a court, its geographical proximity, dissemination of information within the pertinent profession and frequency of similar litigation when determining whether reasonable official would be aware of the law).

Konop v. Northwestern School District, 26 F. Supp.2d 1189, 1194-96, 1201 (D.S.D. 1998) ("The defendants assert, and correctly so, that there is apparently no case decided by the United States Supreme Court, by the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, by any District Court in the Eighth Circuit, or by the South Dakota Supreme Court involving strip searches in a school setting. They then argue that the law in the Eighth Circuit therefore cannot be 'clearly established.' Defendants rely on Jenkins By Hall v. Talladega City Board of Education . . . in arguing that the law can be clearly established in the District of South Dakota only by decisions from the United States Supreme Court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, U.S. District Courts in the District of South Dakota, or the South Dakota Supreme Court. The Court rejects this contention, relying on Eighth Circuit precedent. [citing Johnson-El v. Schoemehl, 878 F.2d 1043, 1049 (8th Cir.1989)] . . . . Taking the argument of defendants to its logical conclusion would tell us that there must be factual identity between a prior case and the case under consideration. This would result in 'absolute immunity', not 'qualified immunity.' In other words, any school official would receive one 'bite of the apple', regardless of the nature of the conduct. . . . The implication of Lanier is that to possibly establish civil rights liability (i.e. to 'get past' the qualified immunity defense and to allow the jury as the finder of the facts to decide the facts), there must be 'fair warning' of the constitutional right or rights and there is no requirement that this warning be found in prior Supreme Court precedent or factually similar precedent elsewhere. Lanier also stands for the proposition that general principles of law can provide fair warning. . . . Plaintiffs' Fourth Amendment right to be free of unreasonable searches in the school setting was clearly established at the time of the searches. . . T.L.O. established in 1985 that a search in the school setting must be justified and reasonably related in scope to the circumstances which are claimed to have justified the search. . . . T.L.O. has been applied time and time again and certain rules are clear: (1) a strip search is not justified absent individualized suspicion unless there is a legitimate safety concern (e.g.weapons); (2) school officials must be investigating allegations of violations of the law or school rules and only individual accusations justify a strip search; and (3) strip searches must be designed to be minimally intrusive, taking into account the item for which the search is conducted. The reasonableness standard set forth in T.L.O. was clearly established and should have been applied by defendants. It was in fact applied time after time by various Circuit and District Courts to factual scenarios having some similarity to the present case.").

NINTH CIRCUIT

Moonin v. Tice, 868 F.3d 853, 868, 870, 872 , 875 (9th Cir. 2017) ("We first look to binding precedent to determine whether a right is clearly established. . . 'In the absence of binding precedent clearly establishing the constitutional right, "we look to whatever decisional law is available,"' including relevant decisions of other circuits, state courts, and district courts. . . As an initial matter, it was clear in 2011 that some of the speech impacted by Tice's edict was protected by the First Amendment. As early as Pickering, it was clear that employees' opinions about the proper way to administer government agencies, when conveyed in that employee's capacity as a private citizen, constituted protected speech. . . Controlling precedent also made clear in 2011 that it was generally unconstitutional to punish a police officer for speaking out about malfeasance or mismanagement in the department. . . Tice was therefore clearly on notice that a policy precluding all sorts of speech by officers, to whomever communicated, about the K9 program was subject to limits imposed by the First Amendment. Moreover, it was abundantly clear in 2011 that ex ante restrictions on employee speech are more constitutionally problematic than after-the-fact decisions to punish a particular employee for his speech. . . Without more, the marriage of these two precepts in large part resolves this case. Tice's policy was written so broadly as to promise punishment for some speech that, as of 2011, clearly received constitutional protection. In light of the Supreme Court's emphasis on identifying clearly established law '"particularized" to the facts of the case,'. . . however, we consider in detail cases addressing analogous employer prior restraints on speech. These cases demonstrate that the First Amendment right Tice violated was clearly established at the time he sent his email. . . . Controlling case law addressing flat prohibitions on employee speech is, and was in 2011, limited. But Supreme Court and Ninth Circuit precedent emphatically signaled that a policy prohibiting public discussion of matters of public concern by employees of a particular government program, without a countervailing showing of substantial workplace disruption, was much too broad to be constitutional. . . . Because there is limited controlling precedent on point, we turn to persuasive authority. . . We conclude that persuasive cases addressing more closely analogous regulations would have made reasonable government officials quite aware, had they any doubt, that Tice's edict ran afoul of the First Amendment. . . .In short, a 'robust consensus' of prior cases made clear at the time Tice issued his edict that an employer ordinarily. . . may not prohibit its employees from all public discussion relating to a particular department or government program. . . Tice's policy did just that, making punishable any direct communication 'regarding the [NHP] K9 program or interdiction program,' with no attempt to tailor the speech restrictions to NHP's legitimate interests. Accordingly, we hold that Tice is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Government employers have significant and legitimate interests in managing the speech of their employees, particularly where the employees' speech pertains to their work. And policies explaining how sensitive information ordinarily should be handled benefit both employers and employees. We make clear today, however, that a public employer generally may not subject all employee speech regarding a particular government program—whether fact or opinion, and whether liable to disrupt the workplace or not—to a blanket ban. A government employer's policies imposing prior restraints on their employees' speech as citizens on matters of public concern must bear a 'close and rational relationship' to the employer's legitimate interests, and the broad policy Tice announced did not meet this standard. This conclusion was compelled by prior case law at the time Tice sent his missive. We therefore hold that Tice is not entitled to qualified immunity[.]")

Jones v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 802 F.3d 990, 1005 n.6 (9th Cir. 2015) ("The dissent suggests that our cases, such as Rogers, Mabe, and Wallis, cannot furnish clearly established law because other circuits disagree with them. . . However, this court regularly finds a principle to be clearly established based solely on its own decisions. See Kirkpatrick, 2015 WL 4154039, at *9–*10 (finding an infant's right not to be seized from his mother's custody at the hospital clearly established based on Rogers); Rogers, 487 F.3d at 1297 (finding the law governing removal of children from the home without judicial authorization clearly established based on Mabe, Wallis, and Ram v. Rubin, 118 F.3d 1306 (9th Cir.1997)). We must continue to rely on our own cases to determine whether the law is clearly established until this court sitting en banc or the Supreme Court tells us that we may not.")

Carrillo v. Cnty. of Los Angeles, 798 F.3d 1210, 1221 n.13 (9th Cir. 2015) ("In recent cases, the Supreme Court has assumed for the sake of argument without explicitly holding that 'controlling Court of Appeals' authority could be a dispositive source of clearly established law.' Reichle v. Howards, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 2094 (2012); see also Carroll v. Carman, 135 S.Ct. 348, 350 (2014). None of these cases has overruled Hope or called its exclusive reliance on circuit precedent into question.")

Prison Legal News v. Lehman, 397 F.3d 692, 701, 702 (9th Cir. 2005) ("In determining whether PLN's rights in this case were clearly established, and whether a reasonable person would have known his or her actions violated these rights, we may look at unpublished decisions and the law of other circuits, in addition to Ninth Circuit precedent.").

Boyd v. Benton County, 374 F.3d 773, 781-83 (9th Cir. 2004) ("The Supreme Court has provided little guidance as to where courts should look to determine whether a particular right was clearly established at the time of the injury. . . In the Ninth Circuit, we begin our inquiry by looking to binding precedent. . . If the right is clearly established by decisional authority of the Supreme Court or this Circuit, our inquiry should come to an end. On the other hand, when 'there are relatively few cases on point, and none of them are binding,' we may inquire whether the Ninth Circuit or Supreme Court, at the time the out-of-circuit opinions were rendered, would have reached the same results. . . Thus, in the absence of binding precedent, we ' Alook to whatever decisional law is available to ascertain whether the law is clearly established" for qualified immunity purposes, Aincluding decisions of state courts, other circuits, and district courts."'. . In October 1997, neither the Supreme Court nor this Circuit had provided any guidance as to when the use of flash-bangs constitutes a Fourth Amendment violation. Thus, we must ask whether, despite the absence of binding precedent, there was sufficient non-binding authority to place the officers on notice that using a flash-bang in these circumstances would be excessive. By October 1997, two circuit courts and one state court had addressed the use of flash-bangs within the context of the Fourth Amendment. . . . Taken together, Baker, Garner, and Myers, in October 1997, failed to provide the officers in this case with the requisite level of guidance to put them on notice that using the flash-bang in these circumstances violated Boyd's Fourth Amendment rights. In fact, Baker, Garner, and Myers all hold that the use of flash-bang devices was reasonable under their respective facts. . . . In sum, we conclude that without any guidance from this Circuit and an absence of non-binding authority that otherwise clearly establishes the right, the officers here were not put on sufficient notice that using a flash-bang in these circumstances was unconstitutional.").

Bahrampour v. Lampert, 356 F.3d 969, 977 (9th Cir. 2004) ("When Mr. Bahrampour's subscription to the Green Lantern comic book was rejected in January 2000, there was no appellate decision that held that restrictions on the receipt of bulk mail were unconstitutional. One federal district court decision from a different district had held that a similar regulation was unconstitutional. Two unpublished decisions from the United States District Court for the District of Oregon, however, had held that the ODC bulk mail regulations at issue were constitutional.

Thirteen months after ODC rejected the Green Lantern comic book, we held that prohibiting inmates' receipt of non-profit bulk mail was unconstitutional, noting that '[t]he speech at issue is core protected speech, not commercial speech or speech whose content is objectionable on security or other grounds.' We also held in Prison Legal News that '[b]ecause the contours of [the constitutional right at issue] were not sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he [was] doing violate[d] that right, the law in this case was not clearly established.'. . . Reasonable prison officials would have no basis for assuming that regulations prohibiting bulk mail were unconstitutional in the face of two district court decisions from the district in which the prison is located which had concluded that the precise regulations at issue were not unconstitutional. The fact that there was a conflict in the views of district court judges on the issue demonstrates that the constitutionality of the regulations was not clearly established until this court held, eighteen months later, that prohibiting the receipt of commercial bulk mail is unconstitutional. The district court did not err in its determination that the prison officials are entitled to qualified immunity because prison inmates had no clearly established right to receive commercial bulk mail at the time of the rejection of the Green Lantern comic book subscription." [internal citations omitted])

Rivero v. City and County of San Francisco, 316 F.3d 857, 864, 865 (9th Cir. 2002) ("We now hold that it was clearly established in 1993 that state employees could not cause the termination of a two-year for-profit government contract in retaliation for the contracting party's exercise of his First Amendment rights to speak out on a matter of public concern. Although we had not specifically held prior to 1993 that such a contract was a 'valuable governmental benefit' for purposes of First Amendment retaliation law, a reasonable person would have known from Pickering, Perry and Hyland I that this was the law in this circuit. . . . [T]he fact that there was a circuit split does not mean that the law was not clear in this circuit prior to the Court's decision in Umbehr. It was clear, and the Supreme Court's decision in Umbehr merely confirmed what was already the law in this circuit. The issue is not what the law was or might have been in other circuits in 1993. It is, rather, what the 'controlling authority in [the defendants'] jurisdiction[was] at the time of the incident.'").

Sorrels v. McKee, 290 F.3d 965, 970, 971 (9th Cir. 2002) ("The existence of binding precedent holding unconstitutional a prison policy requiring inmates to pay for publications received would easily dispose of prong two. The law would be clearly established and defendants' qualified immunity defense would fail. However, neither the district court, nor the parties, nor our own research has unearthed Ninth Circuit or Supreme Court caselaw on point predating our 1999 decision in Crofton v. Roe. We next look to the decisions of our sister Circuits, district courts, and state courts. . . However, either Washington's policy was unique among state prisons, or no other state's prisoners had seen fit to challenge similar policies, as there appear to be no published decisions on point prior to 1999 in any jurisdiction, at any level, concerning the constitutionality of a prison regulation requiring inmates to pay for publications they receive. Still this does not end our inquiry. In deciding the second prong of qualified immunity, '[i]t is not necessary that the alleged acts have been previously held unconstitutional, as long as the unlawfulness [of defendants' actions] was apparent in light of preexisting law' . . . In other words, while there may be no published cases holding similar policies constitutional, this may be due more to the obviousness of the illegality than the novelty of the legal issue. . . . Considering the complete lack of published decisions on point and the fact that defendants reasonably could have believed that the 'no gift publication' policy was constitutional, it cannot be said that the law was clearly established until we decided Crofton v. Roe in 1999. Sorrels also urges us to consider two unpublished district court decisions in determining whether the law was clearly established . . . . We have held that unpublished decisions of district courts may inform our qualified immunity analysis. See Prison Legal News v. Cook, 238 F.3d 1145, 1152 (9th Cir.2001) (relying on unpublished district court cases). The district court rulings in Ocanaz and Spalding do not change our conclusion that the law was not clearly established. At most, they show that the law was in the process of becoming established. This is not surprising, as it will be a rare instance in which, absent any published opinions on point or overwhelming obviousness of illegality, we can conclude that the law was clearly established on the basis of unpublished decisions only.").

Carey v. Nevada Gaming Control Board, 279 F.3d 873, 881, 882 & n.8 (9th Cir. 2002) ("As discussed above, there are two Ninth Circuit cases directly on point, Lawson and Martinelli, which unambiguously hold that compelling an individual to identify himself during a Terry stop violates the Fourth Amendment. Those cases invalidated state statutes that authorized arrests based on the detained individual's refusal to identify himself. In addition, Lawson and Martinelli are in accord with Supreme Court pronouncements on this issue. . . . Based on the foregoing, we conclude that a reasonable officer in Spendlove's position would have known that Carey had a clearly established Fourth Amendment right not to identify himself, and that the Nevada statutes at issue, like the statutes in Lawson and Martinelli, were unconstitutional to the extent they allowed Carey to be arrested for exercising his rights. . . . We note that some federal courts in other circuits have concluded there is no clearly established right to refuse to identify oneself during an investigative stop. [citing cases] These courts relied on the fact that the Supreme Court has twice declined to decide whether a person can be compelled to identify himself during a lawful investigatory stop. If we had only the Supreme Court's precedents to guide us, we might also conclude that the right was not clearly established. However, unlike our sister circuits, we have the benefit of two precedents on point in our own circuit, in addition to Supreme Court dicta that supports these precedents. We think this is sufficient to clearly establish the right in our circuit."). [But see Hiibel v. Nevada, 59 P.3d 1201 (Nev. 2002) (holding same Nevada statute did not violate constitutional right to privacy]

P.B. v. Koch, 96 F.3d 1298, 1304 (9th Cir. 1996) ("In light of the Supreme Court's holding that students are protected from unjustified intrusions on personal security and out-of-circuit cases holding that arbitrary corporal punishment is unconstitutional, no reasonable principal could think it constitutional to intentionally punch, slap, grab, and slam students into lockers.").

Romero v. Kitsap County, 931 F.2d 624 (9th Cir. 1991) (in absence of binding precedent, court should look at all available decisional law, including decisions of state courts, other circuits, and district courts).

TENTH CIRCUIT

Grissom v. Roberts, 902 F.3d 1162, 1168 (10th Cir. 2018) ("The role of an unpublished nonprecedential opinion in this enterprise depends on whether the opinion is being used to show that the plaintiff's proffered proposition is clearly established law or to show that the proposition is unsettled. We have held that '[a]n unpublished opinion ... provides little support for the notion that the law is clearly established on [a] point.'. . But an unpublished opinion can be quite relevant in showing that the law was not clearly established. If we make the collegial, and quite legitimate, assumption that panels of this court render reasonable decisions, we would be hard pressed to say that a proposition of law was clearly established at a time when an unpublished opinion by a panel of this court said the opposite. To do so we would have to say that the panel's decision was contrary to clearly established law at the time it was rendered. Our assumption does not require us to credit the unpublished opinion as being correct, only as being debatably correct. And there is perhaps a more important reason to presume that an unpublished decision was not contrary to clearly established law at the time. The purpose of the qualified-immunity test is to limit liability to those public officials who are 'plainly incompetent or ... knowingly violate the law.'. . This purpose would be ill served if liability were imposed on an official for conduct that had been held to be lawful, even in an unpublished opinion, by the federal appellate court with jurisdiction over the conduct, at least in the absence of later contrary authority issued before the official acted. Could we properly say that an official was plainly incompetent for taking guidance from an unpublished appellate opinion? . . . The argument favoring consideration of an unpublished opinion is particularly compelling if the same alleged victim and same defendant conduct are involved.")

Grissom v. Roberts, 902 F.3d 1162, 1174-75 (10th Cir. 2018) ("Grissom alleges he was subjected to cruel and unusual punishment because (1) 20 years in solitary created a substantial risk of serious harm, and (2) the defendants knew of but disregarded that harm. Pointing to various academic literature and government reports (both domestic and international), he appeals to us to recognize '[s]ociety's evolving standards of decency.'. . To overcome the defense of qualified immunity, however, Grissom must point to clearly established law. . . That, he has failed to do. He states, 'A growing number of courts have concluded denying the basic human needs of social interaction and environmental stimulation can violate the Eighth Amendment, especially when the deprivation lasts for years.'. . But the cited courts are four federal district courts, none from this circuit. That does not suffice to clearly establish the law. . . Indeed, the most recent relevant decision by this court is an unpublished opinion rejecting an Eighth Amendment claim brought by a prisoner who had been in solitary confinement for 30 years under conditions not markedly different from those here. See Silverstein v. Fed. Bureau of Prisons, 559 F. App'x 739, 741 (10th Cir. 2014). . . .Grissom, similar to the prisoner in Silverstein, has regularly communicated with other inmates and staff and has been afforded regular exercise (including outdoor recreation) and regular access to reading materials and to medical and mental-health care. We conclude that the Prison Officials are entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Sandberg v. Englewood, Colorado, 727 F. App'x 950, 961-62 (10th Cir. 2018) ("There is no case from the Tenth Circuit or the Supreme Court holding that Heller's articulation of a right to keep and bear arms inside the home must necessarily extend to a right to keep and bear arms outside the home. If anything, we have indicated the Second Amendment has some limitations when applied to conduct outside the home. . . In response to the paucity of authority on point from this court or the Supreme Court, Sandberg directs us to Justice Thomas's dissent from the denial of certiorari in Peruta v. California, 137 S. Ct. 1995 (2017). In Peruta, a litigant asked the Court to address whether a local municipality may place restrictions on firearm possession, such as requiring a particularized reason for a concealed carry permit. The Court declined to hear the case. . . Justice Thomas and Justice Gorsuch dissented, with Justice Thomas writing that he believes '[t]he most natural reading of [the Second Amendment] encompasses public carry.'. . Yet, a dissent from a denial of certiorari is not binding authority that would create clearly established law. Further, the dissent in Peruta was issued more than three years after the events of this case. Therefore, the dissent in Peruta does not clearly establish that as of May 14, 2014, a citizen had an absolute right to openly carry a firearm in public. Without a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case on point, Sandberg relies upon the Seventh Circuit's opinion in Moore v. Madigan, 702 F.3d 933 (7th Cir. 2012). In Moore, two separate plaintiffs sought declaratory and injunctive relief against the application of an Illinois statute that prohibited the carrying of a firearm in many public places. . . Relying on its interpretation of Heller and McDonald v. City of Chicago, 561 U.S. 742 (2010), the Seventh Circuit held that '[t]he Supreme Court has decided that the [Second A]mendment confers a right to bear arms for self-defense, which is as important outside the home as inside,' because the Second Amendment is focused on 'promot[ing] self-defense.'. . Of the cases Sandberg cites, Moore is the only circuit court opinion to hold that the Second Amendment guarantees a citizen the right to carry a firearm in public. Other circuits have stated the same principle in dicta, but have not articulated the rule in a holding. [collecting cases] We conclude that Moore does not provide a 'clearly established weight of authority from other courts.'. . That one other circuit has issued an opinion which would support Sandberg's claim does not in itself create a clearly established weight of authority. . . Instead, this court generally looks to whether a 'majority of courts' have adopted the rule in question, thereby making it 'sufficiently clear that a reasonable officer' would understand the rule and be expected to apply it. . . Thus, when the events at issue in this case occurred it was not clearly established that the Second Amendment guaranteed a citizen the right to openly carry a firearm in public without risk of facing police action. The district court did not err in dismissing Sandberg's Second Amendment claim.")

Leek v. Miller, 698 F. App'x 922, 928-29 (10th Cir. 2017) ("We address whether the asserted right—a protected property interest in prison accounts triggering procedural due process—was clearly established. In Clark, this circuit held that the atypical-and-significant-hardship evaluation announced in Sandin v. Conner, 515 U.S. 472 (1995), applied 'to protected property interest inquiries.'. . In doing so, we overruled an earlier case holding that prisoners have a protected property interest in the funds in their prison trust accounts. . . Consequently, the Gillihan holding 'is no longer good law and, hence, not "clearly established" in this circuit.'. .After Clark, in several unpublished decisions this circuit found it unnecessary to resolve whether a prisoner has a protected property interest in his prison accounts. [collecting decisions] As these cases demonstrate, the law in this circuit is not clearly established whether a prisoner has a protected property interest in his prison accounts. Mr. Leek relies on a case from the Third Circuit holding 'the Department of Corrections' assessment of [the prisoner's] institutional account constituted the deprivation of a protected property interest for purposes of procedural due process.' Burns v. Penn. Dep't of Corr., 544 F.3d 279, 291 (3d Cir. 2008). 'Normally, a single recent case from one circuit is not sufficient to make the law clearly established in another circuit.' Woodward v. City of Worland, 977 F.2d 1392, 1397 (10th Cir. 1992) . . . Mr. Leek has not cited any Supreme Court or published Tenth Circuit case, or case law from any circuits other than the Third Circuit, to support his constitutional claim. Therefore, we conclude that the district court properly granted summary judgment on qualified-immunity grounds.")

Mayfield v. Bethards, 826 F.3d 1252, 1259 (10th Cir. 2016) ("[E]ven assuming more specificity is needed, the clear weight of authority from other jurisdictions provided Deputy Bethards adequate notice that the conduct here implicated the Mayfields' Fourth Amendment rights. See Thomas, 765 F.3d at 1194 (stating that a right is clearly established "if the clearly established weight of authority from other courts shows that the right must be as the plaintiff maintains" (internal quotation marks omitted)). Indeed, seven federal circuits had addressed the issue prior to Detective Bethards's conduct, each holding that killing a pet dog is a Fourth Amendment seizure.")

Van Deelen v. Johnson, 497 F.3d 1151, 1158, 1159 (10th Cir. 2007) ("We believe Mr. Van Deelen has overcome both qualified immunity hurdles. As we have already indicated, Mr. Van Deelen has alleged facts from which a reasonable jury could (though need not necessarily) conclude that a violation of the First Amendment took place. And the right at issue–to petition the government for the redress of tax grievances–has been with us and clearly established since the Sons of Liberty visited Griffin's Wharf in Boston. Defendants respond by pointing us again to the line of cases from Kansas district courts . . . arguing that it 'muddied the water' sufficiently that a reasonable official would not have known that private citizens have a First Amendment right to petition on private as well as public matters. But every case discussing the public concern test in the Supreme Court has made pellucid that it applies only to public employees. . . The same is true of our own precedent. . . And none of our published opinions concerning the right of petition by private citizens has even hinted at a public concern requirement. . . The same is true of our sister circuits. . . Reliance on district court and unpublished decisions in the face of such uniform governing authority from the Supreme Court, as well as this circuit and every other circuit to have addressed the question, is not sufficient to avoid liability . . . .Put simply, and taking as true Mr. Van Deelen's version of the facts as we must, we hold (unremarkably, we think) that a reasonable government official should have clearly understood at the time of the events at issue that physical and verbal intimidation intended to deter a citizen from pursuing a private tax complaint violates that citizen's First Amendment right to petition for the redress of grievances.").

Gonzales v. City of Castle Rock, 366 F.3d 1093, 1117, 1118 (10th Cir. 2004) (en banc) ("In the instant case, we cannot hold that a reasonable officer would have known that a restraining order, coupled with a statute mandating its enforcement, would create a constitutionally protected property interest. No Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case has so held. Nor have we found any other circuit court cases addressing this specific question. Somewhat analogous cases from the Sixth and Eleventh Circuits have held that comprehensive state child welfare statutes created liberty interests in personal safety and the freedom from harm which gave rise to procedural due process protections. . .Likewise, two district courts, addressing facts similar to those in the present case, held that protective orders or their supporting statutes created a property interest in enforcement. . . Nevertheless, this precedent is insufficient to clearly establish the law for this circuit. Officers Ahlfinger, Brink and Ruisi are thus entitled to the affirmative defense of qualified immunity."), rev'd on other grounds, Town of Castle Rock v. Gonzales, 125 S. Ct. 2796 (2005).

Roska v. Peterson, 304 F.3d 982, 998, 1000 (10th Cir. 2002) ("Defendants are quite correct that there is no case directly on point, either in the Supreme Court or in this circuit. As we noted above, however, this is unnecessary. [citing Hope] A requirement of a case that is directly on point would quickly transform the qualified immunity standard into an absolute immunity standard in the vast majority of cases. . . Instead, we recognize that if the authority from other courts is heavily weighted toward plaintiff's interpretation, or if it is clear that doctrine points toward plaintiff's interpretation, we will still hold that the law was clearly established. . . . [W]e conclude that it was clearly established in May 1999 that the warrantless, no-knock entry into the Roska home, the warrantless seizure of Rusty, and the removal of Rusty without pre-deprivation procedures violated the Constitution.").

Herring v. Keenan, 218 F.3d 1171, 1176, 1178, 1179 (10th Cir. 2000) ("A plaintiff need not demonstrate that the specific conduct in this case had previously been held unlawful, so long as the unlawfulness was 'apparent.'. . . A plaintiff may satisfy his or her burden by showing that there is a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit opinion on point, or that his or her proposition is supported by the weight of authority from other courts. . . . while Eastwood, Lankford, and Mangels indicate that under some circumstances, a release of personal information regarding a person by a government officer may violate a constitutionally protected right to privacy, none of the cases discuss the question whether the right to privacy protects a probationer who may be HIV positive from a limited disclosure by his or her probation officer to persons whom the probation officer believed might be affected by their contact with the probationer. The cases, therefore, did not clearly establish such a right in 1993. . . . The plaintiff asserts that no less than seven federal courts outside of the Tenth Circuit have 'recognized the existence of a constitutionally protected privacy interest in maintaining the confidentiality of an individual's HIV status.' None of these cases, however, address the question we must decide. . . . None of the cases identified by the plaintiff involved a limited disclosure by a probation officer to a probationer's sister and restaurant employer of voluntarily exposed information that the probation officer believed was necessary to protect them from the possibility of an inadvertent exposure to HIV. Though a plaintiff is not required to show that the specific conduct was previously found to have been held unlawful, there must be a substantial correspondence so that the unlawfulness was apparent. . . In the present case, the plaintiff has shown that there is 'a clearly established right in the abstract' to privacy from disclosure of personal information by government officials. . . The plaintiff has not shown, however, that the district court cases cited amount to a sufficient weight of authority establishing a clearly established right of privacy in this case. The plaintiff has further failed to demonstrate that the contours of that right were sufficiently clear in late 1993 so that a reasonable probation officer would understand that he or she could not disclose to a probationer's close relative or restaurant employer that the probationer had tested positive to HIV. The plaintiff has failed to demonstrate a substantial correspondence between Keenan's disclosures and conduct that has been held to violate the right to privacy in prior decisions.") .

Herring v. Keenan, 218 F.3d 1171, 1181, 1182, 1186 n.8 (10th Cir. 2000) (Seymour, Chief Judge, dissenting) ("In holding that a probationer's constitutional privacy right to non-disclosure of his confidential medical information by his probation officer was not clearly established in late 1993, the majority extrapolates from the Supreme Court's bare holding in Griffin v. Wisconsin, . . . without addressing the underlying analysis and reasoning used therein, ignores other circuit precedent on point, and requires an inappropriately exacting factual similarity between prior cases and the case at bar. In my judgment, at the time of the events at issue, the law was clear that Mr. Herring enjoyed constitutional privacy protection against involuntary disclosures of personal information because there was no legitimate governmental interest in the disclosure, and Ms. Keenan's disclosure of such information was objectively unreasonable. For these reasons, I respectfully dissent. . . . To demonstrate a clearly established right, a plaintiff need not identify a case holding unconstitutional the exact conduct in question. Rather, 'this circuit requires only Asome but not precise factual correspondence."' . . . While the majority gives lip service to this standard, it then turns Griffin on its head and rejects Mr. Herring's claim because he has not cited a federal court of appeals case with exactly the same type of plaintiff and defendant, and precisely the same type of disclosure. In so doing, the majority relieves government officials of their 'incumbent' duty 'to relate established law to analogous factual settings.'").

Anaya v. Crossroads Managed Care Systems Inc., 195 F.3d 584, 595 (10th Cir. 1999) ("[B]y 1995, when the alleged conduct occurred, six circuits had considered the issue; all of them definitively held that probable cause is required for civil seizures of persons premised on self-protection or protection of the public; the earliest of those decisions dates back to 1971 . . . The weight of authority was strong enough in light of the well-established principles of Fourth Amendment jurisprudence, to find the right was 'clearly established.' Furthermore, when considered in terms of whether a reasonable official would know what he is doing violates a right, it seems incredible to suggest that officers, well aware of the restrictions on their ability to deprive persons of liberty without probable cause, would not know that detaining for 'potential' intoxication infringes a constitutional right.").

Guffey v. Wyatt, 18 F.3d 869, 872 (10th Cir. 1994) ("While defendant contends that state decisional law is relevant to the qualified immunity inquiry, the role of state law remains unsettled. . . . [W]e note because state courts seldom examine federal constitutional claims, few federal courts have found state decisional law to be dispositive. . . . Accordingly, in the face of Supreme Court precedent articulating substantive constitutional rights, the defendant's claim these two Oklahoma cases somehow obscured otherwise clearly established law is simply not persuasive.").

Medina v. City and County of Denver, 960 F.2d 1493, 1498 (10th Cir. 1992) ("In determining whether the law was clearly established, we bear in mind that allegations of constitutional violations that require courts to balance competing interests may make it more difficult to find the law 'clearly established' when assessing claims of qualified immunity ....Ordinarily, in order for the law to be clearly established, there must be a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point, or the clearly established weight of authority from other courts must have found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains. Our analysis leads us to conclude that it was not clearly established in 1986 (1) that recklessness could give rise to liability under section 1983 or (2) that a police officer could be liable under section 1983 for an injury caused not by the officer but by a suspect being chased by the officer.").

Patrick v. Miller, 953 F.2d 1240, 1249 (10th Cir. 1992) ("The law may be found to be clearly established by reference to decisions from other circuits....We consider the law to be 'clearly established' when it is well developed enough to inform the reasonable official that his conduct violates that law.").

Compare Wood v. Ostrander, 879 F.2d 583 (9th Cir. 1989), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 938 (1990) (relied on analogous precedent in Seventh Circuit, White v. Rochford, 592 F.2d 381 (7th Cir. 1979), to find right clearly established) and Hilliard v. City and County of Denver, 930 F.2d 1516 (10th Cir. 1991), cert. denied, 112 S. Ct. 656 (1991) (two cases from other circuits did not "clearly establish" that personal security guarantee was viable in noncustodial setting).

Conner v. Rodriguez, 891 F.Supp.2d 1228, 1238, 1239 & n.9 (D.N.M. 2011) ("After evaluating the Henry and Torres cases, the Court acknowledges that the Fourth and Ninth Circuits have concluded that conduct similar to Defendant's could potentially violate the Fourth Amendment. However, these two circuit decisions do not suffice to clearly establish that Defendant's conduct violated Plaintiff's Fourth Amendment rights. . . As an additional, and purely factual matter, the Court notes that the mistake made by Defendant and those of the officers in Purnell and Torres are not entirely equivalent. Tasers and pistols, as the circuit courts observed, have significant shape, feel, and operational differences; Defendant's two shotguns were the same model of Remington shotguns, and functioned in the exact same way. In the other two cases, neither situation was particularly high-stress or dangerous, while Defendant was involved in a high-speed chase with a felon who had already been shot by police, had assaulted police officers with his vehicle, and was known to be armed and to have a mental imbalance. Thus even if the Fourth and Ninth Circuit cases applied strictly as precedent, Defendant would still likely be owed qualified immunity, because an application of the legal tests used by those two circuits, the facts in this case likely would come out the other way. . . . These two cases do not suffice to show that 'the clearly established weight of authority from other courts' agrees with them. . . Instead, if there is any weight of authority, it appears still to lean in the opposite direction: that unintentional negligent conduct cannot establish a Fourth Amendment claim. The Court finds this result amenable to the purposes of qualified immunity. In light of the public interest of having officials who are free to vigorously carry out their duties without the need to look over their shoulders at the looming specter of personal liability, an official should be shielded from the imposition of personal liability for an honest, yet sloppy and negligent mistake made during the course of a tense and highly stressful police confrontation. . . . Because the law was not clearly established at the time of the events in question that unintentionally but negligently discharging a lethal shotgun instead of a less-lethal shotgun violated Plaintiff's rights, Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity.") Prison Legal News v. Simmons, No. Civ.A. 02-4054-MLB, Civ.A. 00-3370-MLB, Civ.A. 01-3017-MLB, 2005 WL 3118043, at 7-9 (D. Kan. Nov. 22, 2005) ("[T]he question of whether a right is clearly established in the Tenth Circuit in an interesting one. All the Tenth Circuit cases to address this question in the last decade agree that the law is clearly established when there is a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit case on point. . . By contrast, there has been a change in the language used to describe the standard to be applied when neither a Supreme Court case nor a Tenth Circuit case addresses the matter. The original standard was first articulated in Medina v. City and County of Denver, 960 F.2d 1493 (10th Cir.1992), where the court said, > Ordinarily, in order for the law to be clearly established, there must be a Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit decision on point, or the clearly established weight of authority from other courts must have found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.

. . . In the years following Medina, this statement was frequently quoted as the proper standard to apply when determining whether a right was clearly established. . . Then, in Murrell v. School District No. 1, Denver, Colo., 186 F.3d 1238 (10th Cir.1999), the circuit purported to quote the operative language from Medina; however, there was an apparent misquote, and the language in the standard was changed to read,

> In order for the law to be clearly established, 'there must be a Supreme Court or other Tenth Circuit decision on point, or the clearly established weight of authority from other circuits must have found the law to be as the plaintiff maintains.' [citing Medina]

. . . Read literally, the emphasized language shrinks the scope of the 'clearly established' inquiry from looking at the weight of authority from 'other courts' to looking only at the weight of authority from 'other circuits.' Since Murrell was issued, subsequent opinions from the Tenth Circuit have been inconsistent in the language used. Some opinions use the language from Murrell. . . Conversely, other Tenth Circuit opinions have continued to use the language from Medina. . . Analysis of the post-Murrell cases that used the Medina 'other courts' language shows that they not only quoted the broader language, but applied it as well. . . . Taken collectively, the court concludes that the Tenth Circuit never intended Murrell to change the standard for determining when a right is clearly established in the absence of controlling Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit authority. Given that Murrell purported to quote Medina, but inserted an error into the quote, along with the fact that Murrell never discussed changing the Medina standard, the court finds that the misquote was merely a scrivener's error. This conclusion is bolstered by the fact that subsequent cases from our circuit occasionally look beyond other circuit courts when evaluating whether a right was clearly established. That conclusion notwithstanding, the fact that this error has not been discussed in a reported case from the Tenth Circuit suggests that the error may not be very significant. In other words, although the circuit may be willing to consider cases from courts beyond the federal appellate courts, the focus should normally be on cases decided by other circuits. Thus, a district court may consider any source of judicial precedent, state or federal, when making the clearly established inquiry in the absence of controlling authority; however, as a practical matter, it will require far fewer circuit court cases to make a right clearly established than it will district court or even state court cases. Moreover, this approach is only sensible in light of the controlling inquiry in all qualified immunity cases–'whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer [in the defendant's position] that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . The court finds that it is not reasonable to expect police officers and prison guards to stay abreast of the latest opinions out of federal district courts and state courts outside of their own jurisdiction. While a growing multitude of rulings from these lower courts might ultimately suffice to clearly establish a right not passed upon by the circuit courts, this would be a rarity. Even one or two cases from other circuits should not normally be sufficient to make a right 'clearly established' for qualified immunity purposes unless the right is so patently obvious that the only reason it has not been recognized by more federal appellate courts is because it has never been litigated.")

ELEVENTH CIRCUIT

Benjamin v. City of Miami, 727 F. App'x 635, ___ (11th Cir. 2018) ("Federal courts may rely on a state court decision to decide whether a plaintiff has demonstrated a violation of his clearly established rights. . . But for this reliance to be proper, the state court decision must pertain to a violation of federal law. . . Since Haliburton's due process holding was expressly confined to state law, it cannot clearly establish a federal due process right.")

Rachel v. City of Mobile, Ala., 112 F. Supp. 3d 1263, 1281-83 (S.D. Ala. 2015), aff'd sub nom. Rachel v. McCann, 633 F. App'x 784 (11th Cir. 2016) (affirming denial of qualified immunity as to claim that officers repeatedly kicked and beat Rachel while he lay prone and non-resisting on ground) ("The plaintiff asserts that McCann and Jackson 'provoked a violent situation' by needlessly approaching a person known to be emotionally disturbed, 'essentially precipitating the violence instead of heading it off.'. . The Court need not consider whether such conduct would reflect a constitutional violation, because the plaintiff has failed to show it was clearly established before May 2012 that such conduct would violate Greg's constitutional rights. The plaintiff does not suggest that the very language of the Fourth Amendment clearly establishes that provoking a confrontation with an emotionally disturbed felon is unconstitutional. Instead, she asks the Court to look to Ninth Circuit precedent indicating that such conduct can be unconstitutional. . . 'Our Court looks only to binding precedent—cases from the United States Supreme Court, the Eleventh Circuit, and the highest court of the state under which the claim arose—to determine whether the right in question was clearly established at the time of the violation.'. . .The plaintiff also discusses several Eleventh Circuit cases discussing the use of excessive force in effecting an arrest, . . . but none of them speak to the constitutionality of the antecedent act of approaching the suspect or 'provoking' a confrontation. . . Finally, the plaintiff repairs to Hope v. Pelzer, . . . which she believes stands for the proposition that 'fair warning could come from ... non-decisional authority,' such that, '[w]here an officer, by training and by internal policy, is advised as [to] the potential danger of a particular type of excessive force, they are on notice that their conduct violates clearly established law.'. . . It is true that the Hope Court stated that, 'in light of binding Eleventh Circuit precedent, an Alabama Department of Corrections (ADOC) regulation, and a DOJ report informing the ADOC of the constitutional infirmity in its use of the hitching post, we readily conclude that the respondents' conduct violated' the petitioner's clearly established constitutional rights. . . But the Supreme Court did not say or suggest that a plaintiff can meet her burden of demonstrating the existence of a clearly established constitutional right by relying on 'non-decisional authority.'. . .In short, the Hope Court's discussion of non-decisional authority does not support the proposition that such authority can carry a plaintiff's burden of showing the violation of a clearly established constitutional right in the absence of any decisional authority doing so. Certainly nothing in Hope can be construed as overriding the Eleventh Circuit rule that constitutional rights can be clearly established only by binding precedent, . . . or by the very words of a statute or constitutional provision. . . Within the past few days, the Supreme Court has plainly torpedoed the plaintiff's argument. The plaintiff in City and County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, —— U.S. ——, 135 S.Ct. 1765, 191 L.Ed.2d 856 (2015), supported her Fourth Amendment claim with expert testimony that the defendant law enforcement officers 'fell short of their training by not using practices designed to minimize the risk of violence when dealing with the mentally ill.'. . The Court canvassed the case law and concluded that 'the officers' failure to accommodate [the plaintiff's] illness [did not] violat[e] clearly established law.'. . The Court then rejected the plaintiff's reliance on her expert's opinion: 'Even if an officer acts contrary to her training, however, ... that does not itself negate qualified immunity where it would otherwise be warranted.'. . There thus can be no doubt that training and policy cannot substitute for appropriate judicial precedent in the 'clearly established' analysis. In summary, McCann and Jackson are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to any claim of excessive force based on provocation.")

Williams v. Hudson, 602 F. App'x 769, 772-73 (11th Cir. 2015) ("In the light most favorable to Mrs. Williams, the evidence fails to show that the Officers violated a clearly established constitutional right of Mrs. Williams. In Coffin v. Brandau, we determined that entry into an open garage can constitute a search under the Fourth Amendment under certain circumstances. . . We also determined that, prior to the date Coffin was decided, this right was not clearly established. . . The incident in this case occurred prior to our decision in Coffin. However, clearly established law may differ from state to state. . . Coffin involved an incident in Florida. This case involves an incident in Georgia. Thus, we are bound by our determination in Coffin that this right was not clearly established in 2010 under Eleventh Circuit law or United States Supreme Court law, but we must determine whether this right was clearly established under Georgia Supreme Court law. Mrs. Williams only cites one Georgia Supreme Court case on this issue. See Landers v. State, 250 Ga. 808 (Ga.1983). The question in Landers was whether a warrant for the search of a dwelling allowed for the search of a vehicle on a neighboring lot. . . The case does not address the issue before us, and Mrs. Williams has failed to demonstrate that the Officers violated a clearly established constitutional right. The district court properly concluded that the Officers were entitled to qualified immunity on the illegal search claim.")

Trammell v. Thomason, 335 F. App'x 835, 2009 WL 1706591, at *5-*7 & n.7 (11th Cir June 18, 2009) ("Trammell argues that he is not required to point to 'materially similar' case law from this circuit after the Supreme Court's decision in Hope, 536 U.S. at 739. We cannot agree. Hope states that a plaintiff need not point to a prior case holding that the exact conduct in question was impermissible. It is silent in regard to the issue of whether case law from another circuit alone may be sufficient to put an officer on notice of the impermissibility of his conduct. Accordingly, we remain bound by our circuit law on this issue. . . . While there was case law in July of 2003 from the Fourth Circuit finding a constitutional violation where a police dog similarly trained was released without an adequate warning, . . . we have found no case from our Court, the Supreme Court of the United States, or the Supreme Court of Florida which so holds. . . . We are unpersuaded that Dorough's conduct lies so far beyond the border of permissive and excessive conduct that every reasonable officer in Dorough's position would have concluded that his behavior was unlawful. Accordingly, we will affirm the District Court's determination that Dorough is entitled to qualified immunity for his conduct in allegedly releasing Yacco without a warning.").

Grayden v. Rhodes, 345 F.3d 1225, 1251 n.4 (11th Cir. 2003) (Birch, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) ("It is true that thus far we look only to our own precedent and the decisions of the United States Supreme Court and the supreme court of the relevant state in this Circuit to determine whether law is clearly established. . . Language in a number of fairly recent Supreme Court opinions, however, has signaled a different approach. [citing Hope, Wilson, Lanier, Elder, Anderson] Under 'current American law,' the rule in Memphis Light is unmistakable. Sister courts have held that those summarily evicted through condemnation procedures are entitled to contemporaneous notice of their right to appeal.").

Cagle v. Sutherland, 334 F.3d 980, 989, 990 n.15 (11th Cir. 2003) (per curiam) ("Because we presume that Jailer Cole was aware of Butler's suicide threats, we must look to see whether Jailer Cole's acts were deliberately indifferent to this risk. We conclude that–under the facts of this case– Jailer Cole's allowing one hour and forty minutes to elapse between jail checks was not deliberately indifferent. [The consent decree] required the jailor to check the cells every hour. But [consent decree] did not establish a constitutional right to hourly jail checks, and [decree] was not focused on preventing suicide. . . . Even if Jailer Cole had violated the Constitution, he likely would be entitled to qualified immunity, having violated no clearly established constitutional rights. We are not aware of any of our cases or any case from the United States or Alabama Supreme Courts that would have put Jailer Cole on notice that his acts, given the circumstances, were clearly unconstitutional. [Consent decree] does not do the job; a consent decree like Praytor cannot establish constitutional rights, and obviously it cannot clearly establish constitutional rights. A precedent with materially similar facts is not always required; but for a federal right to be clearly established, the applicable law 'Amust be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right."' . . . Here, if Jailer Cole examined the precedents he could reasonably conclude that his conduct–monitoring via TV cameras (and visiting the cell, at least once, during each hour of the night) an inmate who had been stripped of his belt, shoelaces and so on and confined in a stripped cell–was reasonable and was not nearly deliberately indifferent.").

Vinyard v. Wilson, 311 F.3d 1340, 1348 & n.11 (11th Cir. 2002) ("While the parties do not cite and we have not located Supreme Court, Eleventh Circuit, or Georgia Supreme Court decisions regarding pepper spray use in the course of an arrest, other courts have addressed its use. Courts have consistently concluded that using pepper spray is excessive force in cases where the crime is a minor infraction, the arrestee surrenders, is secured, and is not acting violently, and there is no threat to the officers or anyone else. . . . Although we cite and examine other circuits' and district courts' decisions under the first prong of Saucier, we point out that these decisions are immaterial to whether the law was 'clearly established' in this circuit for the second prong of Saucier.").

Marsh v. Butler County, 268 F.3d 1014, 1033 n.10 (11th Cir. 2001) (en banc) ("When case law is needed to 'clearly establish' the law applicable to the pertinent circumstances, we look to decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court, the United States Court of Appeals for the Eleventh Circuit, and the highest court of the pertinent state. . . We do not understand Wilson v. Layne, . . . to have held that a 'consensus of cases of persuasive authority' from other courts would be able to establish the law clearly. . . Each jurisdiction has its own body of law, and splits between jurisdictions on matters of law are not uncommon. We do not expect public officials to sort out the law of every jurisdiction in the country.")

Gonzalez v. Lee County Housing Authority, 161 F.3d 1290, 1301-03 (11th Cir. 1998) ("Ordinarily, a plaintiff who seeks to overcome a state official's affirmative defense of qualified immunity must cite case law, in force at the time of the defendant's actions, that would have made it absolutely clear that the defendant's conduct violated federal law. There is no case from the U.S. Supreme Court, this Circuit, or the relevant state Supreme Court, that would have established that a person violates section 3617 by firing an employee for refusing to discriminate against potential tenants on the basis of race. . . . The absence of such a case is not fatal to Gonzalez's claim, however, because this case differs from the typical qualified immunity case in which the plaintiff sues a public official pursuant to 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and asserts the violation of some (often generally worded) constitutional right. Although the assertion of such broadly conceived rights, without the benefit of sufficiently illuminating case law, may fail to overcome the hurdle of qualified immunity, . . . we have acknowledged the possibility that some federal statutory provisions will be sufficiently clear on their own to provide defendants with fair notice of their obligations under the law. . . . Section 3617 provides just such an explicit statement of what the Fair Housing Act demanded of the defendant in this case. Section 3617 renders it unlawful to 'interfere with any person ... on account of his having aided or encouraged any other person in the exercise or enjoyment of ... any right granted or protected by section 3603, 3604, 3605, or 3606 of this title.' Section 3604, in turn, bars racial discrimination in the 'terms, conditions, or privileges of sale or rental of a dwelling, or in the provision of services or facilities in connection therewith....' 42 U.S.C. § 3604(b). Section 3617, read in conjunction with section 3604, therefore, straightforwardly states the unsurprising (and presumably uncontroversial) proposition that the Fair Housing Act prohibits 'interfering' with any person because she 'aided or encouraged' another person's exercise of her right to rent property free from racial discrimination. Any reasonable public official, having read the plain terms of this statute, certainly would have understood that federal law makes it unlawful to terminate an employee for refusing to discriminate against potential tenants on the basis of race. To the extent any federal statute, standing alone, can provide a potential defendant with concrete notice, 'that is, truly compel (not just suggest or allow or raise a question about), the conclusion for every like-situated, reasonable government agent that what [she] is doing violates federal law,' we believe that section 3617 provides such notice in the circumstances of this case. . . . Alternatively, even if a public official credibly could argue that the language of the statute provided insufficient notice, its implementing federal regulation, adopted in 1989, removes all doubt about whether federal law makes it illegal to fire an employee for refusing to discriminate on the basis of race. . . . A public official forfeits qualified immunity by violating the clear command of a federal regulation that, like section 100.400(c)(3), reinforces a statute and thus helps to provide the basis for a cause of action.").

Hamilton v. Cannon, 80 F.3d 1525, 1532 & n.7 (11th Cir. 1996) ("It would take much creativity and imagination to glean from the factually distinguishable cases upon which the plaintiffs rely a clearly established rule of law that an unsuccessful, negligent, or reckless rescue attempt, or interference with a bystander's rescue attempt, amounts to a constitutional violation. We decline to exercise such creativity and imagination, because qualified immunity doctrine prohibits it. . . . The case that most strongly lends support to plaintiffs' position is the Seventh Circuit decision in Ross v. United States. . . . However, even if Ross were indistinguishable, Seventh Circuit decisions can not clearly establish the law for purposes of qualified immunity in this circuit.").

Kelly v. Curtis, 21 F.3d 1544, 1551 n.6 (11th Cir. 1994) ("By distinguishing these two out-of-circuit decisions that [plaintiff] has cited, we do not mean to imply that the law can be clearly established for qualified immunity purposes by non-binding precedent. See Hansen v. Soldenwagner, 19 F.3d 573, 578 n. 6 (11th Cir.1994) ("[T]he case law of one other circuit cannot settle the law in this circuit to the point of it being 'clearly established.'"). Even if out-of-circuit decisions could clearly establish the law in this Circuit, a distinguishable, non-binding case does not clearly establish anything.").

Hansen v. Soldenwagner, 19 F.3d 573, 576 (11th Cir. 1994) ("Because Pickering requires a balancing of competing interests on a case-by-case basis, our decisions tilt strongly in favor of immunity by recognizing that only in the rarest of cases will reasonable government officials truly know that the termination or discipline of a public employee violated 'clearly established' federal rights.").

Fortner v. Thomas, 983 F.2d 1024, 1028 (11th Cir. 1993) ("The nonexistence of a decision specifically addressing the alleged right is a significant consideration in determining whether the right is clearly established . . . . In addition the existence of Supreme Court cases or cases in this circuit that recognize the alleged right is particularly important in determining whether the law is sufficiently clear to a reasonable official.").

Courson v. McMillian, 939 F.2d 1479, 1498 n.32 (11th Cir. 1991) ("[C]learly established law in this circuit may include court decisions of the highest state court in the states that comprise this circuit as to those respective states, when the state supreme court has addressed a federal constitutional issue that has not been addressed by the United States Supreme Court or the Eleventh Circuit.").

B. Defining the Contours of the Right

U.S. SUPREME COURT

Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1152-54 (2018) (per curiam) ("Here, the Court need not, and does not, decide whether Kisela violated the Fourth Amendment when he used deadly force against Hughes. For even assuming a Fourth Amendment violation occurred—a proposition that is not at all evident—on these facts Kisela was at least entitled to qualified immunity. . . .Where constitutional guidelines seem inapplicable or too remote, it does not suffice for a court simply to state that an officer may not use unreasonable and excessive force, deny qualified immunity, and then remitthe case for a trial on the question of reasonableness. An officer 'cannot be said to have violated a clearly established right unless the right's contours were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating it.' [citing Plumhoff] That is a necessary part of the qualified-immunity standard, and it is a part of the standard that the Court of Appeals here failed to implement in a correct way. Kisela says he shot Hughes because, although the officers themselves were in no apparent danger, he believed she was a threat to Chadwick. Kisela had mere seconds to assess the potential danger to Chadwick. He was confronted with a woman who had just been seen hacking a tree with a large kitchen knife and whose behavior was erratic enough to cause a concerned bystander to call 911 and then flag down Kisela and Garcia. Kisela was separated from Hughes and Chadwick by a chain-link fence; Hughes had moved to within a few feet of Chadwick; and she failed to acknowledge at least two commands to drop the knife. Those commands were loud enough that Chadwick, who was standing next to Hughes, heard them. This is far from an obvious case in which any competent officer would have known that shooting Hughes to protect Chadwick would violate the Fourth Amendment. . . . [N]ot one of the decisions relied on by the Court of Appeals—Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272 (C.A.9 2001), Glenn v. Washington County, 673 F.3d 864

Kisela v. Hughes, 138 S. Ct. 1148, 1155, 1158-62 (2018) (per curiam) (Sotomayor, J., joined by Ginsburg, J., dissenting) ("Officer Andrew Kisela shot Amy Hughes while she was speaking with her roommate, Sharon Chadwick, outside of their home. The record, properly construed at this stage, shows that at the time of the shooting: Hughes stood stationary about six feet away from Chadwick, appeared 'composed and content,' . . . and held a kitchen knife down at her side with the blade facing away from Chadwick. Hughes was nowhere near the officers, had committed no illegal act, was suspected of no crime, and did not raise the knife in the direction of Chadwick or anyone else. Faced with these facts, the two other responding officers held their fire, and one testified that he 'wanted to continue trying verbal command[s] and see if that would work.'. . But not Kisela. He thought it necessary to use deadly force, and so, without giving a warning that he would open fire, he shot Hughes four times, leaving her seriously injured. If this account of Kisela's conduct sounds unreasonable, that is because it was. And yet, the Court today insulates that conduct from liability under the doctrine of qualified immunity, holding that Kisela violated no 'clearly established' law. . . I disagree. Viewing the facts in the light most favorable to Hughes, as the Court must at summary judgment, a jury could find that Kisela violated Hughes' clearly established Fourth Amendment rights by needlessly resorting to lethal force. In holding otherwise, the Court misapprehends the facts and misapplies the law, effectively treating qualified immunity as an absolute shield. I therefore respectfully dissent. . . .Rather than defend the reasonableness of Kisela's conduct, the majority sidesteps the inquiry altogether and focuses instead on the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified-immunity analysis. . . To be ' "clearly established" ... [t]he contours of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.'. . That standard is not nearly as onerous as the majority makes it out to be. As even the majority must acknowledge, . . . this Court has long rejected the notion that 'an official action is protected by qualified immunity unless the very action in question has previously been held unlawful[.]'. . '[O]fficials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances.'. . At its core, then, the 'clearly established' inquiry boils down to whether Kisela had 'fair notice' that he acted unconstitutionally. . .The answer to that question is yes. This Court's precedents make clear that a police officer may only deploy deadly force against an individual if the officer 'has probable cause to believe that the [person] poses a threat of serious physical harm, either to the officer or to others.'. . It is equally well established that any use of lethal force must be justified by some legitimate governmental interest. . . Consistent with those clearly established principles, and contrary to the majority's conclusion, Ninth Circuit precedent predating these events further confirms that Kisela's conduct was clearly unreasonable. . . Because Kisela plainly lacked any legitimate interest justifying the use of deadly force against a woman who posed no objective threat of harm to officers or others, had committed no crime, and appeared calm and collected during the police encounter, he was not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . [T]he majority asserts that Hughes was 'within striking distance' of Chadwick, . . but that stretches the facts and contravenes this Court's repeated admonition that inferences must be drawn in the exact opposite direction, i.e., in favor of Hughes.

[citing Tolan] The facts, properly viewed, show that, when she was shot, Hughes had stopped and stood still about six feet away from Chadwick. Whether Hughes could 'strik[e]' Chadwick from that particular distance, even though the kitchen knife was held down at her side, is an inference that should be drawn by the jury, not this Court. . . . Both Curnow and Harris establish that, where, as here, an individual with a weapon poses no objective and immediate threat to officers or third parties, law enforcement cannot resort to excessive force. . . . If all that were not enough, decisions from several other Circuits illustrate that the Fourth Amendment clearly forbids the use of deadly force against a person who is merely holding a knife but not threatening anyone with it. [collecting cases] In sum, precedent existing at the time of the shooting clearly established the unconstitutionality of Kisela's conduct. The majority's decision, no matter how much it says otherwise, ultimately rests on a faulty premise: that those cases are not identical to this one. But that is not the law, for our cases have never required a factually identical case to satisfy the 'clearly established' standard. . . It is enough that governing law places 'the constitutionality of the officer's conduct beyond debate.'. . Because, taking the facts in the light most favorable to Hughes, it is 'beyond debate' that Kisela's use of deadly force was objectively unreasonable, he was not entitled to summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity. . . .For the foregoing reasons, it is clear to me that the Court of Appeals got it right. But even if that result were not so clear, I cannot agree with the majority's apparent view that the decision below was so manifestly incorrect as to warrant 'the extraordinary remedy of a summary reversal.'. . . The relevant facts are hotly disputed, and the qualified-immunity question here is, at the very best, a close call. Rather than letting this case go to a jury, the Court decides to intervene prematurely, purporting to correct an error that is not at all clear. This unwarranted summary reversal is symptomatic of 'a disturbing trend regarding the use of this Court's resources' in qualified-immunity cases. . . As I have previously noted, this Court routinely displays an unflinching willingness 'to summarily reverse courts for wrongly denying officers the protection of qualified immunity' but 'rarely intervene[s] where courts wrongly afford officers the benefit of qualified immunity in these same cases.'. . see also Baude, Is Qualified Immunity Unlawful? 106 Cal. L. Rev. 45, 82 (2018) ("[N]early all of the Supreme Court's qualified immunity cases come out the same way—by finding immunity for the officials"); Reinhardt, The Demise of Habeas Corpus and the Rise of Qualified Immunity: The Court's Ever Increasing Limitations on the Development and Enforcement of Constitutional Rights and Some Particularly Unfortunate Consequences, 113 Mich. L.Rev. 1219, 1244–1250 (2015). Such a one-sided approach to qualified immunity transforms the doctrine into an absolute shield for law enforcement officers, gutting the deterrent effect of the Fourth Amendment. The majority today exacerbates that troubling asymmetry. Its decision is not just wrong on the law; it also sends an alarming signal to law enforcement officers and the public. It tells officers that they can shoot first and think later, and it tells the public that palpably unreasonable conduct will go unpunished. Because there is nothing right or just under the law about this, I respectfully dissent.")

District of Columbia v. Wesby, 138 S. Ct. 577, 589-91 & n.7 (2018) ("Our conclusion that the officers had probable cause to arrest the partygoers is sufficient to resolve this case. But where, as here, the Court of Appeals erred on both the merits of the constitutional claim and the question of qualified immunity, 'we have discretion to correct its errors at each step.'. . We exercise that discretion here because the D. C. Circuit's analysis, if followed elsewhere, would 'undermine the values qualified immunity seeks to promote.'. . .We continue to stress that lower courts 'should think hard, and then think hard again,' before addressing both qualified immunity and the merits of an underlying constitutional claim. . . We addressed the merits of probable cause here, however, because a decision on qualified immunity alone would not have resolved all of the claims in this case. . . . The 'clearly established' standard also requires that the legal principle clearly prohibit the officer's conduct in the particular circumstances before him. The rule's contours must be so well defined that it is 'clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.' Saucier v. Katz, 533 U. S. 194, 202 (2001). This requires a high 'degree of specificity.' [citing Mullenix] We have repeatedly stressed that courts must not 'define clearly established law at a high level of generality, since doing so avoids the crucial question whether the official acted reasonably in the particular circumstances that he or she faced.' [citing Plumhoff] A rule is too general if the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct 'does not follow immediately from the conclusion that [the rule] was firmly established.' [citing Anderson] In the context of a warrantless arrest, the rule must obviously resolve "whether 'the circumstances with which [the particular officer] was confronted . . . constitute[d] probable cause.'". . We have stressed that the 'specificity' of the rule is 'especially important in the Fourth Amendment context.' [citing Mullenix] Probable cause 'turn[s] on the assessment of probabilities in particular factual contexts' and cannot be 'reduced to a neat set of legal rules.'. . . Given its imprecise nature, officers will often find it difficult to know how the general standard of probable cause applies in 'the precise situation encountered.' [citing Ziglar] Thus, we have stressed the need to 'identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances . . . was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment.' [citing Pauly] While there does not have to be 'a case directly on point,' existing precedent must place the lawfulness of the particular arrest 'beyond debate.' [citing al-Kidd] Of course, there can be the rare 'obvious case,' where the unlawfulness of the officer's conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances. [citing Brosseau] But 'a body of relevant case law' is usually necessary to ' 'clearly establish' the answer' with respect to probable cause. . .Under these principles, we readily conclude that the officers here were entitled to qualified immunity. . . . The officers found a group of people in a house that the neighbors had identified as vacant, that appeared to be vacant, and that the partygoers were treating as vacant. The group scattered, and some hid, at the sight of law enforcement. Their explanations for being at the house were full of holes. The source of their claimed invitation admitted that she had no right to be in the house, and the owner confirmed that fact. Even assuming the officers lacked actual probable cause to arrest the partygoers, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity because they 'reasonably but mistakenly conclude[d] that probable cause [wa]s present.'. . Tellingly, neither the panel majority nor the partygoers have identified a single precedent--much less a controlling case or robust consensus of cases--finding a Fourth Amendment violation 'under similar circumstances.'. . And it should go without saying that this is not an 'obvious case' where 'a body of relevant case law' is not needed. . . The officers were thus entitled to qualified immunity.") claim, the en banc Court of Appeals found it unnecessary to address the Bivens question because it held that Mesa was entitled to qualified immunity. In reaching that conclusion, the en banc Court of Appeals relied on the fact that Hernández was 'an alien who had no significant voluntary connection to ... the United States.'. . It is undisputed, however, that Hernández's nationality and the extent of his ties to the United States were unknown to Mesa at the time of the shooting. The en banc Court of Appeals therefore erred in granting qualified immunity based on those facts. . . 'The doctrine of qualified immunity shields officials from civil liability so long as their conduct "does not violate clearly established ... constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known."'. . The 'dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.'. . The qualified immunity analysis thus is limited to 'the facts that were knowable to the defendant officers' at the time they engaged in the conduct in question. White v. Pauly, 580 U.S. ——, ——, 137 S.Ct. 548, 550, 196 L.Ed.2d 463 (2017) (per curiam). Facts an officer learns after the incident ends—whether those facts would support granting immunity or denying it—are not relevant. Mesa and the Government contend that Mesa is entitled to qualified immunity even if Mesa was uncertain about Hernández's nationality and his ties to the United States at the time of the shooting. The Government also argues that, in any event, petitioners' claim is cognizable only under the Fourth Amendment, and not under the Fifth Amendment. This Court declines to address these arguments in the first instance. The Court of Appeals may address them, if necessary, on remand.") Ziglar v. Abbasi, 137 S. Ct. 1843, 1868-69 (2017) ("To be sure, this Court has not given its approval to [the intracorporate-conspiracy] doctrine in the specific context of § 1985(3). . . There is a division in the courts of appeals, moreover, respecting the validity or correctness of the intracorporate-conspiracy doctrine with reference to § 1985 conspiracies. . . Nothing in this opinion should be interpreted as either approving or disapproving the intracorporate-conspiracy doctrine's application in the context of an alleged § 1985(3) violation. The Court might determine, in some later case, that different considerations apply to a conspiracy respecting equal protection guarantees, as distinct from a conspiracy in the antitrust context. Yet the fact that the courts are divided as to whether or not a § 1985(3) conspiracy can arise from official discussions between or among agents of the same entity demonstrates that the law on the point is not well established. When the courts are divided on an issue so central to the cause of action alleged, a reasonable official lacks the notice required before imposing liability. See Wilson v. Layne, 526 U.S. 603, 618, 119 S.Ct. 1692, 143 L.Ed.2d 818 (1999) (noting that it would be "unfair" to subject officers to damages liability when even "judges ... disagree"); Reichle v. Howards, 566 U.S. 658, 669–670, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012) (same). In addition to the concern that agents of the same legal entity are not distinct enough to conspire with one another, there are other sound reasons to conclude that conversations and agreements between and among federal officials in the same Department should not be the subject of a private cause of action for damages under § 1985(3). . . .These considerations suggest that officials employed by the same governmental department do not conspire when they speak to one another and work together in their official capacities. Whether that contention should prevail need not be decided here. It suffices to say that the question is sufficiently open so that the officials in this suit could not be certain that § 1985(3) was applicable to their discussions and actions. Thus, the law respondents seek to invoke cannot be clearly established. It follows that reasonable officers in petitioners' positions would not have known with any certainty that the alleged agreements were forbidden by law. . . Petitioners are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the claims under 42 U.S.C. § 1985(3).")

White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 551-53 (2017) (per curiam) ("Officer White did not violate clearly established law on the record described by the Court of Appeals panel. . . . In the last five years, this Court has issued a number of opinions reversing federal courts in qualified immunity cases. See, e.g., City and County of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 575 U. S. ___, ___, n. 3 (2015) (slip op., at 10, n.3) (collecting cases). The Court has found this necessary both because qualified immunity is important to '"society as a whole,"'. . . and because as '"an immunity from suit,"' qualified immunity '"is effectively lost if a case is erroneously permitted to go to trial,"' Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U. S. 223, 231 (2009). Today, it is again necessary to reiterate the longstanding principle that 'clearly established law' should not be defined 'at a high level of generality.' Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U. S. 731, 742 (2011). As this Court explained decades ago, the clearly established law must be 'particularized' to the facts of the case. . . Otherwise, '[p]laintiffs would be able to convert the rule of qualified immunity . . . into a rule of virtually unqualified liability simply by alleging violation of extremely abstract rights.'. . The panel majority misunderstood the 'clearly established' analysis: It failed to identify a case where an officer acting under similar circumstances as Officer White was held to have violated the Fourth Amendment. Instead, the majority relied on Graham, Garner, and their Court of Appeals progeny, which—as noted above—lay out excessive-force principles at only a general level. Of course, 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning' to officers, United States v. Lanier, 520 U. S. 259, 271 (1997), but 'in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent,' Anderson v. Creighton, supra, at 640. For that reason, we have held that Garner and Graham do not by themselves create clearly established law outside 'an obvious case.' Brosseau v. Haugen, 543 U. S. 194, 199 (2004) (per curiam); see also Plumhoff v. Rickard, 572 U. S. ___, ___ (2014) (slip op., at 13) (emphasizing that Garner and Graham 'are "cast at a high level of generality"'). This is not a case where it is obvious that there was a violation of clearly established law under Garner and Graham. Of note, the majority did not conclude that White's conduct—such as his failure to shout a warning—constituted a run-of-the-mill Fourth Amendment violation. Indeed, it recognized that 'this case presents a unique set of facts and circumstances' in light of White's late arrival on the scene. . . This alone should have been an important indication to the majority that White's conduct did not violate a 'clearly established' right. Clearly established federal law does not prohibit a reasonable officer who arrives late to an ongoing police action in circumstances like this from assuming that proper procedures, such as officer identification, have already been followed. No settled Fourth Amendment principle requires that officer to second-guess the earlier steps already taken by his or her fellow officers in instances like the one White confronted here. On the record described by the Court of Appeals, Officer White did not violate clearly established law. The Court notes, however, that respondents contend Officer White arrived on the scene only two minutes after Officers Truesdale and Mariscal and more than three minutes before Daniel's shots were fired. On the assumption that the conduct of Officers Truesdale and Mariscal did not adequately alert the Paulys that they were police officers, respondents suggest that a reasonable jury could infer that White witnessed the other officers' deficient performance and should have realized that corrective action was necessary before using deadly force. . . This Court expresses no position on this potential alternative ground for affirmance, as it appears that neither the District Court nor the Court of Appeals panel addressed it. The Court also expresses no opinion on the question whether this ground was properly preserved or whether—in light of this Court's holding today—Officers Truesdale and Mariscal are entitled to qualified immunity. For the foregoing reasons, the petition for certiorari is granted; the judgment of the Court of Appeals is vacated; and the case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. It is so ordered.")

White v. Pauly, 137 S. Ct. 548, 553 (per curiam) (2017) (Ginsburg, J., concurring) ("I join the Court's opinion on the understanding that it does not foreclose the denial of summary judgment to Officers Truesdale and Mariscal. See 814 F. 3d 1060, 1068, 1073, 1074 (CA10 2016) (Court of Appeals emphasized, repeatedly, that fact disputes exist on question whether Truesdale and Mariscal 'adequately identified themselves' as police officers before shouting 'Come out or we're coming in' (internal quotation marks omitted)). Further, as to Officer White, the Court, as I comprehend its opinion, leaves open the propriety of denying summary judgment based on fact disputes over when Officer White arrived at the scene, what he may have witnessed, and whether he had adequate time to identify himself and order Samuel Pauly to drop his weapon before Officer White shot Pauly.")

City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Cal. v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1775-78 (2015) ("The real question. . . is whether, despite these dangerous circumstances, the officers violated the Fourth Amendment when they decided to reopen Sheehan's door rather than attempting to accommodate her disability. Here we come to another problem. San Francisco, whose attorneys represent Reynolds and Holder, devotes scant briefing to this question. Instead, San Francisco argues almost exclusively that even if it is assumed that there was a Fourth Amendment violation, the right was not clearly established. This Court, of course, could decide the constitutional question anyway. See Pearson v. Callahan, 555 U.S. 223, 242, 129 S.Ct. 808, 172 L.Ed.2d 565 (2009) (recognizing discretion). But because this question has not been adequately briefed, we decline to do so. . . Rather, we simply decide whether the officers' failure to accommodate Sheehan's illness violated clearly established law. It did not. To begin, nothing in our cases suggests the constitutional rule applied by the Ninth Circuit. The Ninth Circuit focused on Graham v. Connor,. . . but Graham holds only that the ' "objective reasonableness"' test applies to excessive-force claims under the Fourth Amendment. . . That is far too general a proposition to control this case. 'We have repeatedly told courts—and the Ninth Circuit in particular—not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality.'. . Qualified immunity is no immunity at all if 'clearly established' law can simply be defined as the right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures. Even a cursory glance at the facts of Graham confirms just how different that case is from this one. That case did not involve a dangerous, obviously unstable person making threats, much less was there a weapon involved. There is a world of difference between needlessly withholding sugar from an innocent person who is suffering from an insulin reaction. . . and responding to the perilous situation Reynolds and Holder confronted. Graham is a nonstarter. Moving beyond Graham, the Ninth Circuit also turned to two of its own cases. But even if 'a controlling circuit precedent could constitute clearly established federal law in these circumstances,' Carroll v. Carman, 574 U.S. —— —, —— (2014) (per curiam) (slip op., at 4), it does not do so here. The Ninth Circuit first pointed to Deorle v. Rutherford, 272 F.3d 1272 (C.A.9 2001), but from the very first paragraph of that opinion we learn that Deorle involved an officer's use of a beanbag gun to subdue 'an emotionally disturbed' person who 'was unarmed, had not attacked or even touched anyone, had generally obeyed the instructions given him by various police officers, and had not committed any serious offense.'. . The officer there, moreover, 'observed Deorle at close proximity for about five to ten minutes before shooting him' in the face. . . Whatever the merits of the decision in Deorle, the differences between that case and the case before us leap from the page. Unlike Deorle, Sheehan was dangerous, recalcitrant, law-breaking, and out of sight. The Ninth Circuit also leaned on Alexander v. City and County of San Francisco, 29 F.3d 1355 (C.A.9 1994), another case involving mental illness. There, officials from San Francisco attempted to enter Henry Quade's home 'for the primary purpose of arresting him' even though they lacked an arrest warrant. . . Quade, in response, fired a handgun; police officers 'shot back, and Quade died from gunshot wounds shortly thereafter.'. . The panel concluded that a jury should decide whether the officers used excessive force. The court reasoned that the officers provoked the confrontation because there were no 'exigent circumstances' excusing their entrance. . .Alexander too is a poor fit. As Judge Graber observed below in her dissent, the Ninth Circuit has long read Alexander narrowly. . . Under Ninth Circuit law. . . an entry that otherwise complies with the Fourth Amendment is not rendered unreasonable because it provokes a violent reaction. . . Under this rule, qualified immunity necessarily applies here because, as explained above, competent officers could have believed that the second entry was justified under both continuous search and exigent circumstance rationales. Indeed, even if Reynolds and Holder misjudged the situation, Sheehan cannot 'establish a Fourth Amendment violation based merely on bad tactics that result in a deadly confrontation that could have been avoided.'. . Courts must not judge officers with 'the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . When Graham, Deorle, and Alexander are viewed together, the central error in the Ninth Circuit's reasoning is apparent. The panel majority concluded that these three cases 'would have placed any reasonable, competent officer on notice that it is unreasonable to forcibly enter the home of an armed, mentally ill suspect who had been acting irrationally and had threatened anyone who entered when there was no objective need for immediate entry.'. . But even assuming that is true, no precedent clearly established that there was not 'an objective need for immediate entry' here. No matter how carefully a reasonable officer read Graham, Deorle, and Alexander beforehand, that officer could not know that reopening Sheehan's door to prevent her from escaping or gathering more weapons would violate the Ninth Circuit's test, even if all the disputed facts are viewed in respondent's favor. Without that 'fair notice,' an officer is entitled to qualified immunity. . . Nor does it matter for purposes of qualified immunity that Sheehan's expert, Reiter, testified that the officers did not follow their training. . . .Even if an officer acts contrary to her training, however, (and here, given the generality of that training, it is not at all clear that Reynolds and Holder did so), that does not itself negate qualified immunity where it would otherwise be warranted. Rather, so long as 'a reasonable officer could have believed that his conduct was justified,' a plaintiff cannot 'avoi[d] summary judgment by simply producing an expert's report that an officer's conduct leading up to a deadly confrontation was imprudent, inappropriate, or even reckless.'. . . Considering the specific situation confronting Reynolds and Holder, they had sufficient reason to believe that their conduct was justified. Finally, to the extent that a 'robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' could itself clearly establish the federal right respondent alleges, . . . no such consensus exists here. . . .In sum, we hold that qualified immunity applies because these officers had no 'fair and clear warning of what the Constitution requires.'. . . Because the qualified immunity analysis is straightforward, we need not decide whether the Constitution was violated by the officers' failure to accommodate Sheehan's illness. * * * For these reasons, the first question presented is dismissed as improvidently granted. On the second question, we reverse the judgment of the Ninth Circuit. The case is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.")

[Note: The Court dismissed the writ of certiorari on the question of whether Title II applies to "on-the-street responses to reported disturbances" as "improvidently granted." See Clark v. Colbert, 895 F.3d 1258, 1265 (10th Cir. 2018) ("[W]e have never squarely held the ADA applies to arrests. See J.H. ex rel. J.P. v. Bernalillo Cty., 806 F.3d 1255, 1260–61 (10th Cir. 2015); cf. Gohier, 186 F.3d at 1221 (noting, in dicta, that the arrest context is not categorically beyond the ADA's scope). Likewise, we have never held a municipality incurs liability under the ADA for failing to adequately train its employees. See J.V. ex rel. C. v. Albuquerque Pub. Sch., 813 F.3d 1289, 1297 (10th Cir. 2016). . . But we need not confront either of those open questions to resolve this appeal, as Clark has failed to rebut the district court's conclusion that the ADA does not transfer liability through the Broken Arrow officers to the Wagoner County Board in this case."); Haberle v. Troxell, 885 F.3d 170, 178-82 (3d Cir. 2018) ("As a threshold matter, we consider whether the ADA applies when police officers make an arrest. Although the question is debatable, we think the answer is generally yes. . . . The first question, then, is whether arrestees can be 'qualified individuals' under the ADA, and the best response is that they can, for there is nothing to categorically exclude them from the statute's broad coverage. . . . The second question is whether arrestees may have disabilities covered by the ADA, and the answer to that is clearly 'yes.'. . .Saving the third qualifying question for last, we next note that the fourth requirement, that the claimant has been excluded from a service, program, or activity or discriminated against by reason of his disability, is also one that can be satisfied in the context of an arrest. If the arrestee's 'disability "played a role in the ... decisionmaking process and ... had a determinative effect on the outcome of that process[,]"' i.e., if the arrestee's disability was a 'but for' cause of the deprivation or harm he suffered, then the fourth element of an ADA claim has been met. . . .The most controversial question pertinent to whether the ADA applies when police officers are making arrests comes in the context of the statute's third requirement. We must consider whether arrests made by police officers are 'services, programs, or activities of a public entity,' or alternatively, whether police officers may be liable under the ADA for

'subject[ing a qualified individual] to discrimination' while effectuating an arrest. . . . [C]ourts across the country are divided on whether police fieldwork and arrests can rightly be called 'services, programs, or activities of a public entity....'. . .Fortunately, we do not need to resolve that issue in this case, because § 12132 is framed in the alternative and we can look instead to the second phrase, namely, to whether the arrestee was 'subjected to discrimination' by the police. . . .The 'subjected to discrimination' phrase in Title II is 'a catch-all phrase that prohibits all discrimination by a public entity, regardless of the context.'. . .It follows, then, that police officers may violate the ADA when making an arrest by failing to provide reasonable accommodations for a qualified arrestee's disability, thus subjecting him to discrimination. Given that catchall, we believe that the ADA can indeed apply to police conduct during an arrest. That conclusion, which is suggested by the wide scope of the ADA's text, has support from our sister circuits. See, e.g., Sheehan, 743 F.3d at 1217 ("Title II of the [ADA] applies to arrests."); Roberts v. City of Omaha, 723 F.3d 966, 973 (8th Cir. 2013) ("[T]he ADA ... appl[ies] to law enforcement officers taking disabled suspects into custody."). Even though there is some disagreement concerning the point during a law enforcement encounter at which the ADA applies to police conduct, no court of appeals has held that the ADA does not apply at all. See, e.g., Hainze v. Richards, 207 F.3d 795, 801 (5th Cir. 2000) (holding "that Title II does not apply to an officer's on-the-street responses to reported disturbances or other incidents ... prior to the officer's securing the scene and ensuring that there is no threat to human life"); Gohier v. Enright, 186 F.3d 1216, 1221 (10th Cir. 1999) ("[A] broad rule categorically excluding arrests from the scope of Title II ... is not the law."). . . . Even though the ADA generally applies in the arrest context, Haberle's claim for money damages against the Borough fails as a matter of law because she has not adequately pled that the Borough acted with deliberate indifference to the risk of an ADA violation. She seeks compensatory damages from the Borough under the ADA, but that remedy is not available absent proof of 'intentional discrimination.' S.H. ex rel. Durrell v. Lower Merion Sch. Dist., 729 F.3d 248, 261 (3d Cir. 2013) ("[C]laims for compensatory damages under ... § 202 of the ADA also require a finding of intentional discrimination."). To prove intentional discrimination, an ADA claimant must prove at least deliberate indifference, . . . and to plead deliberate indifference, a claimant must allege '(1) knowledge that a federally protected right is substantially likely to be violated ... and (2) failure to act despite that knowledge.'. . Haberle, however, fails to allege that the Borough was aware that its existing policies made it substantially likely that disabled individuals would be denied their federally protected rights under the ADA. . . . She relies on general allegations that the Borough has 'a history of violating the civil rights of residents[,]'. . offering only hazy support for that statement. Even if she could ultimately prove a generalized history of civil rights violations, that would not necessarily demonstrate 'a pattern of past occurrences of injuries like the plaintiff['s.]. . .Because those other vaguely referenced violations have not been adequately alleged to be 'similar to the violation at issue here, they could not have put [the Defendant] on notice' that policies, practices, and procedures had to be changed. . . Nevertheless, with respect to that defect, Haberle should be given an opportunity to amend her complaint, if possible, to salvage her ADA claim against the Borough, since this failure in her complaint is not one as to which we can say definitively that amendment would be futile. . . .Haberle likewise fails to allege that the risk of harm was 'so great and so obvious,' as to obviate the need for her to allege facts pertaining to the Borough's knowledge. . . At most, she claims that the Borough's conduct falls 'beneath the nationally recognized standards for police department operations' with regard to those with mental illness. . . But, assuming that is true, falling below national standards does not, in and of itself, make the risk of an ADA violation in such circumstances 'so patently obvious that a [municipality] could be held liable' without 'a pre-existing pattern of violations.'")

Haberle v. Troxell, 885 F.3d 170, 183-86 (3d Cir. 2018) (Greenaway, Jr., J., concurring) ("I join the majority opinion and agree that Title II of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) applies to arrests when the arrestee is 'subjected to discrimination' by the police. . . However, I would also hold that—based on the text of Title II, the Department of Justice's interpretations of Title II, and the Supreme Court's holding in Pa. Dep't of Corr. v. Yeskey, 524 U.S. 206, 118 S.Ct. 1952, 141 L.Ed.2d 215 (1998)—that arrests constitute 'services, programs, or activities of a public entity' under the ADA. 42 U.S.C. § 12132. . . .[T]he majority's holding only allows an arrestee to succeed on an ADA claim if he or she can prove discrimination by a public entity, leaving open the question of whether an arrestee can recover under the ADA for being 'denied the benefits of the services, programs, or activities of a public entity.' 42 U.S.C. § 12132. This is significant because '[c]ases charging discrimination are uniquely difficult to prove and often depend upon circumstantial evidence.'. .In my estimation, the statutory text of the ADA makes clear that arrests can qualify as a 'service[ ], program[ ], or activit[y]' of the police, and I therefore see no reason to hang a cloud of doubt over an arrestee's right to recovery under this alternate theory. . . .[T]he majority is reluctant to determine whether an arrest qualifies as a service, program, or activity under Title II because—according to it—this is an issue that 'courts across the country are divided on ....'. . . Two of our sister circuits have addressed this precise issue to date. In Sheehan v. City and Cty. of S.F., the Ninth Circuit held that arrests are covered by Title II because '[t]he ADA applies broadly to police "services, programs, or activities."'. . Conversely, the Fourth Circuit in Rosen v. Montgomery Cty. Md. concluded that arrests are not services, programs, or activities because '[t]he terms "eligible" and "participate" imply voluntariness on the part of an applicant who seeks a benefit from the State.' 121 F.3d 154, 157 (4th Cir. 1997) (quoting Torcasio v. Murray, 57 F.3d 1340, 1347 (4th Cir. 1995)). The Supreme Court, however, squarely rejected Rosen's reasoning in Yeskey. . . Accordingly, '[c]ourts across the country have called Rosen's holding into question in light of the Supreme Court's decision in [Yeskey].' Seremeth v. Bd. of Cty. Comm'rs Frederick Cty., 673 F.3d 333, 337 (4th Cir. 2012) (collecting cases). . . Indeed, in Seremeth, the Fourth Circuit declined to rely on Rosen and held that Title II applies to police interrogations based on the phrase 'services, programs, or activities' in addition to the catch-all antidiscrimination phrase. . . We therefore need not be troubled by declining to follow Rosen and its logic. Rather, we should be cognizant that no court of appeals has held that arrests are not 'services, programs, or activities of a public entity,' 42 U.S.C. § 12132, since the Supreme Court decided Yeskey twenty years ago. . . .The statutory text, the Department of Justice's interpretations of the text, and the Supreme Court's broad interpretation of the ADA in Yeskey establish that arrests are 'services, programs, or activities of a public entity' under Title II. 42 U.S.C. § 12132. I therefore see no reason to be less than plain that an arrestee with a disability has two paths to vindicate his or her disability rights.")

See also Roell v. Hamilton Cty., Ohio, 870 F.3d 471, 489-90 (6th Cir. 2017) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor this circuit has squarely addressed whether Title II of the ADA applies in the context of an arrest. Nancy Roell urges us, however, to adopt the reasoning of several of our sister circuits that have found Title II applicable to law-enforcement activities, including arrests. A few opinions have indeed indicated that arrestees might be able to bring cognizable claims under Title II. But, in doing so, they have also noted that the exigent circumstances inherent in an arrest inform the reasonable-accommodation analysis. [collecting cases] We need not decide whether Title II applies in the context of arrests because, even if Nancy Roell's failure-to-accommodate claim is cognizable, Hamilton County is entitled to summary judgment based on the facts of this case. This circuit has previously held that 'the "determination of what constitutes reasonable modification is highly fact-specific, requiring case-by-case inquiry."'. . Deputies Alexander, Dalid, and Huddleston unquestionably faced exigent circumstances while attempting to restrain and arrest Roell. As detailed above, they responded to an unsecured scene to find an individual who had committed, at the very least, a series of property crimes and who posed a continuing threat to the deputies and to others. In fact, almost immediately after the deputies arrived, Roell swiftly approached them brandishing a hose with a metal nozzle and a garden basket. The deputies, in other words, were required to make a series of quick, on-the-spot judgments in a continuously evolving environment. Nancy Roell's proposed accommodations—that the deputies use verbal de-escalation techniques, gather information from the witnesses, and call EMS services before engaging with Roell—were therefore 'unreasonable ... in light of the overriding public safety concerns.'. . In the context of the exigent circumstances surrounding Roell's arrest, Nancy Roell cannot make out a viable ADA claim under her failure-to-accommodate theory. Nor has she presented any evidence that Hamilton County intentionally discriminated against Roell based on his disability. The district court therefore did not err in granting summary judgment in favor of Hamilton County on Nancy Roell's ADA claim.")

July 11, 2018) ("The Third Circuit recently clarified, 'Even though there is some disagreement concerning the point during a law enforcement encounter at which the ADA applies to police conduct, no court of appeals has held that the ADA does not apply at all.' Haberle v. Troxell, 885 F.3d 170, 181 (3d Cir. 2018). . . .Here, the Court will deny without prejudice Defendants' motion for summary judgment on Plaintiff's ADA violation claims for two reasons. First, despite Defendants' arguments to the contrary, a police officer and a municipality may violate a person's rights under the ADA during a law enforcement encounter, and such a claim is actionable in this Circuit. Second, the factual basis for Plaintiff's ADA claims is the same as for his constitutional violation claims. Because a jury must assess the facts to determine what occurred during Plaintiff's encounter with Ambrifi, along with Delanco Township's training practices of its officers, the Court cannot conclude as a matter of law whether Defendants violated the ADA on the present record. Defendants, however, may renew their motion on Plaintiff's ADA claims at the appropriate time during or after trial, if appropriate."); McHenry v. City of Ottawa, No. 16-2736-DDC-JPO, 2017 WL 4269903, at *12-13 (D. Kan. Sept. 26, 2017) ("Defendants contend that the ADA does not apply in situations where police officers face violent conduct. . . No Supreme Court or Tenth Circuit precedent addresses this question directly. . . Every circuit that has reached this issue has held that an arrest is a public benefit that falls within the scope of the ADA. See, e.g., Sheehan v. City & Cty. of S.F., 743 F.3d 1211, 1231–32 (9th Cir. 2014) (cataloging cases), rev'd on other grounds, 135 S. Ct. 1765 (2015). The difference among the circuits is the rule that applies to when exigent circumstances exist. Most circuits hold that an exigency is a circumstance that courts must take into account when deciding which reasonable accommodations a public entity must make. See, e.g., Bircoll v. Miami-Dade Cty., 480 F.3d 1072, 1084 (11th Cir. 2007). The Fifth Circuit takes a different approach, holding that the ADA does not apply to police officers making an on-the-street response until they have secured the scene. Hainze v. Richards, 207 F.3d 795, 801 (5th Cir. 2000) (holding ADA did not apply to an officer encounter where the individual was walking towards an officer with a knife and did not drop the knife when told to do so). The Sixth Circuit also follows a slightly different path, holding a disabled individual's disability was not the cause of an officer shooting. Thompson v. Williamson Cty., Tenn., 219 F.3d 555, 558 (6th Cir. 2000). Instead, the Sixth Circuit reasoned, the individual's failure to disarm was the cause. Id. Our court has faced this question in a case where an individual approached officers while holding a knife. Sudac v. Hoang, 378 F. Supp. 2d 1298, 1306 (D. Kan. 2005) (granting summary judgment). These circumstances led the officers to shoot the individual. . . Judge Lungstrum reasoned that the officers did not owe an ADA duty to accommodate the individual in this situation because of the threatening manner he presented. . . He thus applied the logic of Hainze and Thompson. . . The court finds Sudac persuasive and concludes that it applies the rule that our Circuit, if faced with the question, would adopt. The court thus holds that the ADA applies to arrests unless an exigency exists. Applying that rule here, plaintiff has alleged sufficient facts that, if supported by evidence and accredited by the factfinder, could support a finding that Mr. Jennings did not present an imminent threat to himself or others. These allegations prevent the court from granting a Motion to Dismiss the ADA claim against Ottawa and Franklin County."); Adle, on behalf of Gerken v. Maine State Police Dep't, No. 1:15-CV-458-NT, 2017 WL 3902859, at *16-21 (D. Me. Sept. 6, 2017) ("On the undisputed facts, Mr. Gerken had established himself as an unusually resilient individual. After pepper spray, Taser fire, an attempt by a game warden to wrest the knife from his grip, a blast from a fire hose, and being shot, Mr. Gerken still had hold of the knife. The light in the woods was dimming. Sgt. Grass was less than thirteen feet from Mr. Gerken. Despite orders to stop moving and stay down, the officers saw Mr. Gerken sitting up and making a lunging motion with the knife. The situation had been unfolding quickly, and now each officer was called on to make a split-second judgment. All three officers made the decision to shoot until Mr. Gerken was incapacitated. . . Under Berube, the law was established that an officer need not perfectly calibrate the amount of force required to protect himself in an emergency situation. On these facts, under this law, the Plaintiff has not shown that no reasonable officer, confronted with this situation, would have made the same choice that Sgt. Grass, Sgt. Shead, and Det. Mitchell each made. Accordingly, I find that the individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claims under § 1983. . . . There is division within the Circuits over whether Title II of the ADA applies at all to encounters with violent, mentally ill individuals. The Fifth Circuit has held that:Title II does not apply to an officer's on-the-street responses to reported disturbances or other similar incidents, whether or not those calls involve subjects with mental disabilities, prior to the officer's securing the scene and ensuring that there is no threat to human life. Hainze v. Richards, 207 F.3d 795, 801 (5th Cir. 2000). In contrast, the Fourth Circuit takes the view that exigent circumstances factor into whether the requested modification is reasonable under the totality of the circumstances. Waller ex rel. Estate of Hunt v. Danville, 556 F.3d 171, 175 (4th Cir. 2009); . . . cf. Bircoll v. Miami-Dade Cty., 480 F.3d 1072, 1085 (11th Cir. 2007) (holding exigent circumstances surrounding an arrest "go more to the reasonableness of the requested ADA modification than whether the ADA applies in the first instance," where a nonviolent, deaf individual requested an accommodation); Gohier, 186 F.3d at 1221 ("[A] broad rule categorically excluding arrests from the scope of Title II ... is not the law."). As for controlling authority on the question, the Supreme Court has yet to decide the issue. . . The First Circuit noted in 2006 that '[i]t is questionable whether the ADA was intended to impose any requirements on police entering a residence to take someone into protective or other custody beyond the reasonableness requirement of the Fourth Amendment.'. . Courts within this District have long referred to an 'exigent circumstances exception' or have followed Hainze. [collecting cases] Regardless of whether there is a per se rule that the ADA does not apply in exigent circumstances or whether exigency is one factor among many to determine whether a requested accommodation is reasonable, the threshold question is whether exigent circumstances existed. The Plaintiff argues that exigent circumstances did not exist leading up to the execution of the tactical plan and that the MSP's militaristic response unreasonably exacerbated Mr. Gerken's mental health crisis. The Plaintiff's experts opined that, under the totality of the circumstances, the collective law enforcement conduct. . . caused Mr. Gerken's condition to deteriorate and ultimately led to his death. . . . On the facts before me, taken in the light most favorable to the Plaintiff, no reasonable juror could conclude that the situation faced by the MSP did not involve exigent circumstances and a threat to human safety. The MSP did not have the option of packing up and going home when it got dark. There is no dispute that Mr. Gerken was armed with a knife, that he was disturbed, that he had earlier told an 8-year-old to stop looking at him or he would kill her, that he had refused to drop the knife for the first responders, that he had resisted Sgt. Dunham's attempt to disarm him, and that he had withstood pepper spray and an attempt to Taser him. Except for the odd outburst, Mr. Gerken remained unresponsive, for over six hours of attempted negotiations, and he never once let go of the knife. It is undisputed that shortly before the tactical plan was executed, Mr. Gerken said, 'I will cut you' as he waved his knife in the air. Although the Plaintiff points out that everybody was safe as long as Mr. Gerken lay on the ground, no one knew if and when Mr. Gerken would get up. To say that Mr. Gerken might still be there today if the police had not used the fire hose is speculative. On these facts, no reasonable juror could conclude that there was no exigency. Many of the Plaintiff's accommodations were tried without success or rejected as unworkable. There is no dispute that negotiations extended over six hours. The Plaintiff offers no facts to suggest that lights were available that could have effectively lit the forest and allowed for further negotiations. . . . Even under the totality of the circumstances test set forth in Waller, the record indicates that the officers on the scene provided Mr. Gerken with reasonable accommodations. . . The MSP conducted a lengthy, personalized negotiation by experienced officers. The officers shifted away from negotiations only when they perceived an increased risk to themselves and the public. As discussed above, Sgt. Grass's decision to use the fire hose as an alternative, non-lethal tool was objectively reasonable in these circumstances. Once Mr. Gerken rose to his feet and began to run, knife in hand toward Det. Mitchell's advance, exigent circumstances certainly curtailed any duty to accommodate Mr. Gerken's disability."); Williams v. City of New York, 121 F.Supp.3d 354, 364-65 & n.12, 369-71 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) ("There is no dispute that Plaintiff is a qualified individual with a disability. . . or that the City is a public entity and is subject to the ADA and Rehabilitation Act. The City concedes that NYPD actions fall within the scope of Title II of the ADA and the Rehabilitation Act generally but argues that 'on the street' interactions between police officers and 'qualified individuals with a disability' are excluded from coverage until the crime scene has been secured and the arrestee has been transported to the stationhouse. . . In other words, the City argues that the NYPD bears no burden to provide any accommodation to disabled individuals until after the individual has been arrested and booked. The City advances two theories to support its position: first, 'on-the-street encounters' are not covered 'services, programs, or activities;' and, second, exigent circumstances and overriding public safety concerns make it unreasonable to require police officers to accommodate disabled individuals before making an arrest. . . The City's crabbed interpretation of Title II's coverage of police activity simply does not comport with the language of Title II and its implementing regulations, particularly in light of the remedial purpose of the statute and the weight of authority that has considered the issue. . . .The Second Circuit has yet to address the question whether and to what extent Title II of the ADA applies during an on-the-street interaction leading to an arrest. . . The Supreme Court granted certiorari in City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Cal. v. Sheehan, 135 S.Ct. 702 (2014), to consider the question whether Title II of the ADA applies 'to an officer's on-the-street responses to reported disturbances or other similar incidents ... prior to the officer's securing the scene and ensuring that there is no threat to human life,' 135 S.Ct. 1765, 1773 (2015). The Court dismissed the question presented as improvidently granted, however, because the petitioner, respondent, and United States as amicus curiae all conceded on the merits that 42 U.S.C. § 12132 applies to arrests. . . The issue, therefore, remains undecided. . . .The City argues that a plaintiff has no remedy under § 1983 for alleged violations of Title II of the ADA because Congress adopted a comprehensive private remedial scheme that displaced private rights of action under § 1983. . . Because the remedial scheme of Title II of the ADA derives from the same source as the remedial scheme of Title IX, the Supreme Court's conclusion that parallel and concurrent § 1983 claims and implied private causes of action are available under Title IX applies with equal force to Title II of the ADA. Accordingly, a plaintiff can bring a cause of action under § 1983 to enforce rights protected by Title II of the ADA."); Lookabill v. City of Vancouver, No. 13-5461 RJB, 2015 WL 4623938, at *8-9 (W.D. Wash. Aug. 3, 2015) ("The principle case that Plaintiffs rely upon, Sheehan v. City and Cnty. of San Francisco, 743 F.3d 1211 (9th Cir.2014), was before the U.S. Supreme Court in 2015. City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Calif. v. Sheehan, ––U.S. ––––, ––––, 135 S.Ct. 1765, 1772, 191 L.Ed.2d 856 (2015). (In Sheehan, the Ninth Circuit held that the ADA applies to arrests.) The Sheehan defendants initially requested certiorari on the question of whether the ADA 'requires law enforcement officers to provide accommodations to an armed, violent, and mentally ill suspect in the course of bringing the suspect into custody,' arguing that there was a split in the circuits as to whether the ADA applies to arrests. City & Cnty. of San Francisco, Calif. v. Sheehan, ––U.S. ––––, ––––, 135 S.Ct. 1765, 1772, 191 L.Ed.2d 856 (2015). The U.S. Supreme Court 'dismissed' [sic] the question, holding that certiorari was improvidently granted because the defendants failed to brief the question to the Court (arguing instead that under 28 C.F.R. §§ 35.139(a) and 35.104, 'a person who poses a direct threat or significant risk to the safety of others is not qualified for accommodations under the ADA') and failed to adequately raise that new issue in the Ninth Circuit. Id. The ADA claim was remanded to the Ninth Circuit and the Ninth Circuit remanded the ADA claim to the district court. Accordingly, the Ninth Circuit's holding in Sheehan, that the ADA applies to arrests, is still binding on this Court. . . . The City also advances the same argument here that the Sheehan defendants raised with the Supreme Court, but the Supreme Court did not reach. It argues that Mr. Lookabill was not a 'qualified individual with a disability' requiring accommodation. . . .In the circumstances presented here, Mr. Lookabill was not a 'qualified individual with a disability' because he posed a 'direct threat' to the 'health or safety of others.' The officers were called to the scene to deal with Mr. Lookabill, who appeared to be intoxicated and had threatened people with a gun. He was armed, non-compliant, and acting erratically. He begged the police to come get the gun from him and then would ask them to shoot him. He threatened to shoot himself. Mr. Lookabill would say he wanted to be a policeman but then would scream obscenities at them. Mr. Lookabill kept 'target glancing' the officers. All present were aware he had military training and had served in Iraq. Further, the undersigned has already held that '[a]t the time they opened fire, the officers had probable cause to believe that Mr.

Lookabill posed an immediate threat to the officers or others. Mr. Lookabill moved quickly and deliberately for his gun without provocation. He had been repeatedly warned not to do so by several policemen with their guns drawn.'. . Mr. Lookabill posed a significant threat to the officers, other civilians, and to himself. He was not a qualified individual with a disability under the ADA. Plaintiffs argue that certain accommodations should have been implemented, for example that the officers should not have ordered Mr. Lookabill to the ground, but should have him 'put his hands above his head and turn around' and that the officers should not have been positioned so closely to Mr. Lookabill, and that way would not have felt threatened. Plaintiff does so without any evidence to support these suppositions. Aside from bare assertions, Plaintiffs fail to show that these actions would have mitigated the risk posed by Mr. Lookabill when the officers encountered him or afterward. There is no showing that any modification of policy, practice, or procedure or the provision of auxiliary aids or services would have mitigated the risk. 28 C.F.R. § 35.139(b). In addition to failing to show that Mr. Lookabill was a 'qualified individual with a disability,' Plaintiffs failed to show that the officers' alleged discrimination or failure to accommodate was 'by reason of" his disability."); Jones v. Lacey, No. 14-CV-10384, 2015 WL 3579282, at *17 n.1 (E.D. Mich. June 5, 2015) ("Defendants do not appear to dispute that the ADA applies to Lacey's conduct during this incident. While the Court is not inclined to address an issue that neither party briefed, the Court notes that in this circuit, '[c]ase law addressing whether or how Title II of the ADA is applicable to police conduct related to effectuating an arrest or an investigation is limited.' *Scozzari v. Stanton v. Sims, 134 S. Ct. 3, 5, 7 (2013) (per curiam) ("There is no suggestion in this case that Officer Stanton knowingly violated the Constitution; the question is whether, in light of precedent existing at the time, he was 'plainly incompetent' in entering Sims' yard to pursue the fleeing Patrick. . . The Ninth Circuit concluded that he was. It did so despite the fact that federal and state courts nationwide are sharply divided on the question whether an officer with probable cause to arrest a suspect for a misdemeanor may enter a home without a warrant while in hot pursuit of that suspect. . . .To summarize the law at the time Stanton made his split-second decision to enter Sims' yard: Two opinions of this Court were equivocal on the lawfulness of his entry; two opinions of the State Court of Appeal affirmatively authorized that entry; the most relevant opinion of the Ninth Circuit was readily distinguishable; two Federal District Courts in the Ninth Circuit had granted qualified immunity in the wake of that opinion; and the federal and state courts of last resort around the Nation were sharply divided. We do not express any view on whether Officer Stanton's entry into Sims' yard in pursuit of Patrick was constitutional. But whether or not the constitutional rule applied by the court below was correct, it was not 'beyond debate.' al–Kidd, supra, at ——, 131 S.Ct., at 2083. We do not require a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate. . . The constitutional question in this case falls far short of that threshold. At the time of al-Kidd's arrest, not a single judicial opinion had held that pretext could render an objectively reasonable arrest pursuant to a material-witness warrant unconstitutional. . . . [Ashcroft] deserves qualified immunity even assuming. . . that his alleged detention policy violated the Fourth Amendment.")

Weise v. Casper, 131 S. Ct. 7, 7, 8 (2010) (Ginsburg, J., joined by Sotomayor, J., dissenting from denial of certiorari) ("I cannot see how reasonable public officials, or any staff or volunteers under their direction, could have viewed the bumper sticker as a permissible reason for depriving Weise and Young of access to the event. Nevertheless, the Court of Appeals held respondents entitled to qualified immunity because 'no specific authority instructs this court ... how to treat the ejection of a silent attendee from an official speech based on the attendee's protected expression outside the speech area.' 593 F.3d 1163, 1170 (C.A.10 2010). No 'specific authority' should have been needed. . . . I see only one arguable reason for deferring the question this case presents. Respondents were volunteers following instructions from White House officials. The Volunteer Protection Act of 1997, 111 Stat. 218, 42 U.S.C. § 14501 et seq., had respondents invoked it in the courts below, might have shielded them from liability. Federal officials themselves, however, gain no shelter from that Act. Suits against the officials responsible for Weise's and Young's ouster remain pending and may offer this Court an opportunity to take up the issue avoided today.")

Safford Unified School Dist. No. 1 v. Redding, 129 S. Ct. 2633, 2643, 2644 (2009) ("[T]he T.L.O. concern to limit a school search to reasonable scope requires the support of reasonable suspicion of danger or of resort to underwear for hiding evidence of wrongdoing before a search can reasonably make the quantum leap from outer clothes and backpacks to exposure of intimate parts.

The meaning of such a search, and the degradation its subject may reasonably feel, place a search that intrusive in a category of its own demanding its own specific suspicions. . . . T.L.O. directed school officials to limit the intrusiveness of a search, 'in light of the age and sex of the student and the nature of the infraction,'. . . and as we have just said at some length, the intrusiveness of the strip search here cannot be seen as justifiably related to the circumstances. But we realize that the lower courts have reached divergent conclusions regarding how the T.L.O. standard applies to such searches. [collecting cases] We think these differences of opinion from our own are substantial enough to require immunity for the school officials in this case. We would not suggest that entitlement to qualified immunity is the guaranteed product of disuniform views of the law in the other federal, or state, courts, and the fact that a single judge, or even a group of judges, disagrees about the contours of a right does not automatically render the law unclear if we have been clear. That said, however, the cases viewing school strip searches differently from the way we see them are numerous enough, with well-reasoned majority and dissenting opinions, to counsel doubt that we were sufficiently clear in the prior statement of law. We conclude that qualified immunity is warranted.").

Brosseau v. Haugen, 125 S. Ct. 596, 598, 599 (2004) (per curiam) ("We express no view as to the correctness of the Court of Appeals' decision on the constitutional question itself. We believe that, however that question is decided, the Court of Appeals was wrong on the issue of qualified immunity. . . Graham and Garner, following the lead of the Fourth Amendment's text, are cast at a high level of generality. . . . Of course, in an obvious case, these standards can 'clearly establish' the answer, even without a body of relevant case law. [citing Hope v. Pelzer]. . . . The present case is far from the obvious one where Graham and Garner alone offer a basis for decision. . . . We therefore turn to ask whether, at the time of Brosseau's actions, it was ' Aclearly established"' in this more ' Aparticularized"' sense that she was violating Haugen's Fourth Amendment right. . . The parties point us to only a handful of cases relevant to the 'situation [Brosseau] confronted': whether to shoot a disturbed felon, set on avoiding capture through vehicular flight, when persons in the immediate area are at risk from that flight. . . .These three cases taken together undoubtedly show that this area is one in which the result depends very much on the facts of each case. None of them squarely governs the case here; they do suggest that Brosseau's actions fell in the ' Ahazy border between excessive and acceptable force."' . . The cases by no means 'clearly establish' that Brosseau's conduct violated the Fourth Amendment.").

Groh v. Ramirez, 124 S. Ct. 1284, 1293, 1294 (2004) ("Given that the particularity requirement is set forth in the text of the Constitution, no reasonable officer could believe that a warrant that plainly did not comply with that requirement was valid. . . . [E]ven a cursory reading of the warrant in this case–perhaps just a simple glance–would have revealed a glaring deficiency that any reasonable police officer would have known was constitutionally fatal.")

Hope v. Pelzer, 122 S. Ct. 2508, 2514-18 (2002) ("We agree with the Court of Appeals that the attachment of Hope to the hitching post under the circumstances alleged in this case violated the Eighth Amendment. . . . In assessing whether the Eighth Amendment violation here met the Harlow test, the Court of Appeals required that the facts of previous cases be ' 'materially similar' to Hope's situation.' . . This rigid gloss on the qualified immunity standard, though supported by Circuit precedent, [footnote omitted] is not consistent with our cases. . . . Our opinion in Lanier . . . makes clear that officials can still be on notice that their conduct violates established law even in novel factual circumstances. Indeed, in Lanier, we expressly rejected a requirement that previous cases be 'fundamentally similar.' Although earlier cases involving 'fundamentally similar' facts can provide especially strong support for a conclusion that the law is clearly established, they are not necessary to such a finding. The same is true of cases with 'materially similar' facts. Accordingly, pursuant to Lanier, the salient question that the Court of Appeals ought to have asked is whether the state of the law in 1995 gave respondents fair warning that their alleged treatment of Hope was unconstitutional. . . . The use of the hitching post as alleged by Hope 'unnecessar[ily] and wanton [ly] inflicted pain,' . . . and thus was a clear violation of the Eighth Amendment. . . Arguably, the violation was so obvious that our own Eighth Amendment cases gave the respondents fair warning that their conduct violated the Constitution. Regardless, in light of binding Eleventh Circuit precedent, an Alabama Department of Corrections ("DOC) regulation, and a DOJ report informing the ADOC of the constitutional infirmity in its use of the hitching post, we readily conclude that the respondents' conduct violated 'clearly established statutory or constitutional rights of which a reasonable person would have known.'. . . [F]or the purpose of providing fair notice to reasonable officers administering punishment for past misconduct, [there is no] reason to draw a constitutional distinction between a practice of handcuffing an inmate to a fence for prolonged periods and handcuffing him to a hitching post for seven hours. The Court of Appeals' conclusion to the contrary exposes the danger of a rigid, overreliance on factual similarity. . . . The obvious cruelty inherent in this practice should have provided respondents with some notice that their alleged conduct violated Hope's constitutional protection against cruel and unusual punishment. Hope was treated in a way antithetical to human dignity–he was hitched to a post for an extended period of time in a position that was painful, and under circumstances that were both degrading and dangerous. This wanton treatment was not done of necessity, but as punishment for prior conduct. Even if there might once have been a question regarding the constitutionality of this practice, the Eleventh Circuit precedent of Gates and Ort, as well as the DOJ report condemning the practice, put a reasonable officer on notice that the use of the hitching post under the circumstances alleged by Hope was unlawful. The 'fair and clear warning,' . . . that these cases provided was sufficient to preclude the defense of qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage. . . .We did not take, and do not pass upon, the questions whether or to what extent the three named officers may be held responsible for the acts charged, if proved. Nothing in our decision forecloses any defense other than qualified immunity on the ground relied upon by the Court of Appeals.").

Saucier v. Katz, 121 S. Ct. 2151, 2156 (2001) ("The relevant, dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted.").[See discussion of Saucier, infra]

Malley v. Briggs, 475 U.S. 335, 341 (1986) (qualified immunity protects "all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law").

United States v. Lanier, 520 U.S. 259, 269-72 (1997) [Note: case involved criminal prosecution under 18 U.S.C. § 242] ("Nor have our decisions demanded precedents that applied the right at issue to a factual situation that is 'fundamentally similar' at the level of specificity meant by the Sixth Circuit in using that phrase. To the contrary, we have upheld convictions under § 241 or § 242 despite notable factual distinctions between the precedents relied on and the cases then before the Court, so long as the prior decisions gave reasonable warning that the conduct then at issue violated constitutional rights. [citing cases] But even putting these examples aside, we think that the Sixth Circuit's 'fundamentally similar' standard would lead trial judges to demand a degree of certainty at once unnecessarily high and likely to beget much wrangling. This danger flows from the Court of Appeals' stated view . . . that due process under § 242 demands more than the 'clearly established' law required for a public officer to be held civilly liable for a constitutional violation under § 1983 or Bivens. [cites omitted] This, we think, is error. In the civil sphere, we have explained that qualified immunity seeks to ensure that defendants 'reasonably can anticipate when their conduct may give rise to liability,'. . . by attaching liability only if '[t]he contours of the right [violated are] sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.' [citing Anderson] So conceived, the object of the 'clearly established' immunity standard is not different from that of 'fair warning' as it relates to law 'made specific' for the purpose of validly applying § 242. The fact that one has a civil and the other a criminal law role is of no significance; both serve the same objective, and in effect the qualified immunity test is simply the adaptation of the fair warning standard to give officials (and, ultimately, governments) the same protection from civil liability and its consequences that individuals have traditionally possessed in the face of vague criminal statutes. To require something clearer than 'clearly established' would, then, call for something beyond 'fair warning.' This is not to say, of course, that the single warning standard points to a single level of specificity sufficient in every instance. In some circumstances, as when an earlier case expressly leaves open whether a general rule applies to the particular type of conduct at issue, a very high degree of prior factual particularity may be necessary. . . But general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning, and in other instances a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question, even though 'the very action in question has [not] previously been held unlawful,'. . . . In sum, as with civil liability under § 1983 or Bivens, all that can usefully be said about criminal liability under § 242 is that it may be imposed for deprivation of a constitutional right if, but only if, 'in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness [under the Constitution is] apparent,' [citing Anderson] Where it is, the constitutional requirement of fair warning is satisfied.").

Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635, 640 (1987) ("The 'contours' of the right must be sufficiently clear that a reasonable official would understand that what he is doing violates that right.....in light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent.")

D.C. CIRCUIT

Hedgpeth v. Rahim, 893 F.3d 802, 807-11 (D.C. Cir. 2018) ("Although there is a dearth of decisions interpreting D.C.'s public intoxication law in relevant respects, decisions from other courts applying comparable public-intoxication laws in similar circumstances support the reasonableness of the officers' belief of probable cause. . . We therefore conclude that the officers could have reasonably believed Hedgpeth was intoxicated and posed a danger to himself or others. As a result, the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on Hedgpeth's claim of an unlawful arrest. . . .Here, the district court considered the reasonableness of Officer Rahim's use of a forcible takedown maneuver under the assumed facts to be a close question, in light of, among other things, the misdemeanor nature of the suspected offenses. The court, though, did not decide that underlying Fourth Amendment question, instead concluding that Officer Rahim is entitled to qualified immunity. We agree. Even if there is a genuine dispute about the reasonableness of an officer's use of force, he is protected by qualified immunity unless his force violated clearly established law. . . . The pertinent question here is whether 'any competent officer,' in light of '[p]recedent involving similar facts,'. . . would consider it unlawful to use a takedown maneuver against a suspect who was shouting repeatedly and belligerently at the officers, who refused their orders to put his hands behind his back, and who had been described by a person with him as 'hard to handle.' We conclude that this is not 'an obvious case in which any competent officer would have known that' the use of a takedown maneuver in those circumstances 'would violate the Fourth Amendment.'. . . This does not mean an officer invariably has authority to forcibly take down a suspect in the course of a routine arrest. But here, in light of the circumstances of this case and the applicable precedent, this case is not one in which 'the right's contours were sufficiently definite that any reasonable official in the defendant's shoes would have understood that he was violating it.'. . That conclusion is fortified by decisions from other courts sustaining an arresting officer's use of an analogous level of force against a noncomplying suspect.")

Corrigan v. District of Columbia, 841 F.3d 1022, 1034-38 (D.C. Cir. 2016) ("Because the Supreme Court's reasoning in Cady focused on attributes unique to vehicles, some circuits have confined the community caretaking exception to automobiles. See, e.g., Ray v. Twp. of Warren, 626 F.3d 170, 177 (3d Cir. 2010); United States v. Bute, 43 F.3d 531, 535 (10th Cir. 1994); United States v. Erickson, 991 F.2d 529, 532 (9th Cir. 1993); United States v. Pichany, 687 F.2d 204, 207–09 (7th Cir. 1982). The Fifth and Eighth Circuits have extended the exception to warrantless searches of the home, see United States v. York, 895 F.2d 1026, 1029 (5th Cir. 1990); United States v. Quezada, 448 F.3d 1005, 1007–08 (8th Cir. 2006), but the authorized scope of the searches has been quite limited. The Sixth Circuit appears to have equivocated. Compare United States v. Rohrig, 98 F.3d 1506, 1521–25 (6th Cir. 1996), with Goodwin v. City of Painesville, 781 F.3d 314, 331 (6th Cir. 2015) and United States v. Williams, 354 F.3d 497, 508–09 (6th Cir. 2003). Neither this court nor the D.C. Court of Appeals has held that the community caretaking exception applies to a home. United States v. Proctor, 489 F.3d 1348, 1353 (D.C. Cir. 2007); Hawkins v. United States, 113 A.3d 216, 222 (D.C. 2015). The instant case does not require the court to decide whether the community caretaking doctrine applies to a home because even assuming it may, the officers point to no authority as would justify the EOD [Explosive Ordnance Disposal Unit] search. In cases where this doctrine justified a warrantless search of a home, the police officers were presented with circumstances requiring immediate action if they were to fulfill their caretaking function, and the ensuing searches were characterized by brevity and circumspection. . . Here, the MPD had been on the scene for five hours and fully secured the area prior to the EOD entry and search, and Corrigan was in MPD custody after surrendering peacefully. There was ample time and opportunity for the MPD to investigate further and, as appropriate, to seek a search warrant. Yet, instead of doing so, the officers conducted another, more invasive search of Corrigan's home. . . . [U]pon viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Corrigan as the non-movant, . . . we conclude that the officers fail to demonstrate that the extensive EOD search of Corrigan's home was justified by any plausible exigency. And assuming, without deciding, that the community caretaking doctrine applies to a home, the officers lacked probable cause to believe that there was a risk to the community demanding the kind of swift, warrantless response that doctrine would authorize. We therefore hold that the EOD search violated Corrigan's rights under the Fourth Amendment. . . .For the brief and limited warrantless ERT 'sweep' of Corrigan's home, the officers had a sufficiently reasonable basis for believing there was probable cause to look for a potentially injured and incapacitated person as to entitle them to qualified immunity. . . .Although a close question, the information known to Glover suggested that a reasonable officer on the scene could have believed that there was probable cause to order a brief "sweep" to check whether the ex-girlfriend was injured and remained incapacitated inside Corrigan's home. . . Consistent with that belief, the ERT 'sweep' was limited to spaces large enough to contain an individual, . . . and thus was not more intrusive than necessary to address the claimed exigency. By contrast, based on the facts known to the officers at the time, no reasonable officer could have believed that an exigency continued to exist as would justify a second warrantless break in of Corrigan's home to search for explosives. The evidence shows only that the MPD officers were presented with a potentially suicidal military veteran who possessed 'military items' and had IED training, but no information about actual or reported threats by him to others, much less that he had IED materials at home or would commit suicide in a manner that threatened others. . . .The unfocused nature of the EOD search underscores its patent unreasonableness, both in terms of its scope and the lack of a reasonable basis for it. . . .Clearly established law foreclosed the broad and invasive search that was executed. And even assuming, without deciding, that the community caretaking doctrine could justify the warrantless search of a home, it cannot shield the officers from liability. It is clearly established that this doctrine encompasses only police searches that are occasioned by, and strictly circumscribed by, the need to perform caretaking functions 'totally divorced from the detection, investigation, or acquisition of evidence related to' a crime. . . That is, the police must be lawfully inside a home for a reason unrelated to ferreting out crime. . . . Finally, the wide berth for reasonableness that the Supreme Court has accorded officers involved circumstances in which they must make split second judgments. . . . In Corrigan's case, the MPD had more than five hours, between the Fifth District's officers' arrival on the scene and the MPD's first contact with Corrigan himself, to gather information about a possible threat and apply for a warrant upon probable cause. . . . The more intrusive EOD search was conducted after the ERT 'sweep' revealed no injury to others or suspicious items in plain view. Corrigan had peacefully submitted to MPD custody. As such, this was not a case in which officers had to make a split-second decision that, judged with the benefit of hindsight, is revealed to be mistaken. . . Rather, this is a case in which officers disregarded the long-established 'basic principle of Fourth Amendment law that searches and seizures inside a home without a warrant are presumptively unreasonable.'. . They thereby contravened established law clearly putting them on fair notice that warrantless searches of a home based on an exception to the warrant requirement must be supported by a reasonable belief based on objective facts and narrowly circumscribed to the specific exigency claimed. Our dissenting colleague parts company with our analysis only as to qualified immunity. As to that issue she acknowledges that 'there can be "an obvious case" where a more generalized test of a Fourth Amendment violation "clearly establish[es]" the answer, even without a body of relevant case law' articulated at a high level of specificity. . . This is that 'obvious case.' A few clear propositions, all well established at the time of the search, admit of no relevant legal uncertainty in the context the EOD faced: The Fourth Amendment prohibits warrantless searches of a home, . . .unless an exception to the warrant requirement applies, . . . the exigent circumstances exception requires 'genuine exigency,'. . . and the community caretaking exception, which no binding precedent has applied to the search of a home, is, in any event, limited to police functions that are 'totally divorced' from criminal investigation[.]. . . As general as these propositions may be, their application here is straightforward, implicating no 'hazy border' between acceptable and unacceptable conduct by trained law enforcement officers. . . . Nothing in Mullenix v. Luna, 136 S. Ct. 305, 308 (2015), where the police were attempting to execute an arrest warrant, calls our conclusion into doubt. . . . Given the lack of any exigency in the instant case, Mullenix, like the entire run of recent cases granting qualified immunity, is relevant only insofar as it reinforces the familiar, objective immunity standard that we apply.") Corrigan v. District of Columbia, 841 F.3d 1022, 1039-47 (D.C. Cir. 2016) (Brown, J., dissenting) ("As Law and Order reminds us every evening, the police are the ones 'who investigate crime.' Nowadays, though, we demand much more from them. The series of unfortunate events presented by Matthew Corrigan's lawsuit is distressing, and I agree with the conclusion that the second search of Corrigan's apartment violated the Fourth Amendment. Nevertheless, given the varied role played by police officers, and its effect on the standard Corrigan must meet to pierce the officers' qualified immunity, I respectfully dissent. . . .Properly applied, the qualified immunity analysis shows the officers' initial actions were not only responsible, but commendable. When the officers' actions transgressed the Fourth Amendment, Corrigan's rights were protected by the district court granting his motion to suppress and entering a nolle prosequi on all charges against him. Now, when Corrigan seeks half-a-million dollars in a § 1983 lawsuit, a different issue is in play: whether controlling law was 'sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what [t]he[y] [did] violate[d]' Corrigan's Fourth Amendment rights. . . The court concludes it was, but I am at a loss to understand how this holding can be squared with the simple fact that neither the Supreme Court's precedent, nor ours, nor a robust consensus of our sister circuits clearly answered the legal questions faced by the officers in this case. There is much on which the majority and I agree. Under the circumstances of this case, the first search was permissible; the second search was not; and the information the police garnered from the first search and further investigation changed the calculus. However, on the question of how these issues impact the scope of qualified immunity, we part company. First, by imposing an artificially high burden on police conduct in exigent circumstances, the court conflates the 'probable cause' normally required to search a person's home and the 'objectively reasonable basis' used to evaluate intrusions based on exigent circumstances. . . .This conflation signals the majority opinion's fundamental flaw: grafting general Fourth Amendment standards from the criminal investigation context on to the exigency context. Related to this first problem is the second—and more significant—issue with today's opinion: The metric for measuring what law is 'clearly established' is more protean than my colleagues concede. . . .The standard for law to be 'clearly established' is quite demanding. The Supreme Court's most recent pronouncement on the issue confirms '[a] clearly established right is one that is sufficiently clear that every reasonable official would have understood that what he is doing violates that right. We do not require a case directly on point, but existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate. Put simply, qualified immunity protects all but the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law. . . . The source of 'clearly established' law is quite constrained as well. Controlling precedent from the Supreme Court, the applicable state supreme court, or from the applicable circuit court, constitutes 'clearly established' law—but it is unclear what else, if anything, does. . . .If there is no controlling authority in the plaintiff's jurisdiction at the time of the incident, 'a robust consensus of cases of persuasive authority' 'is necessary' to show 'clearly established' law. . . This makes sense. It is simply not reasonable to ask police departments around the country to keep abreast of every circuit court's latest 'clearly established' pronouncement and parse its application to the myriad factual permutations officers encounter on a daily basis. . . Accordingly, the Supreme Court is circumspect about the use of out-of-circuit cases to compose 'clearly established' law. Since al-Kidd, it is only assumed for sake of argument that 'a right can be "clearly established" by circuit precedent despite disagreement in the courts of appeals.' See Taylor v. Barkes, 135 S. Ct. 2042, 2045 (2015) (per curiam); City & Cnty. of San Francisco v. Sheehan, 135 S. Ct. 1765, 1776 (2015); Carroll v. Carman, 135 S. Ct. 348, 350 (2014) (per curiam); Reichle v. Howards, 132 S. Ct. 2088, 2094 (2012). . . .Finally, characterizing the appropriate law as 'clearly established' is quite exacting. . . .To be sure, there can be 'an obvious case' where a more generalized test of a Fourth Amendment violation ' "clearly establish[es]" the answer, even without a body of relevant case law.'. . But, that circumstance is inapposite when a case is 'one in which the result depends very much on the facts.'. . In that latter circumstance, a more 'particularized' inquiry into the applicable law is required. . . There, we ask whether a prior case 'squarely governs the case here,' not whether a prior case puts this one in a 'hazy border' between acceptable and unacceptable conduct[.] . . . Behavior on the border is still behavior protected by qualified immunity. . . . The majority cites no Supreme Court case and no D.C. Circuit case squarely governing Corrigan's claim. Indeed, the majority all but concedes there is no such case when justifying its review of both the 'constitutional violation' and 'clearly established' prongs of the qualified immunity analysis; doing so 'to avoid "leav[ing] the standards of official conduct permanently in limbo."'. . The majority finds 'clearly established' law by reasoning the facts of this exigent circumstances case back to the general principles of warrantless home searches in the criminal investigation context. This is inappropriate in Corrigan's case, where the officers were not searching for criminal activity but responding to a potentially-suicidal suspect with 'military items.'. . But even if this was appropriate, the majority's analysis rests on 'legal facts,' not law. . . The facts aid the analysis, but only to the extent they are closely aligned (or are obviously distinguishable from) controlling authority or persuasive authority. The 'clearly established' inquiry is its own question, not a rehash of the facts giving rise to a constitutional-rights violation. . . The factual regurgitation is telling, however, because it confirms Corrigan's claim is one where the existence of 'clearly established' law 'depends very much on the facts of [this] case.'. . 'Clearly established' law in this context thus depends upon a prior case 'squarely govern[ing]' this one. . . Since the majority can point to no clearly analogous case prohibiting the officers' conduct, that should end the inquiry. . . . At the time—with no Supreme Court or D.C. Circuit case squarely governing the emergency situation faced here—a reasonable officer could read Mora, Sutterfield, and Hendrix and conclude that the warrantless searches conducted in Corrigan's apartment might be within the realm of the officer's authority to abate public safety concerns posed by possession of military equipment by an individual with IED training. This is so even as the second search was a 'substantial step beyond the standard protective sweep.'. . . But determining whether the law was 'clearly established' is not an exercise in Monday-morning quarterbacking—law enforcement officers should not be subject to personal liability simply because the judiciary has not precisely defined the rules of the road. . . .It is therefore insufficient to apply, retrospectively, criminal investigation limitations on police conduct to the exigent circumstances context simply because these limitations have long existed in the investigatory context. Ultimately, the court's analysis rests on the 'Fourth Amendment standard' of reasonableness. . . The 'inquiry' of 'objective reasonableness' as to a Fourth Amendment violation, however, 'is not as forgiving as the one employed in the distinct context of deciding whether an officer is entitled to qualified immunity for a constitutional or statutory violation.' . . The fact that the officers violated the Fourth Amendment in searching Corrigan's apartment a second time without a warrant is, for purposes of finding the 'particular' issue faced by the officers answered by 'clearly established' law, a non sequitur. What "every reasonable" official would have understood to be 'clearly established' in case law is not the same question as what is 'objectively reasonable' for purposes of determining a Fourth Amendment violation. . . . It does not take six pages to explain why law is 'clearly established' unless the case is 'one in which the result depends very much on the facts.'. . . But the majority will not—and indeed, cannot—admit this. If the majority did admit this, it would then have to concede no case 'squarely governed' at the time the officers entered Corrigan's apartment. . . . We do not need to make 'bad law' just because 'bad facts' are often accused of doing so. There is much to regret about the procedures police continued to pursue here—especially in light of the many observations and revelations which objectively decreased the imminence of any dire threat.

Good intentions, however, are no substitute for good reasons. 'Because of the importance of qualified immunity to society as a whole, the [Supreme] Court often corrects lower courts when they wrongly subject individual officers to liability.'. . Indeed, if this decision were affirmed by the Supreme Court on the ground that the officers violated clearly established law, it would mark the first time in more than a decade that the Supreme Court has ruled in favor of a § 1983 plaintiff on the question. See Groh v. Ramirez, 540 U.S. 551, 565 (2004); Hope, 536 U.S. at 745–46. Yet the Supreme Court's exacting standard to identify 'clearly established' law does not play even a supporting role in the court's analysis, which, at most, strings together generalized statements and some out-of-circuit cases, affixes the label 'clearly established' onto the newfangled 'rule' drawn from them, and then employs this 'rule' to deny qualified immunity. If we want to join the game of second-guessing first responders, we will find ourselves at the end of a long queue. But flouting the clear trend of controlling authority is both unwarranted and unwise, so I respectfully dissent.")

Dukore v. D.C., 799 F.3d 1137, 1144-45 (D.C. Cir. 2015) ("In reviewing a grant of qualified immunity, we must consider the right asserted 'not as a broad general proposition, but in a particularized sense so that the contours of the right are clear[.]'. . So the right we must consider in this case is 'not the general right to be free from retaliation for one's speech,' but rather 'the more specific right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause.'. . The Supreme Court has 'never held that there is such a right.'. . Nor was there in February 2012 (nor is there now) any settled consensus view in this court or other federal courts of appeals such that 'the statutory or constitutional question' has been placed 'beyond debate.' . . Quite the opposite, in July 2011, this court recognized that the federal courts of appeals were split on whether a plaintiff claiming retaliatory arrest had to show that the arrest lacked probable cause, and expressly declined to take sides. See Moore, 644 F.3d at 423 n. 8. That means that, at the time of the arrests in this case, precedent in this and other circuits was either inconclusive or actively in conflict on whether the existence of probable cause precluded an arrest from being deemed 'retaliatory.' That is a far cry from placing the question beyond debate. Dukore and Canavan argue that the right to be free from retaliation under the First Amendment is clearly established. And they argue that the only confusion in the law concerned retaliatory prosecutions, as discussed in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 126 S.Ct. 1695, 164 L.Ed.2d 441 (2006). Dukore and Canavan further contend that any ripples of uncertainty generated by Hartman in other jurisdictions did not unsettle this circuit's law, because we have recognized that 'retaliatory arrest and retaliatory prosecution are distinct constitutional violations[.]' Moore v. Hartman, 704 F.3d 1003, 1004 (D.C.Cir.2013). The absence of confusion in this jurisdiction, they conclude, left as governing law for the officers the clearly established background right to be free from retaliation under the First Amendment. That argument turns the qualified immunity burden upside down. It is Dukore's and Canavan's burden to show that the particular right in question—narrowly described to fit the factual pattern confronting the officers . . . was clearly established. It was not the District's burden to show that the right had been called into question. The generality of Dukore's and Canavan's constitutional principle and the widespread instability in the law on the precise question of probable-cause arrests prevent them from discharging that duty.)

Doe v. D.C., 796 F.3d 96, 104-05 (D.C. Cir. 2015) ("The parties do not dispute that in an exigency the state may, consistent with the Constitution, seize children without a court order or a pre-deprivation hearing. But the precise contours of when an exigency exists to justify removal without a warrant or pre-deprivation hearing are not settled, as the other Circuits' varied formulations demonstrate. Given the uncertainty regarding when exactly an exigency exists and the lack of our own controlling precedent, the law in question was not 'clearly established' at the time of the seizure. The individual defendants are thus entitled to qualified immunity as the district court held.")

Fox v. Gov't of D.C., 794 F.3d 25, 30-31 (D.C. Cir. 2015) ("Certainly, a plausible argument can be made that the officer's conduct in the present case crossed that constitutional line. That, however, is not good enough to pierce the officer's claim of qualified immunity. Under Saucier and Pearson and their progeny, the piercing requires a violation of a constitutional right clearly established at the time of the incident. Not only has Mrs. Fox not established that her right not to be seized in the circumstances of this case was 'clearly established,' she did not even argue this matter in her opening brief. As also noted above, where a litigant has forfeited an argument by not raising it in the opening brief, we need not reach it. In short, we need not decide the constitutional issue because Mrs. Fox has not properly brought it before us. Given the circumstances of Mrs. Fox's alleged seizure, nothing in her brief shows that existing precedent has placed her Fourth Amendment right beyond debate. . . Consequently, Mrs. Fox has not shown that Officer Boyd violated her clearly established Fourth Amendment right when he ordered her to get out of the car and put her hands on the hood during her husband's traffic stop.")

Mpoy v. Rhee, 758 F.3d 285, 293-95 (D.C. Cir. 2014) ("Mpoy argues . . . that the context of the statement suggests he was speaking as a citizen rather than an employee because he sent the email outside the 'chain of command'—by sending it directly to Chancellor Rhee rather than to his principal's immediate superiors. As noted above, we held in Winder that 'a public employee speaks without First Amendment protection when he reports conduct that interferes with his job responsibilities, even if the report is made outside his chain of command.'. . But granting that whether speech is made inside or outside a chain of command may be a contextual factor in determining whether the employee made it to report interference with his job responsibilities, . . . there is little doubt that Mpoy was using the email to Rhee as an internal channel through which he could, in his capacity as a teacher, report such interference. . . . Accordingly, we conclude that, under the Winder test, Mpoy's email constituted employee speech unprotected by the First Amendment. . . Winder, however, is not the last word on this subject. In June of this year, the Supreme Court decided Lane v. Franks, in which it held that the First Amendment 'protects a public employee who provided truthful sworn testimony, compelled by subpoena,' at least where testifying was outside the scope of the employee's 'ordinary job responsibilities.' . . . In so holding, the Court focused particularly on the nature of compelled testimony. . . Moreover, because it was 'undisputed that Lane's ordinary job responsibilities did not include testifying in court proceedings,'. . . the Court, as in Garcetti, had no occasion to consider how the scope of such responsibilities should be determined in other circumstances. As a consequence, Lane does not directly or necessarily contradict Winder's application of Garcetti. . . Nonetheless, it is possible that Winder's broad language, interpreting Garcetti as leaving an employee unprotected when he reports conduct that 'interferes with his job responsibilities,'. . . could be in tension with Lane's holding that an employee's speech is unprotected only when it is within the scope of the employee's 'ordinary job responsibilities,'. . . or 'ordinary job duties[]'. . . . In particular, the use of the adjective 'ordinary'—which the court repeated nine times—could signal a narrowing of the realm of employee speech left unprotected by Garcetti. Neither Garcetti nor any other previous Supreme Court case had added 'ordinary' as a qualifier. . . But we need not resolve that question today. As the Court noted in Lane—and went on to hold in that case—even if speech is protected by the First Amendment, a court must dismiss claims against a government official in his personal capacity if the official is entitled to qualified immunity. . . . In Lane, the Court found that precedent in the Eleventh Circuit, in which the case was brought, 'did not preclude [the defendant] from reasonably holding that belief. And no decision of this Court was sufficiently clear to cast doubt on the controlling Eleventh Circuit precedent.'. . As we held in Part II.B, under this circuit's Winder test, Mpoy's email constituted unprotected employee speech. (And no Supreme Court case at the time 'cast doubt' on that precedent.) A fortiori, the defendants could reasonably have believed that they could fire Mpoy on account of that email. . .Indeed, even if we are wrong in concluding as a matter of law that the email 'report[ed] conduct that interfere[d] with his job responsibilities,'. . . it surely would not have been unreasonable for the defendants to believe that it did, and hence that it was lawful to fire Mpoy under Winder. There is one further wrinkle to consider. The question under the qualified immunity doctrine is whether the official violated a right that was 'clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct,' and thus whether the defendants 'could reasonably have believed, at the time [they] fired' Mpoy that his speech was unprotected. . . Winder was decided approximately a year after the defendants fired Mpoy, and hence could not itself have been the basis for reasonable belief on the part of the defendants. But Winder said that the test it was articulating was the consistent holding of 'our cases applying Garcetti,'. . . and all of the cases Winder cited were decided before Mpoy was fired. Accordingly, because this court read its preexisting law as yielding the test we announced in Winder, it could not have been unreasonable for the defendants to do so as well. Presswood and Rhee are therefore entitled to qualified immunity.")

Amobi v. District of Columbia Dept. of Corrections, 755 F.3d 980, 993 (D.C. Cir. 2014) (" '[M]alicious prosecution is actionable under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 to the extent that the defendant's actions cause the plaintiff to be unreasonably "seized" without probable cause, in violation of the Fourth Amendment." Pitt, 491 F.3d at 511. Nevertheless, because the relevant conduct at issue in this case occurred before we issued our decision in Pitt [v. District of Columbia, 491 F.3d 494 (D.C. Cir. 2007)], clearly establishing malicious prosecution as a violation of constitutional rights, qualified immunity is appropriate here.")

Moore v. Hartman, 704 F.3d 1003, 1004 (D.C. Cir. 2013) (per curiam) ("The Supreme Court has directed this court to determine whether our decision in Moore v. Hartman, 644 F.3d 415 (D.C.Cir.2011) ("Moore V "), holding that 'probable cause is not an element of the First Amendment right allegedly violated' in a retaliatory prosecution suit, id. at 423, remains good law in light of Reichle v. Howards, —— U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012). There, in examining whether the law governing retaliatory arrest claims was clearly established in the Tenth Circuit in 2006, the Court expressly declined to decide whether the absence-of-probable-cause requirement identified in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 265–66, 126 S.Ct. 1695, 164 L.Ed.2d 441 (2006), is 'best read as defining the scope of the First Amendment right or as simply establishing a prerequisite for recovery.' Reichle, 132 S.Ct. at 2096 n. 6. Instead, the Court hinged its decision in Reichle on the fact that Hartman unsettled Tenth Circuit precedent that had conflated retaliatory arrest and retaliatory prosecution claims. See id. at 2094–96. Because it was uncertain whether the Tenth Circuit's retaliatory arrest law remained clearly established, the defendants in Reichle were entitled to qualified immunity. The Court in Reichle was thus agnostic on the issue central to our holding in Moore V. Because retaliatory arrest and retaliatory prosecution are distinct constitutional violations and because the precedent in this Circuit clearly established in 1988, when the challenged conduct by the Postal Inspectors took place, the contours of the First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory prosecution, nothing in Reichle changes our conclusion that the absence-of-probable-cause requirement is not 'an element of a First Amendment retaliation violation.' Moore V, 644 F.3d at 424. If the Postal Inspectors believe that the Court in Reichle meant to decide what it refused to decide in Hartman and bring to a halt this three decades old case involving evidence that, unlike in Reichle where probable cause was conceded, 'comes close to the proverbial smoking gun,' Moore v. Hartman, 388 F.3d 871, 884 (D.C.Cir.2004) (" Moore III "), they are free to once again petition for certiorari and ask the Supreme Court if it wishes to end this saga.")

Moore v. Hartman, 704 F.3d 1003, 1004 (D.C. Cir. 2013) (Kavanaugh, J., dissenting) ("In its recent decision in Reichle v. Howards, —— U.S. ——, 132 S.Ct. 2088, 182 L.Ed.2d 985 (2012), the Supreme Court indicated that it is not clear whether the absence-of-probable-cause requirement identified in Hartman v. Moore, 547 U.S. 250, 252, 126 S.Ct. 1695, 164 L.Ed.2d 441 (2006), is 'best read as defining the scope of the First Amendment right or as simply establishing a prerequisite for recovery.' Reichle, 132 S.Ct. at 2096 n. 6. Because the First Amendment law on this point is not clear, the defendants in this case cannot be said to have violated 'clearly established' First Amendment law. Therefore, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity, and the suit may not proceed. I respectfully dissent.")

> [Post-mortem on Moore: Moore v. Hartman, No. CV 92-2288, 2015 WL 1812852, at *90-91 (D.D.C. Apr. 17, 2015) ("After a 'herculean effort,' see Moore V, 644 F.3d at 427, and a 'procedural history portending another Jarndyce v. Jarndyce,' Hartman, 547 U.S. at 256, 126 S.Ct. 1695, the plaintiff received his days in court. While the plaintiff's claims may have been sufficient to survive the pleadings, the trial evidence revealed the plaintiff's claims to lack any persuasive force. . . .In sum, rather than produce a smoking gun, the plaintiff's trial evidence produced much hot air that was insufficient to sustain his claims. As a result, and for the reasons explained above, the Court again—as two other Judges on this Court previously held—denies the plaintiff's FTCA claim and enters judgment in favor of the United States. As a consequence of the plaintiff's failed FTCA claim, the plaintiff's request for a new trial on his Bivens claim is rendered moot. In any event, having received one jury trial on his claim for retaliatory inducement to prosecution, the plaintiff presents no grounds that would justify a second jury trial. Thus, even if the plaintiff's Bivens claim were not otherwise barred, the plaintiff would not be entitled to a new trial.

As the Supreme Court noted over sixty years ago, '[t]here must be an end to litigation someday....' Ackermann v. United States, 340 U.S. 193, 198, 71 S.Ct. 209, 95 L.Ed. 207 (1950). While this has no doubt been a long and arduous journey for the plaintiff, the journey was no shorter or any easier for the defendants. For the past twenty-five years, this litigation has cast a shadow over the careers, retirements, and estates, of the Postal Inspectors targeted by the plaintiff in this suit—only to have their long ago actions and motives vindicated at trial by two separate fact-finders. At trial, the plaintiff requested approximately one-quarter billion dollars in damages, an 'astronomical' award based on his inflated career aspirations and the profound sense of wrong the plaintiff believes himself to have suffered for what he discounts as merely 'look[ing] like we made some bad decisions on people.'. . Having examined the totality of the evidence presented at trial, the plaintiff not only made 'bad decisions,' but those bad decisions helped fund a corrupt scheme that cost taxpayers millions of dollars. The indictment at issue in this case was not premised on retaliation or malice, but resulted from a diligent and comprehensive investigation following the corrupt payments back to their source. In this case, the evidence led directly to the plaintiff. For the reasons set forth above, the plaintiff's claims are denied. An appropriate Order accompanies this Memorandum Opinion.")]

Atherton v. District of Columbia Office of the Mayor, 706 F.3d 512, 515, 516 (D.C. Cir. 2013) ("We agree with the District Court in substance. Assuming arguendo that Mathews requires a judicial determination and formal process prior to dismissal from a grand jury, no reasonable official in Appellees' position would have understood those requirements to be 'clearly established' as a constitutional matter. . . . Here, the procedural due process owed a grand juror seems as unclear today as it was over a decade ago when Atherton was dismissed from jury service on April 11, 2001. The parties have cited no cases directly on point and this Court has found just one of passing resemblance.")

International Action Center v. United States, 365 F.3d 20, 25 (D.C. Cir. 2004) ("It does no good to allege that police officers violated the right to free speech, and then conclude that the right to free speech has been 'clearly established' in this country since 1791. Instead, courts must 'define the right to a degree that would allow officials Areasonably [to] anticipate when their conduct may give rise to liability for damages"....' The district court ruled that the MPD supervisors were not entitled to qualified immunity on plaintiffs' inaction theory because plaintiffs had alleged that 'it was 'highly likely,' given the circumstances at the Navy Memorial on January 20, 2001, that the MPD officers would violate citizens' constitutional rights.' . . But applying a basis for liability at such a level of generality – a duty dependent upon 'the circumstances of the case' or arising 'from the surrounding circumstances' – is not faithful to the teaching of the Supreme Court in Anderson or this court in Butera.").

Butera v. District of Columbia, 235 F.3d 637, 647, 652, 654 (D.C. Cir. 2001) ("Under the first stage of the Wilson inquiry–whether the plaintiff has asserted the relevant constitutional rights at the appropriate level of specificity–we conclude, consistent with the Supreme Court's instructions in Anderson and Wilson, that the district court erred by defining the constitutional rights as Eric Butera's right to life, bodily integrity, personal security, and personal privacy, and as Terry Butera's 'liberty interest' in the companionship of her son. Although courts have acknowledged the existence of these general rights in certain circumstances, . . . they are overly broad where a qualified immunity defense is asserted. Applying the standards of Wilson and Anderson, we conclude that the relevant inquiries are (1) whether Eric Butera has a constitutional right to protection by the District of Columbia from danger that it created or enhanced that resulted in harm by third parties, and (2) whether Terry Butera has a liberty interest in the society and companionship of her independent adult child. This narrower definition of the rights allows a reasonable police officer to anticipate whether his actions amount to a constitutional violation. . . . Upon examining relevant case law on the 'State endangerment' exception to DeShaney, we conclude that, in December 1997, Eric Butera's constitutional right to protection by the District of Columbia from third-party violence was not clearly established within the meaning of Anderson. . . . Terry Butera's claim of a constitutional right to the companionship of her 31-year-old son has a more difficult hurdle to overcome: It fails the first prong of the Wilson test. The Supreme Court has not spoken to the precise issue, and the precedent in this and nearly all of the other circuits suggests that no such right exits.").

Harris v. District of Columbia, 932 F.2d 10 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (Rejecting argument that Estelle v. Gamble, Revere v. Massachusetts Gen. Hosp., and Youngberg v. Romeo, created clearly established right to medical care for someone taken into police custody for purpose of obtaining medical care, but not formally committed, either by conviction, involuntary commitment, or arrest, to the charge of the District).

Goolsby v. D.C., 317 F.Supp.3d 582, ___, ____ (D.D.C. 2018) ("Both sets of individual defendants have argued that their actions are protected by qualified immunity. As to the Officers, the Court agrees in full and will dismiss the section 1983 claims against them. But as to the Dispatchers, the Court concludes that a genuine issue of material fact precludes summary judgment on the Fourth Amendment claims and that Goolsby has pled an alternative Fifth Amendment theory. . . .In sum, case law suggests that, at the very least, a reasonable officer could have believed that he could permissibly temporarily detain Goolsby since he matched the suspect from a 911 call seeming to report criminal activity and fled when ordered to stop by the police. . . . Finally, a reasonable officer, having observed Goolsby flee, could have believed that he could place Goolsby in handcuffs during the detention without turning the Terry stop into a full-blown arrest requiring probable cause. . . .As with the false arrest claims, Goolsby points to no specific cases with similar facts to rebut the Officers' assertion of qualified immunity. Rather, his primary argument is that 'a reasonable officer would have known that applying any force would be excessive because there was not even a reasonable suspicion to justify an investigatory stop.'. . But as noted, Goolsby has pled that the Officers reasonably believed they were responding to an attempted robbery. As a result, they could have reasonably believed they could temporarily detain Goolsby. And even if that conclusion were erroneous, the simple fact that a detention was impermissible does not automatically make the use of force to effectuate that detention excessive. . . .As to the level of force itself, the Court takes as true the facts as pled by Goolsby. According to his complaint, the officers 'violently slamm[ed] [him] to the ground and twist[ed] [his] arm to a gut-wrenching degree while [he] screamed in pain.'. . While this issue presents a somewhat closer question than in the false arrest claims, the Court ultimately concludes that qualified immunity is appropriate here, too. For one, Goolsby nowhere points to a case with similar facts holding the officers used excessive force. This disregards the Supreme Court's counsel that in the context of excessive force claims, 'police officers are entitled to qualified immunity unless existing precedent "squarely governs" the specific facts at issue.'. ._. And this omission is particularly problematic since the level of force, as pled, does not rise to the level that the Supreme Court or the D.C. Circuit has clearly established as a constitutional violation, namely the use of force after an individual has already been placed in handcuffs or otherwise subdued. . . . Nor does Goolsby point to cases from other courts of appeals that would suggest any injury here clearly rendered the use of force excessive. Given this absence of cases with similar facts indicating force similar to that used here resulting in 'severe injuries' was excessive, any constitutional violation was not clearly established. To conclude, the Officers' conduct alleged here falls within a gray area between clearly-sanctioned uses of force from cases such as Wasserman, Oberwetter, and Scott and clearly-excessive uses of force from cases such as Johnson. As such, and given the similarity of these facts to those in Wasserman and Scott, a reasonable officer could have concluded the use of force alleged here was reasonable. The Court therefore must accord the Officers qualified immunity for their alleged conduct. . . . Since the Dispatchers are not alleged to have authorized the Officers' conduct or approved of it—indeed, they were not physically present during any of the events that occurred and have no supervisory or other authority over the Officers—the argument is simply that the Dispatchers' affirmative act of providing false or misleading information to the Officers set in effect a chain of events leading to Goolsby being unlawfully arrested and subjected to excessive force. . . The Dispatchers respond that they should be granted summary judgment because their actions are protected by qualified immunity. . . In their view, no cases put them on notice that 'in providing incorrect information to police officers [they] could be held liable for the constitutional torts of the officers.'. . The Court ultimately concludes that qualified immunity is appropriate as to Goolsby's excessive force claims against the Dispatchers, but that a genuine issue of material fact precludes summary judgment as to his false arrest claims. . . .Beginning with the false arrest claims, the Court will again start with the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis: whether any violation by the Dispatchers was clearly established. Goolsby once more cites no relevant cases, here ones involving dispatchers held liable for false arrest under section 1983. The only relevant court of appeals decisions the Court is aware of—all of which reviewed summary judgment grants to dispatchers—held the dispatcher not liable because he acted negligently or within the scope of his discretion. . . . That said, though neither side points to it, there is a common law tradition—albeit one that does not specifically involve dispatchers—that suggests a scenario under which a violation might be clearly established. The Supreme Court has recognized that when section 1983 was passed, 'the generally accepted rule was that one who procured the issuance of an arrest warrant by submitting a complaint could be held liable if the complaint was made maliciously and without probable cause.'. . This is in line with the general tort law principle that one who instigates a false arrest, such as by directing a police officer to arrest someone without any suspicion of wrongdoing, is also liable for false arrest or imprisonment. . . Combined, these rules would seem to put any reasonable dispatcher on notice that certain kinds of false reports might violate the Fourth Amendment, namely maliciously misleading police officers without suspicion of wrongdoing in a manner that leads to another's detention. . . In light of this legal background, the Court concludes that a genuine issue of material fact precludes summary judgment at this juncture. . . . The most natural explanation for the erroneous information passed along is simply negligence or confusion on the part of the dispatcher. But it could also be the case that the dispatcher intentionally misdirected the patrol officers for some nefarious purpose. . . . Since the dispatcher's mental state is relevant to whether a section 1983 claim has been stated or a clearly established violation occurred, the current factual record yields a genuine issue of material fact that precludes summary judgment at this juncture. . . . Goolsby also raises excessive force claims against the Dispatchers. As with the false arrest claim, Goolsby cites no case law that has ever found a dispatcher liable for a police officer's use of force. Nor is the Court aware of any. While the cases discussed above might support possible false arrest claims against the Dispatchers, they provide no indication that the Dispatchers might be liable for excessive force claims. In the absence of any case law suggesting that a dispatcher can be held liable for a police officer's use of excessive force, the Court concludes that any constitutional violation here is not clearly established. Dismissal of the excessive force claims against the Dispatchers is thus appropriate on the basis of qualified immunity.")

Young v. D.C., 107 F.Supp.3d 69, 80 (D.D.C. 2015) ("In this case, the plaintiff has not alleged that any requests from medical personnel to remove any restraints were made, let alone ignored by the police, or that the restraints applied to the plaintiff hindered his medical treatment or exacerbated any pain he suffered. Without deciding whether the use of handcuffs and shackles on a pretrial detainee, who has been shot by the police and is being treated at the hospital, amounts to a due process violation on these bare allegations, the Court concludes that the absence of a clear legal consensus on the constitutionality of such restraints in these circumstances leads inexorably to the conclusion that defendant Powell is entitled to qualified immunity on the claim set out in Count II.")

Kenley v. D.C., 83 F.Supp.3d 20, 39 (D.D.C. 2015) ("Plaintiff . . . has not cited any cases in which the Supreme Court or the D.C. Circuit has addressed police officers' constitutional duty under the Due Process Clause to disclose exculpatory information to the prosecution long before trial. Looking to other circuits, in fact, it appears that there is disagreement about whether the due-process rights articulated in Brady are implicated at all where plaintiffs were not convicted in their criminal cases – e.g., if they were acquitted at trial or if the charges were dismissed prior to trial.

[citing cases and Michael Avery, Paying for Silence: The Liability of Police Officers Under Section 1983 for Suppressing Exculpatory Evidence, 13 Temp. Pol. & Civ. Rts. L.Rev. 1, 2 (2003)] The Court is, consequently, not persuaded that there was a clearly established due-process right under which police officers who were aware of potentially exculpatory information had to disclose it to the prosecution when the case was first papered or within a short time after. The officers, therefore, are immune from any Fifth Amendment claim based on their nondisclosure.")

Patterson v. United States, 999 F.Supp.2d 300, (D.D.C. 2013) ("Given the clearly established law that governs free speech and permissible arrests for disorderly conduct, and also taking the facts alleged in Patterson's complaint as true and drawing all inferences in Patterson's favor, . . . no reasonable officer could conclude that Patterson's conduct was likely to produce violence or otherwise cause a breach of the peace, as required to justify either punishing his speech under the First Amendment or arresting him for disorderly conduct. . .There is a significant body of jurisprudence that addresses the confluence of these First and Fourth Amendment violations in the context of arrests for disorderly conduct under the D.C.Code, and these cases outline the parameters of permissible police action in circumstances that are similar to those at issue here. . . . In short, because no reasonable officer could conclude that there was probable cause to believe that Patterson was committing disorderly conduct on the facts as alleged in the complaint, the complaint ably supports the claim that Patterson was arrested in retaliation for his protected speech and that the individual officers therefore violated Patterson's clearly established First and Fourth Amendment rights. . . Consequently, the individual defendants have not satisfied Saucier's qualified immunity test. . . .Undaunted, the individual defendants strenuously dispute the 'clearly established' nature of Mr. Patterson's alleged First Amendment right to be free from retaliatory arrest under the circumstances presented in the complaint. . . But this argument plainly puts the cart before the horse because the constitutional right that Defendants deem unclear and unestablished is the right to be free from a retaliatory arrest that is otherwise supported by probable cause. . . Plaintiffs make no such allegation here, and Defendants do not address whether the right to be free of retaliatory arrest in the absence of probable cause is clearly established. Moreover, as explained above, it is clear from the D.C. Circuit's Dellums opinion that the right to be free from a retaliatory arrest in the absence of probable cause is clearly established in this jurisdiction. In other words, in the D.C. Circuit, a police officer is unquestionably on notice that arresting a speaker solely based on the content of his speech and without probable cause to believe that he has committed a crime is a violation of the First Amendment.")

Shaw v. District of Columbia, 944 F.Supp.2d 43, 57-59 (D.D.C. 2013) ("In the end, the ultimate question for purposes of qualified immunity is whether a reasonable officer would have known that the searches of plaintiff were unreasonable. Based on the alleged facts, which must at this stage be accepted as true, the Court concludes that a reasonable officer would have known that a cross-gender search of a female detainee by male USMS employees that included intimate physical contact, exposure of private body parts, and verbal harassment, all in front of male detainees and male USMS employees in the absence of an emergency, was unreasonable. . . . Accordingly, the Court concludes that plaintiff has alleged a violation of clearly established Fourth Amendment rights and, therefore, that the USMS defendants are not entitled to have those claims dismissed on the ground of qualified immunity. . . . Defendants argue that they are entitled to qualified immunity because plaintiff's due process right not to be held in the alleged conditions of confinement is not clearly established. Specifically, defendants rely on the absence of any cases specifically holding that a female transgender detainee has the right not to be held with male detainees or otherwise treated as if she were male. . . .Defendants' arguments again miss the significance of the fact that plaintiff is legally a female and that defendants are alleged to have known that. Thus, the absence of transgender cases is not itself dispositive. . . . [A]s with the Fourth Amendment claim, plaintiff's 'clearly established' rights include the same rights as any other female detainee. Accordingly, the cases involving the sexual harassment of female prisoners are not, as defendants suggest, 'irrelevant.' And those cases establish that a female detainee has the right not to be sexually harassed, verbally or physically, by other detainees or guards. . . . Considering the allegations in the complaint, applicable MPD policies, and existing caselaw, the Court concludes that a reasonable officer would know that treating a female detainee as plaintiff was treated (i.e. holding her with male detainees and otherwise treating her as if she were male) exposed her to a substantial risk of serious harm. . . and, therefore, would know that those actions violated her constitutional rights.")

Brown v. Short, 729 F.Supp.2d 125, 141 (D.D.C. 2010) ("[A]t the time of the search at issue, the law was clearly established that strip searches of arrestees charged with minor offenses would, absent individualized suspicion, be held unreasonable under Bell even where the arrestee was to be intermingled with the general prison population and especially where the official conducting the search did not take reasonable efforts to protect the privacy of the party being searched. Thus, it should have been "clear to a reasonable [official]" that a partial strip search of Ms. Brown, a detainee charged only with civil contempt, without individualized suspicion, and without regard to her privacy, would be considered unreasonable under Bell.").

In re Iraq and Afghanistan Detainees Litigation, 479 F.Supp.2d 85, 108 -109 (D.D.C.,2007) ("Determining whether the defendants' acts violated clearly established constitutional rights need not require extended explication in this case because, as discussed at some length above, Supreme Court precedent at the time the plaintiffs were injured established that the Fifth Amendment did not apply to nonresident aliens outside the sovereign territory of the United States. . . . The plaintiffs seek to avoid this result by recasting the issue as whether it was clearly established that torture was unlawful, not whether it was clearly established that the constitutional right existed. . . But the cases make clear that what must be 'clearly established' is the constitutional right. . . . At the time the defendants committed the alleged violations, no constitutional right could be invoked by the plaintiffs; as a result, no reasonable official could have understood that what he was doing violated the Fifth Amendment as it applied to them, regardless of whether the defendants' conduct otherwise was illegal under some other source of law. Similarly, it also was not clearly established that the Eighth Amendment applied to nonresident aliens who were detained by the military but never convicted of a crime.").

Freeman v. Fallin, 310 F.Supp.2d 11, 15, 16 (D.D.C. 2004) ("In their motion, the defendants contend that '[i]t was not clearly established during 1999-2000[ ] that manipulation of random drug testing procedures to gather evidence of alleged drug use in criminal proceedings was a Fourth Amendment violation.' . . . Specifically, the defendants argue that there is no case law addressing whether manipulation of random drug testing procedures violates the Fourth Amendment. . . . The court concludes that there is no intervening change of law, new evidence, or need to correct a clear error or prevent manifest injustice that would warrant granting the defendants' motion. . . At the time of the defendants' alleged actions in 1999-2000, there was no question that agencies could subject federal employees engaged in certain safety-sensitive tasks to suspicionless drug testing under the 'special needs' doctrine. . . At the same time, the Supreme Court had made clear through a string of decisions issued in 1989, 1995, and 1997 that special-needs testing could not be undertaken for purposes of criminal prosecution. . . . The defendants argue, however, that this case law does not define the constitutional right at the 'appropriate level of specificity.' . . . Accepting the plaintiffs' allegations as true, the court concludes that here, the state of the law certainly would have given the defendants fair warning that their actions were unconstitutional. . . In its string of decisions, the Court–whose binding precedent clearly 'establishes' the law–made clear that the special-needs doctrine permits suspicionless drug testing of certain employees by agencies as long as the testing is performed for reasons unrelated to law enforcement.").

Polk v. District of Columbia, 121 F. Supp.2d 56, 69, 71 (D.D.C. 2000) ("Although no reported case has addressed the precise conduct at issue here, Lanier indicates that the law nonetheless may be 'clearly established' if general statements of Fourth Amendment law gave fair and clear warning to Det. Valdes that he could not delegate his authority to detain a suspect. . . . In the instant case, there can be little doubt that the Constitution forbids police officers to share their authority to conduct searches and seizures with unauthorized civilians. . . . The court determines that it would not be unfair to hold Det. Valdes liable for allegedly deceiving the plaintiffs into believing his companion was an officer, and having perpetuated this fraud, allowing the civilian to detain one of the plaintiffs.").

United States v. Edelin, 76 F. Supp.2d 1, 4 (D.D.C. 1999) ("[E]ven if a court was to find 'perp walks' unconstitutional, the defendant would still have to show the law to have been clearly established at the time of his booking in order to overcome the government officials' qualified immunity. In Wilson, although the Supreme Court agreed with the Ayeni court that the practice of 'media ride-alongs' was unconstitutional, it abrogated the Ayeni court's holding that the government was liable for its actions. . . The Supreme Court found that the government officials were entitled to qualified immunity because the law regarding 'media ride-alongs' was not clearly established prior to the Supreme Court ruling. . . Given that the Supreme Court found the law pertaining to 'media ride-alongs' to be uncertain at the time of the defendant's booking in January of 1999, it stands to reason that the law regarding 'perp walks', as an extension of that law, was also not clearly established. Therefore, the government officials would most likely be entitled to qualified immunity for their actions with regard to the defendant.").

FIRST CIRCUIT

Perry v. Spencer, No. 16-2444, 2018 WL 4182452, *3-5 (1st Cir. Aug. 29, 2018) (per curiam) (not reported) ("Perry claims that defendants violated his right to procedural due process by confining him in the SMU without adequate justification, opportunity to be heard, meaningful periodic review, or avenue for appealing his placement. He contends that the stated reasons for his placement in the SMU were used as a pretext for indefinite confinement in restrictive segregation, and that the periodic reviews by defendants were perfunctory. To prevail on this claim, Perry must demonstrate (1) that defendants deprived him of a cognizable liberty interest, (2) without constitutionally sufficient process. . . Inmates do not have a protected liberty interest in avoiding restrictive conditions of confinement unless those conditions ' "impose[ ] atypical and significant hardship on the inmate in relation to the ordinary incidents of prison life."'. . . As the Court recognized in Wilkinson, however, 'the Courts of Appeals have not reached consistent conclusions for identifying the baseline from which to measure what is atypical and significant in any particular prison system.'. . The Wilkinson Court found it unnecessary to define 'atypical and significant hardship' because it found that the conditions in that case met that standard 'under any plausible baseline.'. . .In 2012, the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court considered whether ten months in the SMU at SBCC on awaiting action status satisfied the 'atypical and significant hardship' standard. LaChance v. Commissioner of Correction, 463 Mass. 767, 776-77 (2012). Noting that the restrictive conditions in the SMU were substantially similar to those described in Wilkinson, and far more restrictive than the conditions in the general population unit, the SJC concluded that the ten-month period of confinement was sufficient to satisfy the standard and implicate a protected liberty interest subject to due process protections, and further held that the interest attaches after ninety days. . . However, the Court acknowledged that it was announcing a new rule, and that up to that point, no federal or state court decision had clearly articulated the point at which a liberty interest in avoiding segregated confinement arose. . .Noting that Perry was released from the SMU just after LaChance was decided, the district court here reached the same conclusion as the SJC, and found that defendants were entitled to qualified immunity because it would not have been obvious to prison officials in 2010 whether or at what point Perry's confinement in the SMU on awaiting action status became 'atypical and significant.' We agree. While the restrictive conditions in the SMU were substantially similar to those described in Wilkinson, other circumstances were arguably distinguishable and, while a number of courts had, prior to 2010, held that periods of solitary confinement shorter than Perry's were sufficient to give rise to a liberty interest, . . . other courts had found comparable periods insufficient. . . Given the varying approaches to measuring atypicality and the absence of any bright-line rule or consensus as to what combination of conditions and duration of confinement in administrative segregation was sufficient to implicate a liberty interest and trigger due process, or at what point that interest arose, the contours of the liberty interest were not sufficiently defined as to place the constitutional question 'beyond debate[.]'. . Further, even assuming that defendants should have known that due-process requirements attached to Perry's placement in the SMU at some point during his extended period of confinement, the level of process due in the circumstances was not clearly established.

In Wilkinson, the Supreme Court endorsed 'informal, nonadversary procedures' consistent with those set forth in Greenholtz v. Inmates of Nebraska Penal & Corr. Complex, 442 U.S. 1 (1979), and Hewitt v. Helms, 459 U.S. 460 (1983), where the liberty interest in avoiding indefinite placement in a supermax prison was at stake. . . . Perry asserts that the periodic reviews were perfunctory, noting that he received the same boilerplate notice at every review, and suggests that they were pretextual, as he was never interviewed in connection with any investigation into his STG status, was not advised of its progress or outcome, and was not told when or why his status shifted from awaiting action pending investigation to awaiting action pending out-of-state placement. In LaChance, the SJC concluded that these procedures were insufficient to provide meaningful review and safeguard the inmate's interest in avoiding arbitrary confinement in severe conditions, and held that segregated confinement on awaiting action status for longer than 90 days required notice of the basis for the placement, a hearing at which the inmate could contest the asserted rationale for the placement, and a post-hearing written notice explaining the reviewing authority's decision. . . But the SJC acknowledged that it was announcing these requirements for the first time, and Perry was released into the general population shortly after that decision issued. Perry suggests that, even if defendants could not have been expected to anticipate the precise requirements outlined in LaChance, it was clearly established after Wilkinson that the 'informal, adversary procedures' required where an inmate's interest in avoiding atypical and significant hardship was at stake had to include some sort of meaningful periodic review. But Wilkinson did not set any standards for such review in this context. . . . In the absence of any authority more specifically defining the review requirements in these circumstances, Perry cannot show that no official could reasonably have believed the review was adequate. . . . In sum, at the time Perry was confined in the SMU on awaiting action status, it was not clearly established whether or at what point a protected liberty interest arose, and the procedural protections required in that circumstance had been defined only at a high level of generality. Defendants were therefore entitled to qualified immunity.") McKenney v. Mangino, 873 F.3d 75, 81-83 (1st Cir. 2017) ("[D]efendants who invoke our limited power of interlocutory review to redress denials of qualified immunity must be prepared to accept the facts in the light most favorable to the plaintiff and 'develop the argument that, even drawing all the inferences as the district court concluded a jury permissibly could, they are entitled to judgment as a matter of law.'. . In other words, an appellant must explain why he is entitled to qualified immunity even if one assumes that the district court properly analyzed the facts. . . .Here, the defendant concentrates on the second step of the qualified immunity paradigm and faults the district court for failing to identify a sufficiently similar case that would have served to place him on notice that his use of deadly force violated clearly established Fourth Amendment law. . . In his view, the contours of the relevant Fourth Amendment law were so blurred at the time that he shot McKenney that he is deserving of qualified immunity. We have jurisdiction to consider this purely legal asseveration. . . Jurisdiction notwithstanding, this argument lacks force. Although the district court frankly acknowledged that it could not find '[a] case presenting a nearly identical alignment of facts,'. . . such an exacting degree of precision is not required to thwart a qualified immunity defense. To be sure, 'the clearly established law' employed in a qualified immunity analysis 'must be particularized to the facts of the case.'. . This instruction fits hand in glove with the Supreme Court's warning that, when dealing with qualified immunity, we should not over-rely on precedents that are 'cast at a high level of generality.'. . . Even so, there need not be 'a case directly on point' to satisfy the second step of the qualified immunity paradigm. . . The test is whether existing case law has 'placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . In some cases, 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . What counts is whether precedents existing at the time of the incident 'establish the applicable legal rule with sufficient clarity and specificity to put the official on notice that his contemplated course of conduct will violate that rule.'. .The Court's landmark decisions in Graham and Garner, which articulate generalized standards for excessive force liability under the Fourth Amendment, 'do not by themselves create clearly established law outside an obvious case.'. . But taking the facts and the reasonable inferences therefrom in the light most favorable to the plaintiff, the threat presented lacked immediacy and alternatives short of lethal force remained open. Seen in that light, this was a case in which the feasibility of a more measured approach was apparent. Moreover, the district court did precisely what the Supreme Court has instructed courts to do: it focused on 'the specific context of the case.'. . With that context in mind, it relied on well-settled precedents addressing the lawfulness of using deadly force against an individual who was suicidal, armed, slow in gait, some distance away from the officer, and had received no commands or warnings for several minutes. . . . We conclude, without serious question, that the precedents identified by the district court and those discussed supra gave the defendant fair warning that, if the facts were as the plaintiff claimed them to be, his use of deadly force against McKenney offended clearly established Fourth Amendment law—and an objectively reasonable officer would have realized as much. Therefore, the district court properly concluded that the absence of a precedent on all fours was not dispositive.")

Morse v. Cloutier, 869 F.3d 16, 27-30 (1st Cir. 2017) ("Given the two determinations we have thus far reached — that the district court's exigent circumstances assessment is unreviewable at this juncture and that Morse (unlike the suspect in Santana) was not in a public place at the critical time — we hold that the facts, taken in the light most favorable to the plaintiffs, make out a violation of a constitutional right. . . Accordingly, we proceed to the next step of the qualified immunity paradigm and consider whether the applicable law was so clearly established that no reasonable officer would have entered the plaintiffs' home without a warrant. . . .Payton and its progeny clarify a matter of Fourth Amendment law that Joyce, which relied on the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity paradigm, left unaddressed: namely, the doorway arrest exception recognized in Santana does not apply in a case in which a door was never opened, the person behind the door (screen door though it was) was first observed by law enforcement while he was behind that door, and no exigent circumstances existed. Of greater relevance here, this steadily growing stockpile of precedent makes pellucid that Payton, by 2009, constituted both a firm line and a bright line. Put simply, it constituted clearly established law. That clearly established law was sufficient to give reasonable police officers fair and clear warning that using force to enter the plaintiffs' home to effectuate Morse's arrest — without either a warrant or a reasonable basis for believing that exigent circumstances existed — would violate his Fourth Amendment rights. The fact that the Supreme Court has not yet considered the precise factual scenario that the defendants faced does not demand a different conclusion. After all, the Court has recognized that 'general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning.'. . The Court added that 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . This is such a case. In all events, this case differs in material respects from Joyce. At the very least, those distinctions should have signaled to reasonable officers that their conduct did not fall within the same zone of uncertainty identified in Joyce. . . .The short of it is that the situation that existed when Morse closed the interior door to his home was such that a reasonable police officer, in the absence of exigent circumstances, should have realized that forcibly breaking into the house without any sort of warrant would offend Morse's Fourth Amendment right to be free from an unreasonable seizure inside his own home. Merely because arrests near doorways may present close calls in some cases does not mean that they present close calls in all cases. Here, the defendants invite us, in effect, to cheapen the currency of Payton and its progeny and to award them qualified immunity. In the circumstances of this case, honoring their request would require us to 'disregard the overriding respect for the sanctity of the home that has been embedded in our traditions since the origins of the Republic.'. . We thus decline the defendants' invitation. Morse was subjected to a warrantless arrest inside his home, and we agree with the district court that, on this scumbled record, the officers involved in that arrest are not entitled to qualified immunity at the summary judgment stage.")

López-Erquicia v. Weyne-Roig, 846 F.3d 480, 484-87 (1st Cir. 2017) ("The preferred approach is to decide the merits question first, reaching the reasonableness question only if the merits question is resolved against the defendant. . . In this case, though, we face an unusual twist: in her answer to the complaint, Weyne admitted that party affiliation was not an appropriate requirement for López's position. Hence, the district court deemed the merits question 'uncontested.' And on appeal, while protesting that she could not have conceded a point of law, Weyne offers no developed argument for why that is so. Like the district court, then, we also treat the merits question as 'uncontested.' This concession nevertheless does little to narrow the scope of our inquiry. To answer the reasonableness question-whether a reasonable official at the time could have understood López's job to be unprotected--we pretty much have to run through the entire merits analysis anyhow. We do so not to answer the uncontested merits question, but rather to see how close a question it is. Furthermore, the test we apply in assessing the closeness of the question 'is objective, rather than subjective; we focus on what a reasonable [official] could have believed, not on allegations about what [the official] actually believed.'. . Though qualified immunity does not shield 'the plainly incompetent or those who knowingly violate the law,'. . . an official cannot 'fairly be said to "know" that the law forbade conduct not previously identified as unlawful[.]' . . . With this twist explained, we turn to examining López's job to see how a reasonable official could have viewed it. . . .We need not precisely locate López's AFSI Director position on the spectrum established by the foregoing precedent. Rather, we need determine only whether that precedent 'placed the ... constitutional question beyond debate,' Ashcroft v. al-Kidd, 563 U.S. 731, 741 (2011), i.e., whether it clearly established the position's constitutionally protected status. . . .To be sure, López's position was not classified as a trust position, and 'a legislature's classification system is ... entitled to some deference.'. . Nevertheless, our precedent makes clear that '[a]ctual functions of the job ... control' our analysis. . . Here, those actual functions preclude us from finding that a reasonable official, even one familiar with the law, . . . would have found it clear that López's position fell inside the First Amendment's protective ambit. That, in turn, means that Weyne is immune to a federal claim for damages under § 1983, even if the reorganization was targeted at López because of her political affiliation.")

Miranda-Rivera v. Toledo-Davila, 813 F.3d 64, 70-73 (1st Cir. 2016) ("The Supreme Court has historically reserved the question of whether the Fourth Amendment standard of objective reasonableness or a Fourteenth Amendment substantive due process standard requiring a defendant to have a 'sufficiently culpable state of mind,' . . . applies to persons who have been arrested but who are not yet 'pretrial detainees' because they have not yet gone before a magistrate judge for a probable cause hearing. . . At the time of the district court's decision, other circuits were split over this question. [collecting cases]The First Circuit has not yet answered the question, although some district courts within the First Circuit have applied the majority rule. . . Since then, the Supreme Court has held that the appropriate standard for a pretrial detainee's Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim is simply objective reasonableness. . . . Since Kingsley has extended the objective reasonableness standard for use of force from the arrest stage through the probable cause hearing, whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment standard applies presents less of a problem in cases like this one than before. In this case, the district court 'identif[ied] the specific constitutional right allegedly infringed by the challenged application of force,'. . . as the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable seizures. The parties do not challenge that holding, and we have no reason to do so as the alleged use of excessive force here occurred while Officers Pérez and Rivera were transporting Rojas to the police station and then to a jail cell. Given these facts, and given the authority favoring the application of the Fourth Amendment to similar factual scenarios, we apply the Fourth Amendment standard to Rojas's excessive force claim. . . . Since there is sufficient evidence to make out an excessive force claim, Pérez is not entitled to qualified immunity on the first ground. Nor is Officer Pérez entitled to qualified immunity on the 'clearly established' ground. The district court stated in a footnote that Defendants may be entitled to qualified immunity because it was unclear in 2007 which constitutional standard governed arrestees' excessive force claims in the First Circuit. We are not persuaded. The main difference between the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendment excessive force standards prior to Kingsley was whether, in retrospect, we inquire into an officer's subjective mindset. However, at their core, both the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments are concerned with whether an officer's actions depart from what a reasonable officer would do, and whether those actions serve some legitimate governmental purpose. . . A reasonable officer faced with the question of what to do with Rojas would have known that using more force than necessary violated both of those standards and therefore a clearly established constitutional rule to use force in the way that the officers here appear to have done. Here, during the entire time period in which the officers are alleged to have applied excessive force to Rojas (i.e., from Rojas's arrest to his death in the holding cell), Rojas was handcuffed and did not pose a great physical threat to the officers. The record suggests that Rojas initially appeared paranoid, screaming incoherently, and that, while handcuffed, he attempted to resist being transported to the police station and being incarcerated. There is sufficient evidence for a reasonable jury to conclude that the officers used force that resulted in disproportionately severe injuries to Rojas—e.g., multiple lacerations, contusions, and abrasions throughout his body—and ultimately in his death. We therefore conclude that, regardless of whether the Fourth or Fourteenth Amendment applied after his arrest, a reasonable officer would have known that using force in the way that the officers here appear to have done in the particular factual circumstances that they encountered violated Rojas's constitutional rights. . . Accordingly, Pérez is not entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim.") Matalon v. Hynnes, 806 F.3d 627, 634-36 (1st Cir. 2015) ("Although we do not decide the question, we assume, favorably to O'Neill, that the community caretaking exception may apply to warrantless residential searches. Even on this favorable assumption, O'Neill's claim founders. In MacDonald—the case upon which O'Neill primarily relies—local police responded to a telephone call from a person concerned that her neighbor's door was open though he was not home. . . Unable to contact the resident, the police entered the home and, once inside, found evidence of marijuana cultivation. . .We concluded that the officers were entitled to qualified immunity because their entry into the home was arguably within the scope of the community caretaking exception. . .Wresting from their contextual moorings our statements in MacDonald that the doctrine was 'nebulous' and surrounded by 'rampant uncertainty,'. . . O'Neill submits that this lack of certitude shields her actions. But this uncertainty does not assist O'Neill's cause: while the parameters of the community caretaking exception are nebulous in some respects (such as whether the exception applies at all to residential searches), the heartland of the exception is reasonably well defined. Some attempts to invoke the exception plainly fall outside this heartland. This is such a case. As we explain below, a reasonable officer standing in O'Neill's shoes should have known that her warrantless entry was not within the compass of the community caretaking exception and, thus, that her intrusion into the plaintiff's home abridged his constitutional rights. . . .Here, the record establishes beyond hope of contradiction that O'Neill was engaged in a quintessential criminal investigation activity—the pursuit of a fleeing felon in the immediate aftermath of a robbery—when she ordered the search of the plaintiff's home. O'Neill testified at trial that she arrived at the plaintiff's residence after being directed there by a witness to the crime and that she believed the suspect had fled into the dwelling. Thus, her actions fall far beyond the borders of the heartland of the community caretaking exception. . . . In sum, the contours of both the plaintiff's right to enjoy the sanctity of his home and the heartland of the community caretaking exception were sufficiently clear to alert O'Neill that her plan of action—a warrantless entry—would infringe the plaintiff's constitutional rights. Put another way, an objectively reasonable officer should have known that a warrantless entry into the plaintiff's home could not be effected on the basis of the community caretaking exception. Though the precise dimensions of the community caretaking exception are blurred, that circumstance does not mean that every attempt to resort to the exception must be regarded as arguable. . . What matters here is that the exception is sufficiently defined to place O'Neill's conduct well outside its heartland and, thus, to render qualified immunity inapplicable.

. . . We summarize succinctly. In the circumstances of this case—where the officer was indisputably engaged in an ongoing criminal investigation when the warrantless search occurred—the community caretaking exception does not apply. There was no lack of clarity on this point at the time the search took place. Consequently, a reasonable officer in O'Neill's position should have known that her intrusion into the plaintiff's home would transgress his constitutional rights. She was, therefore, not entitled to qualified immunity, and the district court appropriately denied O'Neill's motion for judgment as a matter of law.")

Morales v. Chadbourne, 793 F.3d 208, 215-17 (1st Cir. 2015) ("It was thus clearly established well before Morales was detained in 2009 that immigration stops and arrests were subject to the same Fourth Amendment requirements that apply to other stops and arrests—reasonable suspicion for a brief stop, and probable cause for any further arrest and detention. Moreover, there could be no question in 2009 that detention authorized by an immigration detainer would require more than just reasonable suspicion. Although the line between an arrest that requires probable cause and a temporary detention for interrogation which does not is not always clear, pre–2009 cases did clearly show that 48 hours of imprisonment—which is what the detainer requests, see 8 C.F.R. § 287.7(d)—falls well on the arrest side of the divide. . . . .Based on the 'robust consensus of cases [and] persuasive authority' discussed above, al-Kidd, 131 S.Ct. at 2084, it is beyond debate that an immigration officer in 2009 would need probable cause to arrest and detain individuals for the purpose of investigating their immigration status.")

[See also Morales v. Chadbourne, 235 F. Supp. 3d 388, 400–01 (D.R.I. 2017) ("The fact that there is not a case precisely on point to provide notice that, in order for an officer's reliance on information in a database to be deemed objectively reasonable, he is obligated to conduct such an electronic search thoroughly, keeping in mind the limitations inherent in such databases does not automatically qualify Agent Donaghy with immunity. . . .A recent United States Supreme Court decision does not change that axiom. Relying on long-standing authority, the Supreme Court ruled last week that '[o]f course, "general statements of the law are not inherently incapable of giving fair and clear warning" to officers, but "in the light of pre-existing law the unlawfulness must be apparent."' [citing White v. Pauly] The Court has already determined that Agent Donaghy did not have probable cause to issue the detainer for Ms. Morales. . . . Agent Donaghy turns the focus of his argument on the fact that in 2009, there were no published cases holding that an officer did not have probable cause to issue a detainer after a fruitless search of an electronic database for immigration information. Essentially, he argues that he could not have known in 2009 that he should not have relied on the database. In taking this position, he places the blame on the database itself (and, as to INFACTS, on the state law enforcement officers who maintain it) and argues that it was reasonable for him to rely on the information (or lack thereof) contained in the database. . . . Agent Donaghy is not entitled to qualified immunity because it was not objectively reasonable for him to assume or to draw an inference from the INFACTS database that Ms. Morales was not a citizen because the citizenship field was blank. As for the second database, Agent Donaghy testified that he knew CIS was incomplete and that he knew it was possible that Ms. Morales could have naturalized under her maiden name. Moreover, it was also not reasonable to assume that his failure to find a match in CIS using her married name meant that she was not a citizen. It is undisputed that ICE expected its agents to search by social security numbers when they are available; Agent Donaghy had her social security number and he did not use it to determine Ms. Morales' status. . . . It was most certainly beyond debate in 2009 that an ICE officer should not issue a detainer without probable cause, see Morales II, 793 F.3d at 216–17, and should not conduct an investigation that was so obviously deficient. His act in issuing the detainer without probable cause after a clearly insufficient search was obviously unconstitutional. The cases that Agent Donaghy cites where a court allowed qualified immunity when an officer relied on incorrect, as opposed to incomplete information in a database is [sic] not persuasive. . . A database search is only successful and its results are only reliable under a probable cause analysis if the information contained in the database is complete and if the search is thorough and based on available identifiers. ICE statistics from 2009 show that Agent Donaghy personally issued 77 detainers, 31 of which were later cancelled and only 2 led to an individual being taken into ICE custody. According to Director Chadbourne, a cancelled detainer indicates that the individual subject to the detainer is either a United States citizen or a lawful permanent resident. In other words, almost 50% of the detainers he issued that year were ultimately erroneous. Agent Donaghy cannot argue that his unlawful behavior would not have been apparent to an objectively reasonable officer. Where an individual's liberty is at stake, a 50/50 success rate is not acceptable. Agent Donaghy's conduct in issuing a detainer on an obviously incomplete investigation was unlawful and that unlawfulness would have been apparent to an objectively reasonably officer. . . He is not entitled to qualified immunity.") and Morales v. Chadbourne, 235 F. Supp. 3d 388, 407–08 (D.R.I. 2017) ("Director Wall is entitled to qualified immunity if a reasonable corrections director in May 2009 would not have understood that his conduct violated Ms. Morales' constitutional rights. In light of that definition, the Court looks at the law and policy in May 2009 to determine whether Director Wall would have been on notice that his conduct in honoring the ICE detainer constituted an unlawful seizure. It is important to note at the outset that even Ms. Morales concedes that RIDOC officials are not equipped or required to make citizenship and/or removability determinations. Her position seems inconsistent with her argument that Director Wall and/or his corrections employees should have independently assessed Ms. Morales' citizenship both when she was processed initially at the ACI on the state charges and when she returned from court, held solely on the ICE detainer, to somehow ensure that the detention was constitutional. And while the law across the circuits is clear today that the RIDOC was not required to detain Ms. Morales pursuant to the ICE investigatory detainer, it was not so clearly established in 2009 such that Director Wall acted unreasonably in honoring the detainer. See Orellana v. Nobles Cty., No. CV 15–3852 ADM/SER, 230 F.Supp.3d 934, 939–41, 2017 WL 72397, at *4 (D. Minn. Jan. 6, 2017) (legality *408 of ICE detainers has shifted, citing several 2014 court decisions that held a detainer was a mere request rather than a mandatory requirement); Galarza v. Szalczyk, Civil Action No. 10–cv–06815, 2012 WL 1080020 (E.D. Pa. Mar. 30, 2012), vacated and remanded by Galarza v. Szalczyk, 745 F.3d 634 (3d Cir. 2014); Rios–Quiroz v. Williamson Cty., TN, No. 3–11–1168, 2012 WL 3945354 (M.D. Tenn. Sept. 10, 2012). The Court has previously found, and the First Circuit confirmed, that there could be no question in 2009 that immigration detainers had to be issued based on probable cause. Morales II, 793 F.3d at 211. Therefore, when the State was confronted in 2009 with an ICE-issued detainer, it would have been reasonable for it to assume that ICE had probable cause to issue it. Director Wall has consistently maintained and the facts established that he believed that RIDOC's long-standing policy of honoring ICE detainers was legal and not capable of violating any individual's constitutional rights. Moreover, in 2009 it was reasonable to assume that honoring the ICE detainer was mandatory. This is especially true here where the language of the detainer itself, citing federal law, stated that it was mandatory. See 8 C.F.R. § 287.7 (section "requires that you detain the alien for a period not to exceed 48 hours ... to provide adequate time for DHS to assume custody of the alien."). Indeed, before 2009, most state and local law enforcement in New England, honored ICE detainers without independently assessing probable cause, and it was ICE's expectation that the states would hold individuals when ICE issued a detainer. . . Therefore, the Court finds that it was reasonable for Director Wall and RIDOC to conclude in 2009 that the ICE detainer it received was valid, supported by probable cause, and mandatory. His 'reasonable, although mistaken, conclusion about the lawfulness of [his] conduct' does not subject him to personal liability. . . . In light of the facts and the law, the Court finds that based on the totality of the circumstances and undisputed facts, Director Wall is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")]

Gericke v. Begin, 753 F.3d 1, 5-10 (1st Cir. 2014) ("The issue before us is whether it was clearly established that Gericke was exercising a First Amendment right when she attempted to film Sergeant Kelley during the traffic stop. If she was not exercising a First Amendment right, or, on her facts, a reasonable officer could have concluded that she was not, then the officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . . On appeal, the officers argue both that there was no First Amendment right to film law enforcement officers during the late-night traffic stop, when Hanslin had a gun and Kelley faced two cars and four individuals, and that, even if such a right existed, it was not clearly established at the time of the traffic stop in this case. . . .Gericke attempted to videotape Sergeant Kelley during the traffic stop of Hanslin. Thus, the threshold question here is whether the occasion of a traffic stop places Gericke's attempted filming outside the constitutionally protected right to film police that we discussed in Glik. It does not. . . .A traffic stop, no matter the additional circumstances, is inescapably a police duty carried out in public. Hence, a traffic stop does not extinguish an individual's right to film. This is not to say, however, that an individual's exercise of the right to film a traffic stop cannot be limited. . . .The circumstances of some traffic stops, particularly when the detained individual is armed, might justify a safety measure—for example, a command that bystanders disperse—that would incidentally impact an individual's exercise of the First Amendment right to film. Such an order, even when directed at a person who is filming, may be appropriate for legitimate safety reasons. However, a police order that is specifically directed at the First Amendment right to film police performing their duties in public may be constitutionally imposed only if the officer can reasonably conclude that the filming itself is interfering, or is about to interfere, with his duties. Glik's admonition that, '[i]n our society, police officers are expected to endure significant burdens caused by citizens' exercise of their First Amendment rights' will bear upon the reasonableness of any order directed at the First Amendment right to film, whether that order is given during a traffic stop or in some other public setting. . . .Importantly, an individual's exercise of her First Amendment right to film police activity carried out in public, including a traffic stop, necessarily remains unfettered unless and until a reasonable restriction is imposed or in place. . . . Such a restriction could take the form of a reasonable, contemporaneous order from a police officer, or a preexisting statute, ordinance, regulation, or other published restriction with a legitimate governmental purpose. Under Gericke's version of the facts, no such restriction was imposed or in place. . . According to Gericke, she immediately complied with all police orders: she returned to her car with her camera when Sergeant Kelley asked her to do so, he never ordered her to stop filming, and once she pulled into the parking lot, he never asked her to leave the scene. Therefore, under Gericke's version of the facts, her right to film remained unfettered, and a jury could supportably find that the officers violated her First Amendment right by filing the wiretapping charge without probable cause in retaliation for her attempted filming. . . .Gericke's attempt to film Sergeant Kelley during the traffic stop was unmistakably an attempt to film a law enforcement officer in the discharge of his duties in a public space. Therefore, as the events in Glik occurred well over two years before the events here, Gericke's right to film the traffic stop was clearly established unless it was reasonably restricted. Under Gericke's account, no order to leave the area or stop filming was given. Hence, we need not analyze whether a reasonable officer could have believed that the circumstances surrounding this traffic stop allowed him to give such an order. That hypothetical scenario involving a possible restriction on the right to film is irrelevant to this interlocutory appeal. In the absence of a reasonable restriction, it is self-evident, based on first principles, that Gericke's First Amendment right to film police carrying out their duties in public remained unfettered. . . Under Gericke's account, she was permissibly at the site of the police encounter with Hanslin. It would be nonsensical to expect Gericke to refrain from filming when such filming was neither unlawful nor the subject of an officer's order to stop. In the absence of such restrictions, a reasonable police officer necessarily would have understood that Gericke was exercising a clearly established First Amendment right. . . .Under Gericke's version of the facts, where there was no police order to stop filming or leave the area, a jury could supportably find that the officers violated her First Amendment right by filing the wiretapping charge against her because of her attempted filming of Sergeant Kelley during the traffic stop. It was clearly established at the time of the stop that the First Amendment right to film police carrying out their duties in public, including a traffic stop, remains unfettered if no reasonable restriction is imposed or in place. Accordingly, we hold that the district court properly denied qualified immunity to the officers on Gericke's section 1983 claim that the wiretapping charge constituted retaliatory prosecution in violation of the First Amendment.")

Hernandez-Cuevas v. Taylor, 723 F.3d 91, 97 n.7 (1st Cir. 2013) (Hernandez I) ("Though the question of whether the Fourth Amendment provides substantive protection during the pretrial period is a question of first impression in this circuit, it cannot be seriously argued that an objectively reasonable officer in Martz and Taylor's position would have been ignorant of the fact that fabricating evidence was constitutionally unacceptable. Indeed, we have previously concluded that it is 'self-evident' that 'those charged with upholding the law are prohibited from deliberately fabricating evidence and framing individuals for crimes they did not commit.' Limone v. Condon, 372 F.3d 39, 44–45 (1st Cir.2004) (concluding that 'the right not to be framed by law enforcement agents was clearly established in 1967').")

Drumgold v. Callahan, 707 F.3d 28, 43 & n.10 (1st Cir. 2013) ("The essence of Callahan's argument is that the affirmative disclosure obligation Brady imposed on prosecutors in 1963 was not expanded to include law enforcement officers until Kyles was decided in 1995. That is true, so far as it goes. . . As we have said, though, this case also involves the deliberate suppression aspect of Brady. There can be no doubt that, under the line of cases running from Mooney and Pyle to Brady, the law was firmly settled at the time of Drumgold's criminal trial that a law enforcement officer may not deliberately suppress material evidence that is favorable to a defendant. . . Moreover, to the extent that Callahan acted deliberately, a reasonable officer in his position plainly would have appreciated the wrongfulness of his conduct. Callahan claims that a reasonable officer would not have recognized the evidence in question as material because Drumgold's lawyer had not bothered to cross-examine another prosecution witness, Travis Johnson, on the fact that the district attorney's office paid for his accommodations during the criminal trial. However, Johnson had to travel to Boston from another state to testify, and the benefits he received were tailored to facilitate his appearance at the trial. By contrast, viewed in the light most favorable to Drumgold, see Walden, 596 F.3d at 52, the benefits Evans received had little to do with ensuring his availability to testify or, for that matter, his safety as a cooperating witness. Evans was permitted to remain in the Howard Johnson hotel for eight months, he was free to come and go as he pleased, and no one monitored his whereabouts. A reasonable officer would have discerned the difference between the open-ended benefits Evans received and the far more limited benefits Johnson received. As a result, there is no basis for awarding Callahan judgment as a matter of law on qualified immunity grounds. . . . We do not mean to suggest that a law enforcement officer can be liable today in a damages action under 42 U.S.C. § 1983 only for deliberately suppressing evidence. Non-disclosure with a less culpable state of mind might suffice. . . This is a difficult question that has engendered a range of views. [collecting cases] We do not reach this question here. Our holding is limited to the law as it was clearly established in 1989, when Callahan engaged in the conduct at issue here.")

San Geronimo Caribe Project, Inc. v. Acevedo-Vila, 687 F.3d 465, 499-501 (1st Cir. 2012) (Lipez, J., concurring) ("The qualified immunity inquiry in the context of a procedural due process claim cannot turn on whether it was clear that the circumstances fit the mold of Zinermon rather than Parratt–Hudson. The constitutional violation at issue is the denial of predeprivation process, and to assess the reasonableness of the defendant's conduct, we logically must focus on the clarity of the law concerning the plaintiff's entitlement to a hearing. It has been clearly established for more than a half-century that 'a deprivation of life, liberty, or property [ordinarily must] "be preceded by notice and opportunity for hearing appropriate to the nature of the case."'. . . Hence, if we had determined that any of the defendants in this case had violated SGCP's due process rights by failing to hold a meaningful hearing before suspending their permits, the only basis for qualified immunity should be the defendant's reasonable uncertainty about whether the circumstances presented an 'extraordinary situation[ ]' in which a valid governmental interest justified postponing the hearing until after the challenged action. . . Uncertainty about the applicability of Parratt–Hudson is irrelevant to the qualified immunity analysis because the Parratt–Hudson has nothing to do with the rationale for protecting officials from damages liability: to eliminate the risk that, in areas where the law is not clearly established, officials will refrain from independently acting in the public interest for fear of being sued. . . In sum, the qualified immunity doctrine in the procedural due process context must be applied consistently with its purpose to shield well-meaning and reasonable public officials from the burden of damages while holding accountable those officials who 'exercise power irresponsibly,' Glik, 655 F.3d at 81. The Parratt–Hudson doctrine itself denies a federal remedy to individuals harmed by the random and unauthorized conduct of state actors; the uncertainty surrounding the doctrine's scope should not be used to further extend the immunity of rogue state officials. . . . Under standard qualified immunity principles, the only pertinent question when an unconstitutional denial of predeprivation process has occurred is whether the defendant should have known that the Constitution required such predeprivation process.")

Glik v. Cunniffe, 655 F.3d 78, 85, 88 (1st Cir. 2011) ("In summary, though not unqualified, a citizen's right to film government officials, including law enforcement officers, in the discharge of their duties in a public space is a basic, vital, and well-established liberty safeguarded by the First Amendment. Accordingly, we hold that the district court did not err in denying qualified immunity to the appellants on Glik's First Amendment claim. . . . Simply put, a straightforward reading of the statute and case law cannot support the suggestion that a recording made with a device known to record audio and held in plain view is 'secret.' We thus conclude, on the facts of the complaint, that Glik's recording was not 'secret' within the meaning of Massachusetts's wiretap statute, and therefore the officers lacked probable cause to arrest him. Accordingly, the complaint makes out a violation of Glik's Fourth Amendment rights. . . .The presence of probable cause was not even arguable here. The allegations of the complaint establish that Glik was openly recording the police officers and that they were aware of his surveillance. For the reasons we have discussed, we see no basis in the law for a reasonable officer to conclude that such a conspicuous act of recording was 'secret' merely because the officer did not have actual knowledge of whether audio was being recorded. We thus agree with the district court that, at this stage in the litigation, the officers are not entitled to qualified immunity from Glik's Fourth Amendment claim.")

Decotiis v. Whittemore, 635 F.3d 22, 30-38 (1st Cir. 2011) ("At the time of the district court's order, this Court had not yet had occasion to consider the application of Garcetti, and particularly the question of what it means to speak 'pursuant to' one's employment duties. We recently considered the application of Garcetti in two cases, Foley v. Town of Randolph, 598 F.3d 1 (1st Cir. 2010), and Mercado-Berrios, 611 F.3d 18, both of which inform the analysis. . . . The instant case presents what may be a not uncommon scenario: a public employee who is hired to perform certain specific functions believes her employer is not complying with the law and suggests to constituents a method to exert pressure on the public agency to encourage compliance. The question presented by such a case is: when does the public employee take off her employee hat and put on her citizen hat? . . .Although no one contextual factor is dispositive, we believe several non-exclusive factors, gleaned from the case law, are instructive: whether the employee was commissioned or paid to make the speech in question, Garcetti, 547 U.S. at 421; the subject matter of the speech, id. at 421 (citing Givhan v. W. Line Consol. Sch. Dist., 439 U.S. 410, 414 (1979)); whether the speech was made up the chain of command, see id. at 420; whether the employee spoke at her place of employment, see Brammer-Hoelter v. Twin Peaks Charter Acad., 492 F.3d 1192, 1205 (10th Cir.2007); whether the speech gave objective observers the impression that the employee represented the employer when she spoke (lending it "official significance"), Foley, 598 F.3d at 7-8 & n.9; whether the employee's speech derived from special knowledge obtained during the course of her employment, see Williams v. Dallas Ind. Sch. Dist., 480 F.3d 689, 694 (5th Cir.2007); and whether there is a so-called citizen analogue to the speech, Garcetti, 547 U.S. at 423. . . .In short, while we cannot conclusively say that Plaintiff's speech was made as a citizen, the scope of our review on a motion to dismiss does not demand as much; it is sufficient that the complaint alleges facts that plausibly set forth citizen speech. See Sepulveda-Villarini v. Dep't. of Educ. of P.R., 628 F.3d 25, 30 (1st Cir.2010) (Souter, J.) ("A plausible but inconclusive inference from pleaded facts will survive a motion to dismiss...."). We conclude that Decotiis has surmounted this bar, and therefore the district court's dismissal for failure to state a claim was in error. . . . At the time of Whittemore's alleged retaliatory action, the Supreme Court's decision in Garcetti was the only controlling case in the First Circuit, and even Garcetti stated that its analysis was not to be mistaken for 'a comprehensive framework for defining the scope of an employee's duties in cases where there is room for serious debate.'. . There were no decisions in this circuit explaining the scope of a public employee's employment duties and what it means to speak pursuant to those duties, nor was there a body of decisions from other circuits that could be said to have put Whittemore on clear notice. Even though the broad constitutional rule, as set forth in Garcetti, may have been clearly established, the contours of the right were still cloudy. . . . Furthermore, though we conclude that Decotiis stated a plausible claim for relief, the district court's opinion was a well-reasoned exposition reflecting a thoughtful analysis of the law as it existed at the time. This lends support to the conclusion that the state of the law at the time of the alleged constitutional violation was not clear enough in the circuits generally, and in this circuit particularly, to put Whittemore on fair notice that her actions constituted a constitutional deprivation. . . . We therefore hold that regardless of whether Whittemore did in fact violate Plaintiff's First Amendment rights, which is yet to be determined, a reasonable person in Whittemore's position could have believed that she was not violating Decotiis's constitutional rights by not renewing her contract. As such, qualified immunity is available to Whittemore in her individual capacity.")

Mosher v. Nelson, 589 F.3d 488, 495, 496 (1st Cir. 2009) ("For purposes of qualified immunity, we must decide, given the state of the law in 2004, whether a reasonable official in Nelson's position, with his knowledge of the circumstances that existed in Max 2 when Burns killed Mosher, would have understood that the practice of allowing patients to visit in other patients' rooms following morning count presented a substantial risk of serious harm to the patients. The district court concluded that, given the circumstances in Burrell, the law was not clearly established that failure to change the visiting practice would constitute a violation of Mosher's constitutional rights. The district court held that Nelson was entitled to qualified immunity. We agree. No case had held that the same circumstances that occurred at BSH or materially similar circumstances constituted a Fourteenth Amendment violation. In addition, the cases addressing a detainee's right to be free of punishment before conviction did not clearly apply to the circumstances that existed in Max 2 in August of 2004. It was not clearly established law that in the absence of a history of violence or individualized threats, a prison official's failure to discontinue a long practice of a brief period of unsupervised visits was deliberate indifference to a substantial risk of harm to a patient. A reasonable official in Nelson's place, given the circumstances and the legal standard, could have believed that allowing the practice to continue would not lead to events that would violate a patient's rights. Therefore, Nelson is entitled to qualified immunity.").

Lopez-Quinones v. Puerto Rico Nat. Guard, 526 F.3d 23, 27, 28 (1st Cir. 2008) ("The crucial question here is whether a reasonable official acting at the time of Lopez' termination should have known on what side of the Elrod/Branti line Lopez' own position fell. . . Largely for prudential reasons, the test is not subjective but asks what a reasonable official would have thought. . . On the present facts, this is a close call but the issue is treated as one of law, . . . and, in disagreement with the able district judge, we believe that as the law stood when the decision was made a reasonable official could (albeit mistakenly) have deemed Lopez outside Elrod/Branti's protection. . . . Those reading our past decisions like Duriex-Gauthier could reasonably have believed that in general, middle managers with impressive sounding titles and duties were generally outside the protected category. . . . . Some of our precedents may suggest that even if an official has significant policymaking responsibility, he is still protected unless it is also established that the policy judgments are those for which 'partisan' political motivations or judgments are appropriate . . . . [B]y contrast, other language from our case law indicates that involvement in policy or matters implicating political disagreement is sufficient. . . It is conceivable that there are rare cases where the distinction might matter-say, a high official whose duties were nonetheless entirely technical. . . But for the most part policymaking is in the nature of things the basis for preserving the right of the democratic political process to operate; civil service protections can be afforded by statute but the Constitution does not require them. The reference to 'partisan' politics comes from Branti but it is far from clear that it comprised a separate test. . . And for his part, plaintiff has not cited any analogous First Circuit cases that would have put defendants on notice of jeopardy. Given past precedent, we cannot say it was clearly established that Lopez, a director of a significant unit within the Puerto Rico National Guard, was insulated from political dismissal. Accordingly, while Lopez may seek injunctive relief for his termination, he may not obtain monetary relief from the individual defendants in their personal capacities.").

DeMayo v. Nugent, 517 F.3d 11, 18, 19 (1st Cir. 2008) ("The district court essentially mandated that, to avoid dismissal, DeMayo find a case involving a violation of an individual's constitutional rights under the exact same set of circumstances. The proper inquiry is more abstract: whether Nugent and Lugas were on notice that 'police officers need either a warrant or probable cause plus exigent circumstances in order to make a lawful entry into a home.' Kirk v. Lousiana, 536 U.S. 635, 638 (2002); see also Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573, 590 (1980) ("[T]he Fourth Amendment has drawn a firm line at the entrance to the house. Absent exigent circumstances, that threshold may not reasonably be crossed without a warrant."). In our view, the 'firm line' drawn by Kirk and Payton provided Nugent and Lugas with sufficient notice that their entry into DeMayo's home was in violation of clearly established law. The defendants contend that the doctrine of exigent circumstances is an expanding area of law, the contours of which are not clearly established. The fact that the doctrine of exigent circumstances is evolving, however, does not necessarily mean that every situation implicating the subject touches upon the supposed nebulous borderline of acceptable conduct. Regardless of whether the outer boundaries of the doctrine are clearly defined, the defendants' conduct fell squarely outside the realm of legitimate uncertainty. . . . As explained above, the record is utterly bereft of specific facts that could have justified the officers' entry. Thus, without disputing the premise, it is a non sequitur for Nugent and Lugas to argue that because the precise quantum or nature of evidence that gives rise to exigent circumstances is not fully fleshed out in the case law, they are entitled to qualified immunity. Law enforcement officers may not violate constitutional rights, then expect qualified immunity when a court refuses to craft an unprecedented exception to a clearly established rule of law. . . . In this situation, there were no factual ambiguities or close calls that would render the defendants' conduct objectively reasonable.").

Jordan v. Carter, 428 F.3d 67, 74-76 (1st Cir. 2005) ("If we simply considered whether the law clearly established that a public employer may not penalize an employee for speech about a matter of public concern, it would be beyond debate that ample legal precedent existed to guide appellant's conduct. But using such a broad formulation to deny immunity is precisely what we have been told not to do. . . Appellant, however, urges us to award him immunity based on a similarly generic argument. He emphasizes the abundant case law recognizing that it is rare for immunity to be denied when the constitutional right at issue involves weighing various factors. . . . Appellant claims that this cannot be the rare case because the complaint depicts disciplinary conduct imposed for a mixture of protected and unprotected speech, a combination that would engender uncertainty in any attempt to balance interests. . . . Although Dirrane also presented an appeal of a motion to dismiss, it provides limited support for appellant's immunity request. We described the complaint there as 'very lengthy,'. . . and we noted allegations detailing the statements that plaintiff made, to whom, and, at least to some extent, their timing. We have none of those particulars here. Appellant could have, but did not, move for a more definite statement. See Fed.R.Civ.P. 12(e); Educadores Puertorriquenos En Accion v. Hernandez, 367 F.3d 61, 67 (lst Cir.2004). We therefore cannot eliminate the possibility that the facts once developed will show a violation of clearly established law. As we have intimated above, if plaintiffs' criticism consisted of serious expressions of concern, voiced in an appropriate manner, about the effect of their supervisors' poor performance on public safety or other public matters, and appellant's retaliation was primarily aimed at silencing their criticism for his own advantage, precedent would have clearly established that the balance of interests tipped decisively in plaintiffs' favor. Appellant is thus not entitled to immunity based on prong two. . . In the third step of the qualified immunity analysis, we consider whether an objectively reasonable officer in the defendant's position would have understood his action to violate the plaintiff's rights. . . At this stage, as we have noted, the record requires us to look upon plaintiffs' speech as significantly involving matters of public concern. Similarly, we must assess and balance the interests of the parties, favoring plaintiffs in our reading of the allegations. And, since appellant concedes that the allegations establish that plaintiffs' speech was the motivating factor for imposing sanctions, the required inquiry leads to but one result. We cannot award immunity to appellant on the basis that a reasonable officer would not have realized the impropriety of his conduct. . . . We are fully aware that the doctrine of qualified immunity is intended to protect government officials not only from personal liability but also from the burdens of litigation, see Saucier, 533 U.S. at 200-01, and that immunity is often appropriate in cases involving public employee speech. It is not an automatic entitlement, however, and a court may not cut off a plaintiff's claims based simply on the odds. Here, the record is insufficiently developed to permit a reasoned assessment of either the speech or conduct at issue, and we accordingly must draw all inferences in the plaintiffs' favor. From that perspective, we conclude that the district court properly denied appellant's motion for dismissal of the individual claims based on the defense of qualified immunity. We do not mean to imply any likely outcome as this case further proceeds.")

Torres-Rivera v. O'Neill-Cancel, 406 F.3d 43, 54, 55 (1st Cir. 2005) ("O'Neill focuses on the second step in the analysis, and he argues that in August 1998 there was no clearly established duty for officers to intervene in situations of excessive use of force by other officers except those involving an actual arrest or pretrial detention. . . This argument is simply wrong. Davis and the case law do not distinguish an officer's duty to intervene during an 'investigatory stop' from that during an arrest or pre-trial detention. The Fourth Amendment duty applies here where Ernid was seized. . . . In keeping with these principles, no reasonable officer would have concluded that this stop was outside of these Fourth Amendment obligations. . . . Further, the alternate basis of joint participant liability in the failure to intervene claim against O'Neill was clearly established in 1998. . . . O'Neill does not make any argument that this theory of liability was unclear at the time of the beating. O'Neill is not entitled to qualified immunity because the law was clearly established in 1998 that an officer in O'Neill's circumstances had a duty to intervene.").

Burke v. Town of Walpole, 405 F.3d 66, 85-88 (1st Cir. 2005) ("Uniquely among the defendant police officers, Trooper McDonald argues that he had no constitutional duty to disclose exculpatory evidence to anyone because he was neither an affiant for the arrest warrant nor technically an arresting officer (merely a searching officer). Thus, we must ask 'whether the state of the law at the time of the putative violation afforded [Trooper McDonald] fair warning that his ... conduct was unconstitutional.'. . Just as a police officer who seeks an arrest warrant despite the lack of probable cause may not 'excuse his own default by pointing to the greater incompetence of [a] magistrate' who erroneously issues a warrant, [citing Malley], a police defendant who acts intentionally or with reckless disregard for the truth may not insulate himself from liability through the objectively reasonable conduct of other officers. . . Thus, Trooper McDonald's argument that he had no constitutional duty to disclose exculpatory evidence to anyone prior to Burke's arrest because he was neither an affiant for the arrest warrant nor technically an arresting officer is unavailing. However Trooper McDonald chooses to characterize or minimize his role, the summary judgment record establishes that he was centrally involved in the collection of evidence to be used to secure an arrest warrant for Burke. . . At the time of Burke's arrest, his constitutional right to be free from arrest pursuant to a warrant that would not have issued if material exculpatory evidence had been provided to the magistrate was clearly established, as was Trooper McDonald's concomitant constitutional duty of full disclosure of exculpatory information to fellow officers seeking warrants based on probable cause. . . . When viewed in Burke's favor, the facts in the record reveal that Trooper McDonald knew the DNA analysis had excluded Burke as a suspect on the morning of December 10, but failed to communicate that information to the officers preparing applications for search and arrest warrants despite his awareness of their ongoing preparation and ample opportunity to communicate the newly acquired information. . . . Given the clearly established prohibition on material omissions by officers central to an investigation from an arrest warrant application, and given Trooper McDonald's knowledge of the crucial facts, we cannot say, as a matter of law, that a reasonable, similarly situated officer would feel free to communicate only inculpatory bite mark evidence to fellow officers seeking warrants on probable cause while withholding his knowledge of directly contradictory DNA results. Accordingly, Trooper McDonald was not entitled to a favorable summary judgment ruling on his qualified immunity defense.").

Wagner v. City of Mount Holyoke, 404 F.3d 504, 509 (1st Cir. 2005) ("The general right invoked by Wagner–to engage in speech on matters of public concern without retaliation–was clearly established prior to 1994. But qualified immunity requires that the general right be placed in a reasonably specific context; and given the facts surrounding Wagner's discipline, this is not a case in which reasonable officers, in light of clearly established law, 'must have known that [they were] acting unconstitutionally.' . . To the contrary, Wagner's broad range of complaints (some consisting of unprotected and antagonistic speech), coupled with his disregard of confidentiality protocols and his disobedience in following the department's chain of command, would have permitted a reasonable superior officer to believe that he was entitled to discipline Wagner regardless of the content of his speech, consistent with the protections of the first amendment. Even if this reasoning were mistaken, it would not have been egregiously so and, accordingly, qualified immunity is available.")

Whalen v. Massachusetts Trial Court, 397 F.3d 19, 27, 28 (1st Cir. 2005) ("We believe an objectively reasonable Massachusetts official could have drawn the conclusion–albeit incorrectly–that a budget-driven layoff effectuated by reference to performance is nonetheless a budget-driven layoff, and thus exempt from the procedural requirements applicable to terminations for cause. Although we have now clarified that due process requires that an employee who holds a property right in his job be given notice and opportunity to respond whenever he is terminated in a 'person-directed rather than position-directed personnel action[ ],' . . . a reasonable official could have taken into account the possibly (and ultimately) temporary nature of Whalen's termination and the financial crisis that triggered it to conclude that the Loudermill line of cases was not implicated. Certainly, in terms of future employment, a budgetary layoff is likely to have less drastic consequences than a classic termination-for-cause; an official focusing on the "layoff" label and the nature of the harm, against the backdrop of the "reorganization exception," reasonably may have miscalculated in weighing the competing interests. . . . In sum, because we believe an objectively reasonable official in the defendants' position would not necessarily have understood that his action violated the plaintiff's rights, we hold that the district court properly granted qualified immunity to the individual defendants.").

Whalen v. Massachusetts Trial Court, 397 F.3d 19, 30 (1st Cir. 2005) (Stahl, J., dissenting) ("At the time Whalen was targeted for layoff based on performance-related factors, the law was such that a reasonable officer, when selecting an employee for removal based on such factors, was on notice that such an employee was entitled to due process. The fact that budgetary constraints prompted the officials to evaluate Whalen's performance is irrelevant–even in this 'novel factual circumstance[ ],' the 'officials [were] still on notice' that Whalen was entitled to some form of due process as soon as factors other than seniority were considered in his being selected for removal. . . . In their search through our precedent for a perfect factual match to the facts of this case, my brethren ignore the Supreme Court's clear direction in Hope v. Pelzer that '[a]lthough earlier cases involving 'fundamentally similar' facts can provide especially strong support for a conclusion that the law is clearly established, they are not necessary to such a finding.' Id. Indeed, this same error was made by four members of this court sitting en banc in Savard v. Rhode Island, 338 F.3d 23 (1st Cir.2003) (en banc) (opinion of Selya, J.), when this Court evenly divided over the propriety of such a search for the perfect precedential match. The proper inquiry is 'whether the state of the law [at the time of the action] gave [Appellees] fair warning that their alleged treatment of [Whalen] was unconstitutional.' . . And here, the answer is unequivocally yes.").

Riverdale Mills Corp. v. Pimpare, 392 F.3d 55, 66 (1st Cir. 2004) ("The district court below erred by posing the second prong as whether 'the law regarding the necessity for a search warrant is clear.'. . This is too abstract an inquiry, at either the first or the second prong. . . The proper question is whether an officer on October 21, 1997, should have understood based on prior law that it was unlawful, without a warrant or consent, to take industrial wastewater from underneath a manhole cover on a privately-owned street, but headed irretrievably to a public sewer 300 feet away. . . .The law did not clearly establish any such Fourth Amendment right. We have found no court decisions holding that there is a reasonable expectation of privacy in industrial wastewater on its way to a public sewer. The law goes the other way. . . The most obvious analogy, as we have noted, is between solid waste left out for the trash collector, for which there is usually no reasonable expectation of privacy, and liquid waste flowing into the public sewer system. . . . Even if Riverdale had a reasonable expectation of privacy in its wastewater at Manhole 1, prior law would not have put an officer on notice that producers of industrial wastewater located underneath a manhole on a private street but headed for a public sewer 300 feet away enjoyed a reasonable expectation of privacy in the wastewater. The officers are entitled to immunity on the second prong of the qualified immunity analysis as well." [footnotes omitted]).

Limone v. Condon, 372 F.3d 39, 46-48(1st Cir. 2004) ("The appellants resist this impressive array of authority on two fronts. First, they accuse the plaintiffs and the district court of having defined the right in question too broadly. In their view, modeling the right as a right to be free from a contrived conviction–a right not to be framed by the government–casts too wide a net. They suggest instead that the plaintiffs' allegations should be squeezed into a more circumscribed mold and read as setting forth a Brady violation. . . Having erected this straw man, the appellants then shred it: although Brady was decided prior to 1967, they assert that it was not clearly established then (indeed, it may not be clearly established today) that the duties imposed by Brady apply to law enforcement officers under circumstances in which the prosecutor is unaware of the contrivance. . . . It is certainly true that the manner in which a right is defined can make or break a qualified immunity defense. Courts must be careful not to permit an artful pleader to convert the doctrine of qualified immunity into a hollow safeguard simply by alleging a violation of an exceedingly nebulous right. . . . . Courts must be equally careful, however, not to permit a defendant to hijack the plaintiff's complaint and recharacterize its allegations so as to minimize his or her liability. Here, the amended complaints, fairly read, are not susceptible to the appellants' animadversions. The right defined by the plaintiffs and recognized by the district court does not even approach the level of generality thought to be impermissible. . . . Nor does the plaintiffs' inability to identify a pre-1967 scenario that precisely mirrors the scandalous facts of this case ensure the success of the appellants' claims of qualified immunity. There is no requirement that the facts of previous cases be materially similar to the facts sub judice in order to trump a qualified immunity defense. . . General statements of the law are capable of conveying fair warning. . . It follows logically that, in some situations, 'a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question.'. . . We conclude, without serious question, that Mooney and its pre-1967 progeny provided reasonable law enforcement officers fair warning that framing innocent persons would violate the constitutional rights of the falsely accused.")

Mihos v. Swift, 358 F.3d 91, 110 (1st Cir. 2004) ("Given the facts alleged in the complaint, as described in Part I.A. supra, we have no trouble finding that a reasonable official similarly situated to Swift would have known that terminating Mihos for his vote violated his constitutional rights. Taking the allegations in the complaint as true, Mihos exercised his best judgment as to the proper course of action, cast his vote, and was fired in retaliation for that vote for reasons unrelated to legitimate governmental interests. No reasonable public official could have failed to realize that a member of a public instrumentality cannot be terminated on such grounds for voting on matters of public concern within his authority.").

Fabiano v. Hopkins, 352 F.3d 447, 457, 458 (1st Cir. 2003) ("The nature of Fabiano's First Amendment claim makes it extremely difficult for him to prove that this right was clearly established at the time his employment was terminated. 'Because Pickering's constitutional rule turns upon a fact-intensive balancing test, it can rarely be considered 'clearly established' for purposes of qualified immunity. . . The facts of this case do not present the sort of unusual circumstances that would support the finding of a clearly established right notwithstanding Pickering. As we noted supra, there is a very close question as to whether Fabiano's allegations made out a constitutional claim. Fabiano's supervisors had, on at least one formal occasion, stated a basis for distrusting his judgment, . . . and were reasonably concerned about the potential conflict of interest (and the appearance of such conflict) that his Zoning Board lawsuit entailed. We cannot say that they knew or should have known that firing Fabiano under these circumstances was unlawful. Accordingly, we conclude that Joyce and Hopkins are entitled to qualified immunity on Fabiano's First Amendment claims.").

Acevedo-Garcia v. Monroig, 351 F.3d 547, 563, 564 (1st Cir. 2003) ("Defendants contend that the court erroneously characterized the 'constitutional right' at issue as plaintiffs' right not to be discriminated against on the basis of their political beliefs during the implementation of the layoff plan. They decry the excessive abstractness of this 'right,' citing language from the Supreme Court's decision in Anderson v. Creighton, 483 U.S. 635 (1987). . . . It is difficult to divine from defendants' briefs how they would articulate the right at issue–the pertinent discussion is geared exclusively to demonstrating the absence of any clearly established rule regulating the implementation of seniority-based layoff plans. Of course, this approach commits the Anderson fallacy in reverse by construing the relevant rights/rules with such specificity that the predictably scant jurisprudence on point would never satisfy the 'clearly established' threshold. In the end, their argument is unavailing. The clearly established law both in this circuit and beyond precludes government officials from discharging civil or 'career' employees for politically-motivated reasons.").

Savard v. State of Rhode Island, 338 F.3d 23, 27, 28, 30, 32, 33 (1st Cir. 2003) (evenly divided en banc opinion) (Selya, J., joined by Boudin, Lynch, and Howard, JJ.) ("We acknowledge that strip searches are intrusive and degrading (and, therefore, should not be unreservedly available to law enforcement officers). The Roberts decisions exemplify this thinking; they hold unequivocally that the ACI's policy of strip-searching persons arrested for non-violent, non-drug-related misdemeanors, in the absence of particularized suspicion, violated the Constitution. . . The questions on which this appeal turns, therefore, involve the second and third branches of the qualified immunity algorithm. We must determine whether the law was clearly established, prior to March 17, 2000, to the effect that prison officials need at least reasonable suspicion before subjecting misdemeanant arrestees to strip searches when introducing them into the general population of a maximum security prison, and whether a reasonable prison official, situated similarly to the defendants, would have understood at that time that the policy in place at the ACI transgressed the Constitution. . . . In conducting our appraisal, we have endeavored to take into account all the decisional law, in and out of our own circuit, that was on the books at the time of the events in question. . . . In the end, we recognize that both Swain and Arruda offer valuable insights, but that neither is a very exact match. While Swain makes clear that strip searches ought not lightly to be indulged, the factual context of the case presented rather minimal security concerns. And while Arruda makes clear that institutional security needs may require intrusive measures in a maximum security setting, that case dealt not with persons arrested for relatively innocuous misdemeanors, but, rather, with hardened criminals. So long as the facts in these cases are distinguishable in a fair way from the facts at hand–and we believe that they are–then neither of them can be said to have clearly established the law for purposes of a qualified immunity determination in the instant case. . . . The plaintiffs . . . go beyond Swain and Arruda in an effort to convince us that reasonable correctional officials should have realized the unconstitutionality of the ACI's strip search policy prior to March 17, 2000. They point to a line of cases stating that blanket strip searches of misdemeanant arrestees, conducted without particularized suspicion, are unconstitutional. . . . The short of the matter is that, throughout the last quarter of the twentieth century, courts had pursued two divergent lines of precedent. This case, as we said in Roberts II, 239 F.3d at 111, fell along neither axis, but, rather, into the tenebrous middle. We are mindful that there is a distinction for qualified immunity purposes between an unconstitutional but objectively reasonable act and a blatantly unconstitutional act. . . Here, the lack of any direct precedent and the undulating contours of the law during the relevant period combine to persuade us that the constitutional violation was not obvious; the defendants reasonably could have thought, prior to Roberts I, that there was room in the law for the ACI's strip search policy. . . . Our brethren suggest that we require an exact match with the facts of previously decided cases before we will deny a defendant the shield of qualified immunity. That is simply not so. What is so is that '[t]he meaning of reasonableness [of a search] for Fourth Amendment purposes is highly situational' and requires 'a balancing of the need to search against the invasion which the search entails.'. . The cases that our brethren cite in an effort to show that reasonable suspicion was clearly established as a condition precedent to a strip search of a person in custody are no more on point than the cases, cited above, that authorize various exceptions to that generality. Given this cacophony of voices, a reasonable prison official, faced with the novel factual situation that confronted those who were in charge of the ACI, had no way of knowing which voice should guide him in drawing the Fourth Amendment balance. It is the absence of clear guidance, not the absence of a perfect precedential match, that makes qualified immunity appropriate here.").

Savard v. State of Rhode Island, 338 F.3d 23, 41, 42 (1st Cir. 2003) (evenly divided en banc opinion) (Bownes, J., joined by Coffin, Torruella, and Lipez, JJ.) ("We are deeply troubled by the weight our colleagues give to our statement in Roberts II that institutional security concerns in this case 'fall somewhere between' those exhibited in Swain and Arruda. 239 F.3d at 111. Our colleagues describe this statement as an acknowledgment that the ACI's strip search policy fell into a 'gray area' of the law. We respectfully disagree. The Roberts II statement merely recognizes the obvious: that the facts of the present case fall somewhere between those of Swain and Arruda. Such an observation is not surprising. Indeed, most cases will fall somewhere between Swain and Arruda because those two cases represent the opposite ends of the spectrum. Swain was a case involving an arrestee who was placed in a cell in a local police station. In contrast, Arruda involved extraordinarily violent convicted felons who were confined to a special security section of a maximum security prison. What our colleagues have done is to construe a dictum probably intended to soften criticism of the prison officials into a sweeping carte blanche, protecting officials for a wide swath of conduct elsewhere long since forbidden. Placing so much weight on the Roberts II statement runs the risk of creating an impenetrable defense for government officials. Our colleagues' reliance on the Roberts II statement implies that qualified immunity will only be denied in this circuit when the facts of the case at bar are the same as those in previously decided cases. This risk is compounded by our colleagues' statement that Swain could not give the defendants fair warning because it is not 'a very exact match' to the facts of this case. Such reasoning flouts the Supreme Court's holding in Hope v. Pelzer . . . .In short, they reject Swain as giving 'clear guidance' because of factual differences, while claiming allegiance to Hope's ruling that 'fundamentally similar' facts are not necessary. This seems to us an attempt to have it both ways. Our colleagues may well be correct that the strip search policy at issue in this case, and others like it, are 'dead and buried.' But their qualified immunity analysis will live on; it will undoubtedly be used in future cases involving other important constitutional rights.").

Dwan v. City of Boston, 329 F.3d 275, 280-82 (1st Cir. 2003) ("Given the objective circumstances of this case, we see nothing unreasonable about the actions taken by the defendants. It is beyond dispute in this case that unidentified policemen on the scene badly beat a black undercover police officer, mistakenly believing him to have shot another policeman, and it is almost certain that some of the other officers present knew who had done it, denied having knowledge, and supported each other's stories. The individual defendants, to their credit, were trying to penetrate this familiar wall of silence and bring the wrongdoers to justice. Dwan may or may not have had such knowledge. But what the defendants knew was that he had told a story as to why he did not see what happened, admittedly supported by one of Dwan's fellow officers but contradicted in substance by two others (who had no obvious motive to lie), and Dwan then declined to testify about the matter before a grand jury without immunity. On this basis, the defendants were perfectly entitled to begin an investigation into whether Dwan's original claims constituted false reporting and other violations of departmental regulations. Nor was there anything unreasonable in placing him on administrative leave with pay pending this investigation even though this meant he was not eligible for extra duty which would have meant more pay. Administrative leave, for one reasonably suspected of serious misconduct, is a routine measure–here mitigated by continued pay. That Dwan suffered some disadvantage–as does any innocent citizen who is lawfully but mistakenly arrested–does not make it a constitutional violation. . . . Because the individual defendants did not violate Dwan's Fifth Amendment rights, the first prong of the Saucier inquiry is decisive in their favor. And, as to the second prong, a violation of the Fifth Amendment in these circumstances is not 'clearly established' or readily apparent. Whether a Fifth Amendment right exists in the 'abstract'–as it obviously does–is not the question. . . Thus, there is qualified immunity here even if we are wrong in finding that Dwan's constitutional rights were not violated.").

Suboh v. District Attorney's Office of the Suffolk District, 298 F.3d 81, 90, 93, 94 (1st Cir. 2002) ("The district court based its ruling on an abstract right to 'familial integrity' inherent in the substantive component of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. . . . There is a danger in the use of broad abstract terms such as 'familial integrity'. The Supreme Court has warned against using generalized definitions of constitutional rights in the qualified immunity setting. . . . Articulating the right as one of 'familial integrity' casts too broad a net. The inquiry into whether a right is clearly established 'must be undertaken in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition.' . . . The constitutional right at issue here is the right to procedural and substantive due process before the state takes a child away from his or her parent.

. . . One tried and true way of determining whether this right was clearly established at the time the defendants acted, is to ask whether existing case law gave the defendants fair warning that their conduct violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights. . . This inquiry encompasses not only Supreme Court precedent, but all available case law. . . A parent's liberty interest in the care and custody of her child was established long before the facts of this case arose. . . . We have no doubt that there is a clearly established constitutional right at stake, although we have found no case exactly on all fours with the facts of this case. The difference in contexts in which the right is discussed in the case law does not mean such a right does not exist.").

Hatch v. Dep't for Children, Youth and Their Families, 274 F.3d 12, 21-25 (1st Cir. 2001) ("The Court has not had occasion to formulate the contours of the constitutional rule under which a state official lawfully may take temporary custody of a child during an investigation of abuse or neglect, nor has this court dealt definitively with the issue. Other courts have grappled with it, however, and most of them have concluded that a case worker–we use that term generically–may place a child in temporary custody when he has evidence giving rise to a reasonable and articulable suspicion that the child has been abused or is in imminent peril of abuse. . . . . We hold . . . that the Constitution allows a case worker to take temporary custody of a child, without a hearing, when the case worker has a reasonable suspicion that child abuse has occurred (or, alternatively, that a threat of abuse is imminent). It follows, therefore, that a parent's right to the care, custody, and control of a minor child is inviolate unless a case worker has such a suspicion. In this instance, the appellant's complaint (though it unsuccessfully espouses a broader statement) sufficiently identifies this clearly established constitutional right. Thus, the appellant satisfies the first prong of the tripartite test. . . . We now must determine whether the contours of the constitutional right that we have identified–a parent's right to custody in the absence of a case worker's reasonable suspicion of child abuse–were clearly established at the time of the critical events. . . The appellant contends that the right here was sufficiently defined at the time of Brown's actions. Brown disagrees, maintaining that our previous decisions, e.g., Watterson, 987 F.2d at 8; Frazier, 957 F.2d at 930-31, highlight the amorphous nature of the constitutional interest involved and thus compel the conclusion that the contours of the right were not clearly established. The critical inquiry here is whether the dimensions of the right were sufficiently well-defined that a reasonable official would have understood that his actions violated that right. . . This does not mean that a court must already have outlawed similar conduct; the test is satisfied if, viewed in the light of preexisting jurisprudence, the unlawfulness of the conduct is apparent. . . . To determine the contours of a particular right at a given point in time, an inquiring court must look not only to Supreme Court precedent but to all available case law. . . . Several years elapsed between the dates on which Frazier and Watterson were decided and the date on which Brown took temporary custody of the appellant's son. During that interval, an emerging body of decisional law outside our own circuit has shed a brighter light on the contours of the constitutional right asserted by the appellant. Although our sister circuits have reached different conclusions on the constitutional standard to be applied when a state actor takes a child into temporary custody, those decisions share a common denominator: at an irreducible minimum, a case worker must have no less than a reasonable suspicion of child abuse (or imminent danger of abuse) before taking a child into custody prior to a hearing. . . . Recent district court decisions have hewed to the same line. . . Given the widespread agreement that has developed as to the applicable legal regime, we conclude that, in the spring of 2000, an objectively reasonable case worker surely would have believed that taking temporary custody of a child prior to a hearing would violate the parents' interest in the child's care, custody, and control if he acted without a reasonable suspicion of child abuse (actual or imminent). That conclusion has important implications for this case: since clearly established law gave reasonable warning to Brown that he risked liability for violating the appellant's constitutional rights if he took custody of John without a reasonable basis for his suspicions of child abuse, the appellant has survived the second step of our inquiry. . . . While the first two steps in the qualified immunity pavane deal with abstract legal principles, the final step deals with the facts of the particular case. The question here is whether Brown had reliable information, sufficient to support a reasonable suspicion of abuse, when he removed John from his father's custody. . . . We hold that the information known to Brown when he took temporary custody of John met both the qualitative and quantitative requirements of the reasonable suspicion standard. . . Consequently, the appellant falters at the third step of the qualified immunity inquiry.").

Davis v. Rennie, 264 F.3d 86, 114 (1st Cir. 2001) ("The question is whether it would be clear to a reasonable supervising nurse or mental health worker who saw another MHW use excessive force against a patient that he or she had a legal duty to intervene. . . . The cases involving police and prison guards clearly established at least the same duty for mental hospital staff at a state institution. . . . Nurse Wiegers's argument that she had no duty to intervene because Plesh, a security officer, was also present draws too fine a distinction between the facts here and existing case law. [citing Lanier] As we have said, Nurse Wiegers could have tried to stop Bragg by calling out rather than physically intervening. As Bragg's supervisor, she had the responsibility to do so, and it is reasonable to expect her to have known that.").

Brady v. Dill, 187 F.3d 104, 115 (1st Cir. 1999) ("To determine a defendant's eligibility for qualified immunity, courts must define the right asserted by the plaintiff at an appropriate level of generality and ask whether, so characterized, that right was clearly established when the harm-inducing conduct allegedly took place. . .This does not mean that a right is clearly established only if there is precedent of considerable factual similarity. . . It does mean, however, that the law must have defined the right in a quite specific manner, and that the announcement of the rule establishing the right must have been unambiguous and widespread, such that the unlawfulness of particular conduct will be apparent ex ante to reasonable public officials.")

Rivera-Ramos v. Roman, 156 F.3d 276, 279-81 (1st Cir. 1998) ("This court has made it crystal clear, on a number of occasions, that identifying some abstract constitutional right extant at the time of the alleged violation does not itself show that the conduct alleged is a violation of 'clearly established' law. Instead, the focus must be upon the particular conduct engaged in by (or attributed to) the defendants; immunity is forfeited only if a reasonable official would clearly understand that conduct to be a violation of the Constitution. The need to focus on specific facts is so well- settled that the issue need not be discussed further. . .The closest First Amendment precedents are Supreme Court cases, circa the 1960s, that involved government action taken against individuals because of their supposed radical political beliefs or associations. These cases involve employment as a school teacher or state-university faculty member, admission to the bar, and even nonsensitive work in a defense plant. These cases provide general language helpful to the plaintiffs, but none of them involves constitutional standards for the denial or revocation of a gun dealer license. Assuming that police officer defendants 'caused' the license revocation or weapons seizure, the Supreme Court cases as of 1969-70 clearly forbade such action based on anyone's general beliefs that Puerto Rico should have independence, or on their membership in organizations devoted to securing such independence by peaceful means. Conversely, we do not think that it would have been a violation of 'clearly established law' for police officers to have sought to deny or revoke a firearms dealer license to individuals who had expressed a commitment to violence and who were members of an organization that was reasonably perceived to be committed to violence. . . In sum, we conclude that the district court's denial of qualified immunity rested upon a mistakenly abstract view of what is clearly established law and that the case must be remanded for further consideration of the qualified immunity issue consistent with this opinion.").

Camilo-Robles v. Hoyos, 151 F.3d 1, 5, 6 (1st Cir. 1998) ("We have not had occasion to address the question whether, to be liable under section 1983, a supervisor must have violated an independent, 'clearly established' right, or whether a supervisor may be liable based only on his proximity to a subordinate's violation of a 'clearly established' right. Other circuits, however, have addressed this interplay between the 'clearly established' requirement and supervisory liability. We follow their lead and adopt an approach that comports with the core principle of qualified immunity by protecting supervisory officials from suit when they could not reasonably anticipate liability. When a supervisor seeks qualified immunity in a section 1983 action, the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is satisfied when (1) the subordinate's actions violated a clearly established constitutional right, and (2) it was clearly established that a supervisor would be liable for constitutional violations perpetrated by his subordinates in that context. . . . In other words, for a supervisor to be liable there must be a bifurcated 'clearly established' inquiry–one branch probing the underlying violation, and the other probing the supervisor's potential liability.").

See also Doan v. Bergeron, No. 15-CV-11725-IT, 2016 WL 5346935, at *8-9 (D. Mass. Sept. 23, 2016) ("When a plaintiff seeks to hold liable a defendant based on his supervisory role over others who allegedly violated the plaintiff's constitutional rights, the 'clearly established' prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is satisfied when (1) the subordinate's actions violated a clearly established constitutional right, and (2) it was clearly established that a supervisor would be liable for constitutional violations perpetrated by his subordinates in that context. In other words, for a supervisor to be liable there must be a bifurcated 'clearly established' inquiry—one branch probing the underlying violation, and the other probing the supervisor's potential liability. . . As to the first step of the 'clearly established' inquiry, the violations of Gallagher's subordinates—CPS and the Bristol County Sheriff's Office defendants—were violations of clearly established constitutional rights. Doan's right to be free from involuntary medication—implicated by the allegations that

CPS defendants gave Doan Haldol even though she was incapable of giving informed consent and they did not have a court order to do so, . . . was clearly established, as the Supreme Court has stated that prisoners 'possess[ ] a significant liberty interest in avoiding the unwanted administration of antipsychotic drugs.'. . Doan's right to be free from harm—implicated by Gallagher's failure to protect Doan from the involuntary medication of Haldol—was also clearly established in Supreme Court case law. . . .As to the second step of the analysis, it was clearly established that a supervisor would be liable for the violations of his subordinates in this context, where Gallagher was alleged to have known about the constitutional violations. A supervisor can be liable for the actions of his subordinates if he or she 'is on notice' to 'ongoing violations' and 'fails to take corrective action.'. . Here, Doan has alleged that Gallagher was aware of the ongoing constitutional violations that she was suffering, had the power to alleviate those violations by relocating Doan, but failed to take corrective action. Gallagher relies on cases from other circuits holding that non-medical jail or prison officials such as Gallagher are entitled to rely on the expertise of medical personnel. See Arnett v. Webster, 658 F.3d 742, 755 (7th Cir. 2011) (stating that "if a prisoner is under the care of medical experts, a non-medical prison official will generally be justified in believing that the prisoner is in capable hands"); Spruill v. Gillis, 372 F.3d 218, 236 (3d Cir. 2004) (same). However, 'non-medical officials can be chargeable with ... deliberate indifference where they have a reason to believe (or actual knowledge) that prison doctors or their assistants are mistreating (or not treating) a prisoner.' Arnett, 658 F.3d at 755. This is what Doan alleges; that Gallagher knew that CPS was involuntarily medicating Doan and failed to take any corrective action. Accordingly, Gallagher is not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the litigation.")

Roldan-Plumey v. Cerezo-Suarez, 115 F.3d 58, 65, 66 (1st Cir. 1997) ("In earlier political discrimination cases, we found defendants entitled to qualified immunity because their allegedly unconstitutional actions took place prior to the development of clearly established law in this area. [cites omitted] This case is different. Appellees discharged Roldan on May 6, 1994. The contours of the law regarding discharge based on party affiliation grew much clearer in the late 1980s and early 1990s. By 1993, this circuit had decided two waves of political discrimination cases. At the time appellees discharged Roldan, this circuit's law regarding discharge based on political discrimination was indeed clearly established. To be sure, the law may still be blurred around the edges. But this is not a borderline case. In determining entitlement to the qualified immunity defense in the political discrimination context, we look only to the inherent duties of a position and ask whether the defendant could reasonably believe the position in question was one that '"potentially concerned matters of partisan political interest and involved at least a modicum of policymaking responsibility, access to confidential information, or official communication."'").

Joyce v. Town of Tewksbury, 112 F.3d 19, 22 (1st Cir. 1997) (en banc) (per curiam) ("The Supreme Court cases, with Steagald at one pole and Santana at the other, do not definitively resolve our own case. Even a quick review of lower court cases reveals that there is no settled answer as to the constitutionality of doorway arrests. [citing cases] Circuit court precedent is also divided, with some decisions helpful to the police in this case and others less so. Given the unsettled state of the law, we have no hesitation in concluding that the officers in this case are protected by qualified immunity which protects public officials against section 1983 liability so long as they acted reasonably.").

Joyce v. Town of Tewksbury, 112 F.3d 19, 26 (1st Cir. 1997) (en banc) (Seyla, J., dissenting) ("In sum, I believe that the officers' entry into a third party's home in the absence of consent, a search warrant, or exigent circumstances plainly violated Steagald and thus violated the homeowner's clearly established Fourth Amendment rights. [cite omitted] By hedging on this point, the en banc court not only denies the plaintiff her day in court but also invites the proliferation of such incidents. Since we will be seen as sanctioning that which we are unwilling to condemn, I respectfully dissent.").

Soto v. Flores, 103 F.3d 1056, 1065 (1st Cir. 1997) ("While this history would appear to militate in favor of finding that there is clearly established law in this area, in 1991 the First Circuit had not yet addressed the issue of state-created dangers. . . . Of course, a violation of clearly settled law may be found even where the Supreme Court and the circuit in question have not specifically addressed the question. . . However, we cannot extract a clearly established right from a somewhat confusing body of caselaw through the use of hindsight, or 'permit claims of qualified immunity to turn on the eventual outcome of a hitherto problematic constitutional analysis.'" citing Martinez-Rodriguez).

St. Hilaire v. City of Laconia, 70 F.3d 20, 27-28 (1st Cir. 1995) ("Plaintiff contends that in executing a search warrant, the Fourth Amendment's prohibition against 'unreasonable searches' requires the police to identify themselves as police and state their purpose. . . . It falls to the court to determine whether this right allegedly violated was 'clearly established' at the time of the incident. . . . Plaintiff relies on the Supreme Court's recent decision in Wilson v. Arkansas, 115 S.Ct. 1914 (1995), which held that the reasonableness of the search of a dwelling depended in part on whether law enforcement officers announced their presence and authority prior to entering, thus incorporating the common law 'knock and announce' rule into the Fourth Amendment. Assuming arguendo that the Wilson rule supports plaintiff's case, [footnote omitted] plaintiff's argument succeeds only if Wilson merely restated what was already clearly established constitutional law at the time of the shooting in 1990. . . . Plaintiff's argument fails because at the time of the shooting the notice requirement was not clearly of constitutional dimension.").

Martinez-Rodriguez v. Colon-Pizarro, 54 F.3d 980, 988 (1st Cir. 1995) ("When used in [qualified immunity] context, the phrase 'clearly established' has a well-defined meaning. It denotes that at the time the challenged conduct occurred the contours of the right were sufficiently plain that a reasonably prudent state actor would have realized not merely that his conduct might be wrong, but that it violated a particular constitutional right. The inquiry into the nature of a constitutional right for the purpose of ascertaining clear establishment seeks to discover whether the right was reasonably well settled at the time of the challenged conduct and whether the manner in which the right related to the conduct was apparent. In mounting this inquiry, courts may neither require that

Penate v. Kaczmarek, No. CV 3:17-30119-KAR, 2018 WL 4654708, at *12–13 (D. Mass. Sept. 27, 2018) ("As of 1985, the law was clear that information encompassed within the Brady obligation included evidence that was either exculpatory or impeaching. . . In 1995, the Court extended this obligation to evidence known only to law enforcement officers. . . Thus, 'law enforcement officers have a correlative duty to turn over to the prosecutor any material evidence that is favorable to a defendant.' [citing Drumgold] Defendant Officers assert that at the time of Plaintiff's trial, the law was not clearly established that they had an obligation to disclose their 'suspicions' of Burnham's malfeasance. However, it is not the defendant who defines the claims, but the plaintiff. . . As is set forth above, Plaintiff's complaint, fairly read, paints a far more damning picture of the SPD Officers' general knowledge about Burnham's thefts and specific knowledge about Burnham's misconduct in Plaintiff's case. A reasonable inference from Plaintiff's allegations is not that the SPD Officers had a mere suspicion of Burnham's malfeasance, but that they had actual knowledge of it, and knowledge that he had stolen money from the cash submitted as evidence in Plaintiff's case. When the constitutional violation alleged by Plaintiff is defined as a failure to turn over impeachment evidence regarding a witness whose testimony was important to the criminal case, it is evident that the state of law in 2013, when Plaintiff was tried, put police officers on notice that Brady obliged them to tell prosecutors that their witness, Burnham, had stolen money from the evidence room in the past and, in Plaintiff's case in particular. The law was firmly established at the time of Plaintiff's trial that Brady required the government to 'disclose impeachment evidence that could have been used to impugn the credibility of a "key' witness.'. . Moreover, the state of the law in this circuit, from 2005 onward, was that an officer's Brady obligation extended to evidence that could be used to impeach a fellow law enforcement officer. . . . Plaintiff's allegations of reckless or knowing violations of Plaintiffs' due process rights may not be born out on a more complete record. However, at the motion to dismiss stage, the court cannot find that the SPD Officers are entitled to qualified immunity.")

Davis v. Murphy, No. 13-CV-11900-IT, 2018 WL 1524532, at *9 (D. Mass. Mar. 28, 2018) ("Qualified immunity focuses on the particular conduct at issue. If courts have held 'certain conduct is a constitutional violation under facts not distinguishable in a fair way from the facts presented in the case at hand, the officer would not be entitled to qualified immunity based simply on the argument that courts had not agreed on one verbal formulation of the controlling standard.' Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 204, 202-203 (2001). This means there is a difference between articulating a precise cause of action that a plaintiff may bring and establishing that certain conduct violates the Constitution. See King v. Harwood, 852 F.3d 568, 580 n.4 (6th Cir. 2017) (distinguishing "recognition of § 1983 claims from . . . articulation of whether a given right is clearly established"); see also Estate of Booker v. Gomez, 745 F.3d 405, 428 (10th Cir. 2014) (holding right to be free from excessive force was clearly established despite uncertainty about whether claim arose under Fourth, Fifth, Eighth, or Fourteenth Amendment). While courts have struggled at times to identify the precise cause of action for malicious prosecution, it has long been established that a police officer violates the Constitution by intentionally or recklessly making false statements in, or omitting true exculpatory statements from, materials submitted to a magistrate in support of probable cause. See Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154, 171 (1978). Hernandez-Cuevas recognized that no reasonable officer 'would have been ignorant of the fact that fabricating evidence was constitutionally unacceptable.'. . As of 2004, the First Circuit had held that it is 'self-evident' that 'those charged with upholding the law are prohibited from deliberately fabricating evidence and framing individuals for crimes they did not commit.'. . Such conduct did not first become unconstitutional in 2004. Limone even held that 'the right not to be framed by law enforcement agents was clearly established in 1967.'. . 'The "dispositive inquiry in determining whether a right is clearly established is whether it would be clear to a reasonable officer that his conduct was unlawful in the situation he confronted."' Hernandez v. Mesa, 137 S. Ct. 2003, 2007 (2017) (per curiam) (quoting Saucier v. Katz, 533 U.S. 194, 202 (2001)). Viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Davis, McManus knew Sheridan was setting up Davis and even watched this setup occur on video. Then, despite knowing Sheridan's narrative was false, McManus presented it to a magistrate to secure a criminal complaint and to a grand jury to secure an indictment. If these facts are true, no reasonable officer in 2010 would think such conduct was lawful. Of course, it remains in dispute whether this is what occurred. A jury could find McManus did not act with such knowledge or recklessness. But McManus has not shown that, as a matter of law, his conduct did not violate a clearly established right. Accordingly, he is not entitled to qualified immunity on this claim.")

Frazier v. Bailey, 957 F.2d 920 (1st Cir. 1992) (relying on Myers v. Morris, 810 F.2d 1437, 1462 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 828 (1987) and Benson v. Allphin, 786 F.2d 268, 276 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 848 (1986), in concluding that a right subject to a balancing test can rarely be found 'clearly established'; finding the right of familial integrity to be such a right).

Borucki v. Ryan, 827 F.2d 836, 848 (1st Cir. 1987) ("[W]hen the law requires a balancing of competing interests, it may be unfair to charge an official with knowledge of the law in the absence of a previously decided case with clearly analogous facts.").

Allen v. Town of East Longmeadow, No. 17-CV-30041-MGM, 2018 WL 1152098, at *7 (D. Mass. Feb. 9, 2018) ("Regardless of whether the individual defendants were implicated in a release of personal information about Plaintiff that was improper under state law, Plaintiff has offered 'no support for the proposition that, as of [March 2014], this provision had a clear basis in federal constitutional or statutory law. "Mere violations of state law do not, of course, create constitutional claims."'. . Where, as here, Plaintiff has failed to satisfy her burden to identify controlling or persuasive precedent that clearly established the constitutional right to equal protection she claims was violated by the individual defendants, they are protected by qualified immunity.")

Castagna v. Edwards, No. 15-CV-14208-IT, 2018 WL 651318, at *6, *8 (D. Mass. Jan. 31, 2018) ("Plaintiffs' claims are barred under the second and third prong of the qualified immunity defense even if a jury could find the second wave officers' warrantless entry here in response to an officer's request for assistance to rise to the level of a constitutional violation. The facts do not indicate that a reasonable officer, similarly situated to Troy, Tully, Bizzozero, and Pritchard, would have understood that warrantless entry in response to an officer's request for assistance to contravene Plaintiffs' constitutional rights. Accordingly, summary judgment is GRANTED as to Count 1(a) with respect to both Christopher and Gavin Castagna's claims against Defendants Troy, Tully, Bizzozero, and Pritchard. . . .Based on this evidence, a reasonable jury viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to Plaintiffs could conclude that the Defendants engaged in a joint venture to seize Plaintiffs' cell phones and destroy the videos on them. Accordingly, summary judgment is DENIED as to Counts 1(f) and 1(g) with respect to both Plaintiffs' claims against all Defendants.")

Echavarria v. Roach, No. 16-CV-11118-ADB, 2017 WL 3928270, at *8, *11 (D. Mass. Sept. 7, 2017) ("The individual defendants also contend that the malicious prosecution claim is barred by qualified immunity, and they appear to be correct. In Hernandez-Cuevas v. Taylor, the First Circuit chronicled the long history of cases that addressed whether the Constitution affords a right to be free from malicious prosecution. . . The court went on to hold that the Fourth Amendment guarantees the right to be free from malicious prosecution, and thus 'ma[de] explicit what has long been implicit in our case law.'. . Prior to the Hernandez-Cuevas decision, the First Circuit had described it as an ' "open question whether the Constitution permits the assertion of a section 1983 claim for malicious prosecution on the basis of an alleged Fourth Amendment violation,"' and accordingly, held that '[s]uch uncertainty in the legal landscape entitles state actors to qualified immunity.'. . Since the Fourth Amendment right to be free from malicious prosecution was not clearly established until 2013, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from Plaintiff's § 1983 claim that Defendants engaged in malicious prosecution of him in violation of his constitutional rights in or before 1996. . . . Defendant Cooney additionally implies that he is entitled to qualified immunity from the failure to intervene claim because the right was not clearly established in cases not involving excessive force. Plaintiff responds that failure to intervene is a pathway to liability, not the underlying constitutional violation, and it is the constitutional right itself that must be clearly established at the time of the deprivation. While this theory has its merits, the First Circuit has reasoned in the excessive force context that 'the law was clearly established in 1998 that' an officer who was a bystander 'had a duty to intervene' where another officer was using excessive force. . . Thus, it appears that the duty to intervene itself must be clearly established. . . . As discussed supra, within the First Circuit, it remains uncertain whether an officer has a duty to intervene in cases that do not concern excessive force. Accordingly, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the failure to intervene claim.")

Thomas v. Town of Chelmsford, No. 16-11689-PBS, 2017 WL 3159979, at *14–15 (D. Mass. July 25, 2017) ("In recent years, the Supreme Court has published a number of per curiam reversals of denials of qualified immunity, emphasizing that 'clearly established law' should not be defined 'at a high level of generality.'. . While it does not require 'a case directly on point' for law to be clearly established, 'existing precedent must have placed the statutory or constitutional question beyond debate.'. . The question is 'whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established,'. . . and it must be answered 'in light of the specific context of the case, not as a broad general proposition[.] . . .Two constitutional violations adequately pleaded against the individual defendants are: (1) violation of the First Amendment by public school teachers by singling out and mocking a student in front of a class, giving him an unjustifiably low grade, or giving him mean looks on multiple occasions in retaliation for that student having previously made a report of student-on-student sexual assault, and (2) violation of the First Amendment by public school administrators by ignoring a student's reports of bullying by other students and teachers, in retaliation for that student having previously made a report of student-on-student sexual assault. With respect to the first theory, the case law is clear that the teachers' harassment against a student in retaliation for reporting a sexual assault is impermissible retaliation in violation of the student's First Amendment rights. See, e.g., Seamons v. Snow, 84 F.3d 1226, 1238–39 (10th Cir. 1996) (holding that student's reporting of sexual hazing was entitled to First Amendment protection, and school officials were not entitled to qualified immunity when they punished him by throwing him off the football team). The second theory is harder because the parties have cited no case law directly on point that supports the theory that deliberate indifference by school officials to sexual harassment and bullying by fellow students can be a retaliatory adverse action under the First Amendment. In other words, it is not clear under the existing case law whether inaction can be an adverse action rising to the level of retaliation in violation of the First Amendment. Accordingly, the Court finds that qualified immunity applies to the claim that Dean Doherty, Superintendent Tiano, Principal Caliri, and A.D. Moreau engaged in First Amendment retaliation against Matthew by taking no action in response to his complaints about harassment by other students. The Court denies qualified immunity for the claim that Siragusa, Kender, and Cole engaged in First Amendment retaliation against Matthew by themselves harassing Matthew following the Camp Robindel incident.")

Goodhile v. Gribbons, 186 F. Supp. 3d 4, 13 (D. Mass. 2016) ("As explained above, the facts present a colorable claim that Gribbons violated Mr. Goodhile's constitutional rights by using unreasonable force. The issue is whether the legal contours of the right were sufficiently clear, and whether the violation would have been clear to a reasonable officer under the circumstances. . . The pertinent question in this regard is whether prior existing case law or general Fourth Amendment principles gave Gribbons notice that it was unconstitutional for a police officer to repeatedly strike an unresponsive seventy-six-year-old man who was holding a sheathed knife and who had not been accused of committing a crime. . . The First Circuit has held that a reasonable officer who has been trained on a use-of-force continuum does not need prior case law on point to recognize that it is unconstitutional to use substantial force on an individual who does not pose a significant threat. . .Here, Gribbons was operating with the benefit of a use-of-force protocol to be applied to situations involving resisting suspects. This policy provided guidance for reasonable behavior and cited to Graham v. Connor, . . . the case in which the Supreme Court established the applicable standard for Fourth Amendment excessive force claims. According to the policy, an officer is not entitled to use a baton on a suspect unless the suspect is assaultive, meaning that the suspect is engaged in behavior that is 'likely to result in bodily harm to the member, to others at the scene or to the suspect himself.'. . Considering the facts as alleged by Plaintiff, Gribbons's conduct departed from this standard. Accordingly, he is not entitled to qualified immunity. Thus, I find that Gribbons is not entitled to summary judgment on count III. Based on the record before me, a rational jury could conclude that Gribbons's conduct was objectively unreasonable under the circumstances, in violation of Mr. Goodhile's Fourth Amendment rights. A jury could further find that a sensible officer would have known that his behavior was unreasonable and in violation of applicable law.")

Sanchez v. Mitchell, No. CV 16-10415-LTS, 2016 WL 6780289, at *2 (D. Mass. Nov. 15, 2016) ("Sanchez's damages claims against Defendants in their individual capacities fail to overcome qualified immunity. . . .Here, the law has not been clearly established that Defendants cannot restrict an inmate's access to a religious diet under the First Amendment. The First Circuit has not spoken. Cases from other circuits indicate that reasonable restrictions on an inmate's access to religious diets are acceptable, particularly where the inmate has not complied with procedures that call into question the sincerity of his belief. . . Additionally, the law has not been clearly established that Defendants cannot restrict an inmate's access to a religious diet under RLUIPA. Other courts have recognized that the law in this area is not well settled and that courts have disagreed on what RLUIPA requires. . . In short, '[i]t seems unlikely that claims on the current theory of denial of a religious diet due to claimed disciplinary infractions would be considered a violation of a clearly established right, particularly since this is a claim that appears to be the subject of an emerging circuit split.' Denson v. Gelb, Civ. A. No. 14-14317-DPW, 2015 WL 4271481, at *3 (D. Mass. July 13, 2015). Thus, Sanchez's claims for monetary damages against Defendants in their individual capacities fail.")

Mattei v. Dunbar, 217 F.Supp.3d 367, 379-81 (D. Mass. 2016) ("[W]hile there is not First Circuit law on point, other circuits have recognized that the denial of good-time credits can form the basis of a retaliation claim under § 1983 when done in retaliation for the exercise of constitutional rights. . . Finally, prior to the alleged retaliatory act, it was also well-established that mere threats of retaliation can violate First Amendment rights. . . . Thus, a reasonable official would have understood that soliciting another inmate to physically harm Mattei in retaliation for filing grievances violated his First Amendment rights even though no actual physical harm resulted. . . .The First Circuit has not yet directly addressed the question whether § 1997e(e) precludes compensatory damages in § 1983 actions raising constitutional claims. . . However, most circuits have held that § 1997e(e) does apply to § 1983 actions alleging constitutional violations, so that Mattei cannot recover damages for mental or emotional injuries resulting from constitutional violations absent a showing of physical injury. . . Because the statutory language '[n]o Federal civil action'—does not allow for exceptions, this Court concludes that § 1997e(e) precludes compensatory damages for mental and emotional injuries absent a showing of physical injury, regardless of whether the claims at issue are of a constitutional nature or not. Mattei, therefore, cannot recover compensatory damages for mental or emotional injuries suffered as a result of his alleged First Amendment violation. That, however, does not end the inquiry. Section 1997e(e) does not preclude either nominal damages or punitive damages. . . Nominal damages are appropriate to vindicate certain constitutional rights absent any showing of actual injury. . . In other words, nominal damages vindicate the deprivation of a constitutional right itself, not any specific injury suffered as a result. Thus, nominal damages are not claims for mental or emotional injury and are therefore not barred by § 1997e(e). Punitive damages, too, are unrelated to claims for mental or emotional injury. . . Claims for punitive damages are premised on the nature of the constitutional violations itself rather than on the nature of the injury inflicted. Such claims serve to punish and deter egregious constitutional violations; they are not claims based on mental or emotional injury and are therefore no precluded by § 1997e(e). . . Thus, to the extent Mattel's pro se complaint can be read to include requests for nominal and punitive damages, he may be legally entitled to relief.")

Perry v. Spencer, No. CV 12-12070-MPK, 2016 WL 5746346, at *13–16 (D. Mass. Sept. 30, 2016) ("Neither the Supreme Court nor the First Circuit has established a baseline against which the parameters of 'an atypical and significant hardship' are to be measured. . . In Skinner, the First Circuit found that immediate transfer to solitary confinement after an inmate had just killed another inmate did not give rise to a due process clause claim, given the authorities' pressing need to isolate the inmate from other prisoners. . . The inmate's 'more colorable' claim was that he was kept there for 40 days without process, but the court found that in the circumstances of the case, a 40-day placement without a hearing was not unconstitutional. . . While noting that there was disagreement among the circuits concerning to what the confinement conditions of a segregation unit should be compared for purposes of Sandin's 'hardship test,' the court did not decide the issue. . . As for other circuits' holdings, the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia recently surveyed 'the current state of the law[.]' [examining Aref v. Lynch, 833 F.3d 242 (D.C. Cir. 2016)] Notwithstanding the lack of clarity concerning to what 'baseline' one should compare the conditions of a segregation unit, in Skinner, the First Circuit suggested that a placement of excessive duration could mean that a liberty interest was implicated. . . Other courts agree that the length of time an inmate spends in isolation is relevant to whether a liberty interest is triggered. [collecting cases] There is, however, no consensus regarding what length of time in segregated confinement is required to implicate a liberty interest. [examining cases] There is no question that Perry's two placements in SMUs, which lasted approximately fifteen months and five months, (with a six-month hiatus in the Connecticut DOC inbetween), were prolonged. Defendants contend that Perry's placements in the SMU were not 'indefinite' in the sense that they would end upon a particular occurrence, i.e., an out-of-state placement or reclassification, but it seems a misnomer to claim that a time period is not 'indefinite' when in fact it is so protracted. Although the conditions on the SMUs were significantly more restrictive than those in general population, and Perry spent a very long time housed in SMUs, the law is simply unclear as to whether Perry had a liberty interest in not being placed there. Even assuming a liberty interest was triggered, the DOC asserts that Perry was provided with adequate process. As set out above at great length, the DOC certainly had many rules and regulations pertaining to placing and keeping inmates on SMUs, and for the most part, at least, followed these rules with regard to Perry: reviews were held regularly; the Classification Board reexamined Perry's situation periodically with updated intelligence received from OIS and SBCC IPS; Perry received written notifications that he was on awaiting action status and that administrative reviews of his placement had taken place; Perry filed a number of grievances concerning his placement in SMU, all of which were addressed, as were the concerns of his family and attorney. . . Perry asserts that the DOC did not follow its regulations, and that was entitled to a hearing to contest the reasons for his placement (#111 at 10). With no clear guidance from the courts prior to his placement, however, as to whether his placement even triggered a liberty interest, never mind what process was due, it cannot have been a violation of his due process rights for the DOC to have followed the procedures they did. . . . The court need not rule here on the question of whether a liberty interest was implicated and what process was due because defendants are entitled to qualified immunity. Whether a constitutional right not to be held in SMUs for extended periods of time without proper procedure was clearly established at the time of the defendants' purported violation is a question of law for the court to decide. . . The First Circuit has parsed the issue into two elements: Whether the right was clearly established such that reasonable DOC employees in defendants' shoes would have understood that their actions violated that right and, on the facts of this case, whether reasonable DOC employees would have understood that their actions violated that right. . . In conducting the analysis, the court must consider both 'the clarity of the law in general at the time of the alleged violation; and [ ]the clarity of the law as applied to the case – in other words, whether a reasonable person in the defendant's shoes "would have understood that his conduct violated the plaintiff['s] constitutional rights."'. . . The Supreme Court has cautioned that 'clearly established law' should not be defined at a 'high level of generality,' and that the 'dispositive question is "whether the violative nature of the particular conduct is clearly established."'. . In sum, during the time period at issue here, the state of the law with regard to whether an inmate in Perry's circumstances, i.e., an inmate held in administrative segregation, had a federal constitutional liberty interest at stake was murky. Neither the Supreme Court nor the First Circuit has squarely ruled on the issue. Given the variety of approaches employed by circuit courts in analyzing the question, as well as the wide range of different decisions that have resulted, it cannot be said that the liberty interest, and, therefore, 'the [constitutional] right was clearly established at the time of the challenged conduct.'. . Reasonable DOC employees in defendants' shoes would not have known that plaintiff had a liberty interest and, consequently, a constitutional right, at stake. Accordingly, defendants are entitled to qualified immunity on the procedural due process claim in Count I.")

Holloman v. Clarke, No. 14-12594-NMG, 2016 WL 5339721, at *2–3 (D. Mass. Sept. 22, 2016) ("[C]ases before 2012, when the conduct here allegedly occurred, clearly establish that an officer has a duty to intervene when another officer uses excessive force against a pretrial detainee. . . Even though the Supreme Court held in 2015 that the Fourteenth Amendment objective standard applies to pretrial detainees in excessive force cases, both the Fourteenth Amendment and the standard for failure to intervene turn on the reasonableness of the circumstances. As a result, the standard was clearly established in 2012. . . Because Holloman has alleged a constitutional violation that was clearly established at the time of the alleged conduct of Ferrarra and Maine, they are not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Doe v. Town of Wayland, 179 F.Supp.3d 155, 170-71 (D. Mass. 2016) ("Following the Supreme Court's admonition in Mullenix, the Court examines whether Moskowitz-Dodyk's particular conduct regarding her repeated encouragement of a friendship between Coe and Philip violated John's constitutional rights, as clearly established between 1998 and 2000. Without ascending to too-high levels of abstraction, the First Circuit's most apposite discussion of the state-created danger doctrine was the 1999 case Hasenfus, in particular its discussion of the factually-similar Armijo. And the same dicta which enabled this Court to hold that John suffered a constitutional rights violation also provides enough flexibility to preclude finding sufficient clarity to overcome Moskowitz-Dodyk's qualified immunity. Hasenfus specifically mentioned that 'the facts in [Armijo] go a step beyond the typical endangerment cases cited by the Tenth Circuit, cases that involve manifestly outrageous behavior by the authorities certain to cause harm.'. . This distinguishing of Armijo from 'typical endangerment cases,' combined with the expressed equivocation on Armijo's correctness, . . . underscore, at least within the First Circuit between 1998 and 2000, that the law did not clearly establish that Moskowitz-Dodyk acted unconstitutionally towards John. A reasonable officer could read that portion of Hasenfus and conclude that Moskowitz-Dodyk's conduct was not unlawful. . . . In opposition, John first argues that, for several decades, courts have recognized a right to bodily integrity, that sexual abuse infringes this right, and that state-created dangers may violate the Fourteenth Amendment. . . As discussed, however, these broad statements discuss Fourteenth Amendment rights at too high a level of generality. . . John next cites Billingsley v. Franklin Area Sch. Dist., C.A. No. 11-160, 2012 WL 259992 (W.D. Pa. Jan. 27, 2012) as an example of a court denying qualified immunity when a defendant "gave a known perpetrator of sexual abuse access to" the victim plaintiff. . . However, Billingsley relied exclusively on Third Circuit case law, and thus did not face anything similar to Hasenfus's ambiguous dicta. . . Accordingly, it has little persuasive value here.)

Morse v. Commonwealth of Massachusetts Executive Office of Pub. Safety Dep't of State Police, 123 F.Supp.3d 179, (D. Mass. 2015) ("A reasonable juror could conclude that seizing Charles Morse at gunpoint and detaining Lesa Morse with handcuffs was unreasonable under the circumstances. . . Nonetheless, the Court finds that the officers are entitled to qualified immunity on the excessive force claim because Plaintiffs' rights, in the context of this specific case, were not clearly established. . . . Charles Morse's asserted right is the right to not be handcuffed at gunpoint while under arrest for serious crimes. Lesa Morse's asserted right is the right of an innocent bystander to not be handcuffed while officers effect the arrest of another individual in the residence. Yet Plaintiffs cite no cases that would have given Defendants clear notice that the specific type of force used against each Plaintiff was unconstitutional, and the Court is aware of none. To the contrary, case law suggests that aiming guns at Morse during his arrest at least arguably fell within the realm of reasonableness. . . Lesa Morse was handcuffed by Sergeant Cloutier due to concerns about officer safety after she began yelling and did not obey commands to hang up the phone. . . Again, cases suggest that such a use of force was at least arguably reasonable. . . Accordingly, the Court must apply qualified immunity on Plaintiffs' excessive force claim. . . The Court underscores that this finding applies only to the use of force employed by Defendants after they entered the home, which Plaintiffs assert gives rise to a constitutional violation independent from the warrantless entry and arrest. For the reasons stated above, Plaintiffs' claims of a Fourth Amendment violation will survive summary judgment based on the warrantless entry and arrest."), aff'd on other grounds, 2017 WL 3667648 (1st Cir. Aug. 25, 2017)

Johnson v. Han, No. CV 14-CV-13274-IT, 2015 WL 4397360, at *6-8 (D. Mass. July 17, 2015) ("O'Brien further argues that Counts I through IV should be dismissed under the doctrine of qualified immunity because there is no clearly established law that supervisors violate a criminal defendant's constitutional rights by allowing subordinates to withhold exculpatory evidence and to fabricate inculpatory evidence, or by failing to train and supervise their subordinates in conducting drug-analysis tests and disclosing results. . . . Prior to 2009, it was clearly established by the First Circuit that a police officer could not withhold exculpatory evidence. . . The prohibition on fabricating inculpatory evidence was also well-established before 2009. . . The First Circuit has not expressly ruled that it is clearly established that a state-employed chemist similarly cannot withhold exculpatory evidence from prosecutors or present false inculpatory evidence at trial. However, in 2005 the First Circuit held that '[t]he intentional or reckless fabrication of inculpatory evidence or omission of material exculpatory evidence by a forensic examiner in support of probable cause may amount to a constitutional violation.' See Burke v. Town of Walpole, 405 F.3d 66, 89 (1st Cir.2005). The court sees no reason to distinguish between a forensic report used to support probable cause and a drug-analysis report used to support conviction. . . This court has similarly held that it was clearly established before 2009 that a forensic analyst could not withhold exculpatory information. . . Other Courts of Appeals have held the same. [collecting cases] Accordingly, the court finds that a reasonable state-employed chemist would have known in 2009 that she had a duty not to withhold exculpatory test results and that she could not knowingly present fabricated evidence of guilt in support of a criminal defendant's conviction. Even if such a rule was not established in case law, the court further finds that this rule is an obvious extension of the principle that a police officer cannot withhold exculpatory evidence or fabricate inculpatory evidence. . . Accordingly, the court reaches the same conclusion under either method of demonstrating that a law is clearly established. Having found the law proscribing a state-employed lab chemists from withholding exculpatory evidence and presenting fabricated evidence of guilt to be clearly established, the court must determine if, in 2009, a reasonable supervisor would understand that she 'would be liable for constitutional violations perpetrated by her subordinates in that context.'. . Although the court has not identified extensive case law expressly treating supervisory liability in this context, the court finds that no reasonable supervisor could fail to grasp that liability would attach for exhibiting deliberate indifference towards the falsification and withholding of evidence by her subordinates. The prohibition of such unconstitutional behavior applies with obvious clarity to the acts of supervisors who condone or deliberately turn a blind eye to these acts.")

Cavanagh v. Taranto, 95 F.Supp.3d 220, 234-39 (D. Mass. 2015) ("Although the right Cavanagh alleges is clearly established, to avoid qualified immunity the bounds and contours of a violation of that right must also be sufficiently clear such that no reasonable official could believe that the conduct of these officers at the time constituted deliberate indifference and therefore a violation of Ms. Scopa's constitutional right. . . . Under this standard, the question is whether any reasonable officer in the position of each of the defendants at the time would have reasonably believed that 'his actions, or willful failure to act, amounted to 'deliberate indifference' to the serious risk' that Ms. Scopa would harm herself. . . I consider each of the identified violations—viewing the record in the light most favorable to the plaintiff—in turn. . . . Cavanagh has not adduced any evidence that would permit a reasonable fact-finder to conclude that these defendants had actual knowledge of Ms. Scopa's risk of suicide or were willfully blind to that risk. Under these circumstances, a reasonable official in the shoes of these defendants would not believe that his or her failure to identify Ms. Scopa as presenting a risk of harming herself constituted a violation of her constitutional right. . . .A reasonable officer under the circumstances here would understand that cell checks are for the purpose of ensuring inmate safety, but would be unaware that Ms. Scopa had any suicidal predisposition and would not be looking for specific signs of self-harm. . . .A reasonable officer in Coppinger's position would not necessarily think that his failure to take action in response to the looped shoelace was 'so inadequate as to shock the conscience' or in reckless disregard of Ms. Scopa's safety and therefore would rise to the level of a violation of Ms. Scopa's right. . . Accordingly, at the time of Ms. Scopa's death it was not 'beyond debate' that failing to take action in response to viewing a looped shoelace on the floor of a detainee's cell, absent any other indicators of suicidal tendencies, was so clear a violation of the detainee's Eighth or Fourteenth Amendment right that 'every "reasonable official would have understood"' that this inattention violates that right.") Cocroft v. Smith, 95 F.Fupp.3d 119, 127-28 (D. Mass. 2015) ("Officer Smith argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity because the right to be free from a retaliatory arrest was not clearly established at the time. It is true that Cocroft asserted that Officer Smith arrested her in retaliation for exercising her First Amendment rights. On this issue, Officer Smith may very well be correct that it is an unsettled question of law whether a retaliatory arrest otherwise supported by probable cause is unlawful. However, the Court need not resolve this question because the jury found for Officer Smith on Cocroft's retaliatory arrest claim. Therefore, the Court will focus on Officer Smith's argument that he is entitled to qualified immunity on Cocroft's claim that her arrest was not supported by probable cause. Officer Smith argues that he is entitled to qualified immunity on this claim because a reasonable officer in his position would have believed that probable cause existed to believe that Cocroft committed the crime with which she was charged—disorderly conduct, or that she had committed the crime of interfering with a police officer in the exercise of his duties. The doctrine of qualified immunity protects a state actor from liability for damages under section 1983 as long as his conduct did not violate clearly established constitutional or federal statutory rights. The official's actions are gauged by a standard of objective reasonableness. To obtain the benefit of qualified immunity, a police officer need not follow an unquestionably constitutional path. The case at hand exemplifies this point; where, as here, a section 1983 action rests on a claim of false arrest, the qualified immunity standard is satisfied 'so long as the presence of probable cause is at least arguable.'. . . In the preceding section, I found that there are no grounds to disturb the jury's finding that Cocroft's arrest was unlawful, i.e ., that Officer Smith lacked probable cause to arrest her for committing a crime. I find that the presence of probable cause for the arrest is not arguable. Furthermore, a reasonable officer in Officer Smith's position would have known that his conduct violated Cocroft's rights. Accordingly, Officer Smith is not entitled to qualified immunity.")

Meagher v. Andover Sch. Comm., 94 F.Supp.3d 21, 42-44 (D. Mass. 2015) ("Although this court finds that McGrath deprived Meagher of her right of free speech, it concludes that the contours of this right were not clearly established at the time of Meagher's termination. Therefore, McGrath is immune from liability under the doctrine of qualified immunity. . . .This court finds that a reasonably competent official in McGrath's position could have believed that she was not violating the First Amendment by terminating Meagher under the circumstances of this case. As an initial matter, there is no dispute that McGrath obtained the advice of counsel before she decided to terminate the plaintiff's employment. . . More importantly, at the time of the termination in 2012, the Supreme Court had not had occasion to clarify 'the scope of a public employee's employment duties and what it means to speak pursuant to those duties' following its decision in Garcetti. . . As evidenced by the differing interpretations given by the plaintiff and defendants in this case to the post-Garcetti decisions, the parameters of the First Amendment privilege remained murky. . . It was not until 2014, when the Supreme Court decided Lane, that the Court explained that 'the mere fact that a citizen's speech concerns information acquired by virtue of his public employment does not transform that speech into employee—rather than citizen—speech[,]' and that the 'critical question' for purposes of the First Amendment analysis 'is whether the speech at issue is itself ordinarily within the scope of an employee's duties, not whether it merely concerns those duties.'. . Moreover, both before and after Lane, as the First Circuit has emphasized, each case must turn on the specific factual context in which the speech at issue was made. . . Therefore, 'the contours of the [First Amendment] right were still cloudy' and not clearly established at the time of the events in question in this case. . . Even if this court were to assume that no reasonable official could have believed that Meagher was speaking pursuant to her official duties as a teacher, McGrath would still be entitled to qualified immunity because the outcome of the balancing of interests in this case, as required by the Supreme Court in Pickering, 'was not so clear as to put all reasonable officials on notice that firing [Meagher] would violate the [Constitution].'. . As the First Circuit has cautioned, '[b]ecause Pickering's constitutional rule turns upon a fact-intensive balancing test, it can rarely be considered clearly established for qualified immunity purposes.'. . Consequently, it is 'only in the extraordinary case' that qualified immunity will not apply. . . This is not such a case. . . . Accordingly, this court finds that McGrath could have reasonably determined that Meagher's actions were disruptive to the operation of the school system, and 'could have reasonably concluded that firing [the plaintiff] would not violate her First Amendment rights.'. . Therefore, McGrath is entitled to qualified immunity.")

O'Connor v. Spain, 84 F.Supp.3d 60, 66-67(D. Mass. 2015) ("[T]his Court finds that a reasonable official in Defendant's position could have believed that suspending Plaintiff for her comments did not violate her constitutional rights. The legal contours of the First Amendment rights of a public employee are, for better or worse, inherently murky. In Decotiis, for example, the First Circuit observed that the cases governing whether public employees speak as private citizens 'reveal the muddiness of this area of the law,' and concluded that it was not clearly established that Plaintiff's criticism of her employer was protected speech. . . Plaintiff does not cite a single case that would have put Defendant on notice that suspending Plaintiff for her election-related comments violated the First Amendment, and this Court is aware of none. The boundary between speaking as a private citizen and a public employee has not been drawn with such certainty that it clearly protects Plaintiff's right to endorse municipal election candidates while at work. This conclusion gains further support in the context of this specific case. Defendant was told by multiple individuals that Plaintiff had expressed her support for certain candidates by making an announcement in the dining room at the Senior Center during work hours. . . At least one senior told Defendant that she felt Plaintiff was telling the seniors how to vote. . . In an effort to be thorough and deliberate in his response, Defendant appointed the Chief of Police to investigate the complaints. The investigator concluded that Plaintiff did in fact make statements in support of certain candidates while on the job, and that the majority of those present believed Plaintiff was trying to influence their votes. . . A reasonable town manager could conclude from the available information that Plaintiff's speech was not protected because she was not speaking as a private citizen, and because the town has a significant interest in preventing its employees from using their official positions to endorse candidates in municipal elections. Indeed, this result is all but compelled by the totality-of-the-circumstances and interest-balancing nature of the First Amendment test for public employees. . . . Because a reasonable town manager could conclude that suspending Plaintiff would not violate her free speech rights, Defendant is entitled to qualified immunity. Therefore, no material fact dispute exists that would preclude summary judgment on Plaintiff's § 1983 claim against Defendant in his individual capacity.")

Williams v. City of Brockton, 59 F.Supp.3d 228, 243-44 (D. Mass. 2014) ("At the time of the alleged violations, it was 'clearly established in this circuit and the Supreme Court' that 'retaliatory action in employment, involving a public employee's speech on a question of public concern' constituted a violation of the First Amendment. . . Therefore, the individual Police Defendants have not established that they are immune from liability on Williams' surviving claims against them under the doctrine of qualified immunity.")

Baggett v. Ashe, CA 11-30223-MAP, 2014 WL 4252442, *12, *13 (D. Mass. Aug. 26, 2014) ("At the time of this constitutional violation, clearly established law prohibited a male officer from viewing a female inmate during a strip search. Cookish, 945 F.2d at 447. It was also plainly unconstitutional to require a female inmate to expose herself, particularly to the extreme degree required during a strip search, in the presence of a male officer. Cofield, 391 F.3d at 337. Given these cases, any reasonable official would have recognized the unreasonableness of requiring a female inmate to strip in the presence of a male officer holding a video camera and pointing it at her. The unconstitutionality of such a policy was, quite simply, 'a foregone conclusion.' Bonitz, 804 F.2d at 173 n. 10. Given the clarity of the law at the time the policy was put in place, a reasonable official would have been properly on notice that the policy would inevitably result in an unconstitutional search. Moreover, even if the state of the law were ambiguous—which it was not—this policy was so clearly 'antithetical to human dignity' that qualified immunity would still be inappropriate. Hope v. Pelzer, 536 U.S. 730, 741 (2002). Any reasonable official viewing the policy would have concluded that it had the potential to humiliate and demean the female inmates. However sincere Defendants' attempts to comply with the law may have been, it was unreasonable for them to neglect the obvious ramifications of their policy. Ultimately, a reasonable individual in Defendants' position could not have concluded that permitting male officers to videotape female inmates during strip searches—even if the officers looked away—was constitutional. Therefore, Defendants are not entitled to the protections of qualified immunity, and Plaintiff is entitled to judgment as a matter of law.")

Jones v. Han, 993 F.Supp.2d 57, 65-67 (D. Mass. 2014) ("State drug analysts are as much an arm of the government as are police officers, and can also inflict constitutional injury if they fail to disclose material exculpatory or impeachment information to the prosecution. Therefore, it seems clear that defendants can be found liable for failing to provide exculpatory or impeachment information to the prosecutor for disclosure to the defendant. The alleged exculpatory or impeachment evidence in this case concerns the reliability of the testing performed by Dookhan. Dookhan testified at plaintiff's trial. Plaintiff alleges that Dookhan's supervisors, including defendants, knew that she often tested up to five times more samples per month than other chemists; that they were aware of complaints about Dookhan from Peter Piro and Michael Lawler; and that they ignored the fact that Dookhan circulated several different versions of her resume within the office. None of that information was disclosed to plaintiff during his criminal prosecution. Assuming the facts alleged in the complaint are true, defendants knew about material impeachment evidence concerning Dookhan and failed to disclose it to the prosecutor in plaintiff's case. The complaint therefore states a claim under § 1983. . . Defendants nonetheless contend that the complaint should be dismissed because they are entitled to qualified immunity . . . .The complaint here alleges that defendants knew that Dookhan performed five times as many tests as other chemists, that they had received complaints that she forged quality-control tests, and that they ignored the fact that she circulated different copies of her resume. An objectively reasonable crime-laboratory supervisor would have understood that such information should be reported to prosecutors, because fabricated or unreliable drug-analysis results would affect the outcomes and, indeed, the basic fairness, of the affected criminal cases. At the very least, an objectively reasonable laboratory supervisor would have done something to investigate the alleged irregularities to see if there was a problem to disclose. As alleged by plaintiff, the 2010 audit of Dookhan's work was insufficient to address those issues because, among other things, it did not include re-testing of samples. As noted, no case law directly on point has imposed civil liability on state laboratory officials for Brady violations. However, '[i]t follows logically that, in some situations, "a general constitutional rule already identified in the decisional law may apply with obvious clarity to the specific conduct in question."'. . It was well-established that a police officer could be held liable for not disclosing exculpatory information. It would have been obvious that the same principle would extend to state drug-laboratory chemists and supervisors. Accordingly, defendants were on reasonable notice that the information they knew about Dookhan should have been disclosed. . . Defendants are therefore not entitled to qualified immunity at this stage of the proceedings. In the context of a motion to dismiss, the Court must accept the plausible factual allegations in the complaint as true. . . The complaint alleges that defendants knew about serious concerns over the accuracy of Dookhan's chemical testing and did not disclose that information to prosecutors in his case. That is sufficient to defeat a claim of qualified immunity at the pleadings stage.")

Jones v. Han, 993 F.Supp.2d 57, 69 (D. Mass. 2014) ("Defendants contend they are entitled to qualified immunity as to plaintiff's claims for supervisory liability under § 1983. 'When a supervisor seeks qualified immunity in a § 1983 action, the "clearly established" prong of the qualified immunity inquiry is satisfied when (1) the subordinate's actions violated a clearly established constitutional right, and (2) it was clearly established that a supervisor would be liable for constitutional violations perpetrated by his subordinates in that context.'. .Again, although there is no direct authority for holding state crime laboratory supervisors liable for their deliberate indifference to constitutional violations by their subordinates, the constitutional rights and supervisory liability doctrine that underlie plaintiff's claims are clearly established. . . The qualified immunity analysis here therefore turns on whether, in the particular circumstances confronted by defendants, they should have reasonably understood that their conduct jeopardized the constitutional rights of criminal defendants subject to the laboratory testing procedures. . .Reasonable officials in defendants' position, as alleged in the complaint, would have known their conduct could violate a criminal defendant's rights to due process and a fair trial. Assuming the allegations in the complaint are true, defendants were 'put on notice of behavior which was likely to result in the violation of the constitutional rights of citizens.'. . Whether plaintiff can prove those claims is a question for another day.")

Solomon v. Dookhan, No. 13–10208–GAO, 2014 WL 317202, *10, *11 (D. Mass. Jan. 27, 2014) (O'Toole, J. (adopting Magistrate Judge Sorokin's R & R) ("In Hernandez–Cuevas, the First Circuit explicitly joined with those circuits employing the constitutional approach, and held that a plaintiff may bring a malicious prosecution claim under § 1983 if he or she can establish that the defendant (1) caused (2) a seizure of the plaintiff pursuant to legal process unsupported by probable cause, and (3) criminal proceedings terminated in the plaintiff's favor. . . Although it did so in 2013, the Court nevertheless noted that

'[t]his holding makes explicit what has long been implicit in our case law. In the past we have held that 'some truths are self-evident.... [I]f any concept is fundamental to our American system of justice, it is that those charged with upholding the law are prohibited from deliberately fabricating evidence and framing individuals for crimes they did not commit.'

Id. at 100 (quoting Limone v. Condon, 372 F.3d 39, 44–45 (1st Cir.2004)).
Although qualified immunity presents a legal issue, courts analyzing the issue must be careful 'not to permit a defendant to hijack the plaintiffs complaint and recharacterize its allegations so as to minimize his or her liability.'. . A fair reading of the Amended Complaint is that Solomon alleges that Keenan joined with Dookhan and others in a scheme to falsify evidence, destroy and withhold exculpatory evidence, obstruct justice and offer false testimony. At no point could a reasonable police officer have believed that such conduct would be permissible. Qualified immunity does not bar any of the claims asserted against Keenan.")

Abrami v. Town of Amherst, No. 09–30176–DPWJ, 2013 WL 3777070, *8, *9 (D. Mass. July 16, 2013) ("The contours of an officer's authority and a suspect's rights in the context of a doorway seizure are not well defined. Some courts, for example, have found that a suspect opening the door to the police does not relinquish his right of privacy in the home unless he acquiesces in detention, while others have found that acquiescence is not required. . . Some courts have also indicated that a suspect's rights may differ when the door is opened to law enforcement, as opposed to a lay invitee. . . But the various approaches to doorway seizures only serve to reinforce that Abrami's rights, when he voluntarily presented himself to Humber through the doorway, were not clearly established. Indeed, the substantial uncertainty surrounding doorway seizures has formed the basis for qualified immunity in the past. . .I conclude that, on the facts most favorable to Abrami, Humber mistook the extent to which Abrami had relinquished his expectations of privacy in the home (and effectively consented to entry) merely by voluntarily coming to the door and placing himself in public view. . .But Humber's mistake was reasonable, given the considerable uncertainty surrounding the rights of suspects engaged in doorway interactions with law enforcement—with respect to their Fourth Amendment protection against both an arrest or investigatory seizure and any accompanying entry into the home. Moreover, Humber accompanied his reasonable mistake about the extent to which Abrami had forfeited his expectations of privacy with the proportionally modest entry of requiring that the door to the apartment remain open while he conducted an investigatory doorway seizure. Humber is thus entitled to qualified immunity. On this basis, summary judgment must enter on the aspects of Count I alleging unlawful entry, as well as those alleging that Abrami's arrest was unlawful as a result of any such entry.")

Walker v. Jackson, 952 F.Supp.2d 343, (D. Mass. 2013) ("The Walkers seek to hold the defendants liable for failing to intervene to prevent Officer Jackson's allegedly unreasonable search. But the court has not found any cases holding officers liable in analogous circumstances. Indeed, the cases within the First Circuit deal almost exclusively with the failure to intervene in the use of excessive force. . . Nevertheless, this court cannot definitively conclude that a claim alleging a failure to intervene in an unreasonable search fails to state a constitutional violation. Other circuits addressing failure to intervene claims have described liability in more general terms. According to the Second Circuit, 'An officer who fails to intercede is liable for the preventable harm caused by the actions of the other officers where that officer observes or has reason to know: (1) that excessive force is being used; (2) that a citizen has been unjustifiably arrested; or (3) that any constitutional violation has been committed by a law enforcement official.'. . But even when courts define liability more broadly, the facts of the cases tend to involve acts of excessive force or unlawful arrest. . . It is therefore unclear whether liability may be imposed for failing to intervene in an unreasonable search. It is plain, however, that the contours of the constitutional right were not sufficiently clear to give the defendants notice that their conduct in this case was unconstitutional. The court has not found any support for the proposition that allowing a fellow officer to enter a residence and participating in the subsequent search constitutes a claim for failure to intervene. Accordingly, the court agrees that the defendants have qualified immunity as to Count II.")

Holder v. Town of Newton, No. 09-cv-341-JD, 2010 WL 5185137, at *6, *7 (D.N.H. Dec. 15, 2010) ("Courts that have considered the issue have determined in similar circumstances that a right of individuals to possess and bear firearms for private civilian purposes, as opposed to military purposes, was not clearly established before 2008, when the Supreme Court decided District of Columbia v. Heller, 128 S.Ct. 2783, 2799 (2008)). See, e.g., Emerson v. City of New York, 2010 WL 2910661, at *7 (S.D.N.Y. July 19, 2010); Cardenas v. City of Chicago, 2010 WL 2609866, at *7, n. 8 (N.D. Ill. June 25, 2010) (citing cases). . . . Therefore, to the extent Holder could show that Streeter and Jewett violated his Second Amendment rights, which has not been established in this case, they are protected by qualified immunity.")

Vendouri v. Gaylord, No. 10-cv-277-SM, 2010 WL 4261233, at *5 (D.N.H. Oct. 26, 2010) ("In this case, the right at issue is not the general parental right to direct the upbringing and education of her child. Defined at the appropriate level of specificity, the right at issue here is the claimed right of a noncustodial parent to be notified by her child's school whenever the child is dismissed from school to the parent who has been awarded legal and physical custody by a court of competent jurisdiction (or that parent's appropriate representative). None of the relevant Supreme Court opinions, nor controlling decision by the United States Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, establishes such a right. James, the opinion on which Vendouri relies, was decided after the conduct Vendouri complains of and identifies a significantly narrower parental right than the one Vendouri claims the school defendants violated in this case. . . Moreover, James holds that at the time of the conduct underlying that case, the right of a noncustodial parent to be notified of an actual legal transfer of custody was not clearly established. If the narrow right at issue in James was not clearly established when the school defendants engaged in the conduct Vendouri challenges, then the broader right on which Vendouri bases her claim was not clearly established either.")

Oxley v. Penobscot County, No. 09-cv-21-B-W, 2010 WL 582222, at *12 (D. Me. Feb. 12, 2010) ("My reading of the cases is to the effect that arrestees subject to a temporary seizure at a jail who will not be joining the prison population are entitled to the same Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches and seizures as any other arrestee, and that officers cannot manipulate the standard simply by processing or booking an arrestee at a facility that houses others for penological purposes. I arrive at this conclusion by reading existing caselaw, beginning with Bell v. Wolfish.. . . I am persuaded that a reasonable officer in Ms. Kelleher's position could reasonably have believed that a strip search in a private setting by officers of the same sex as Ms. Oxley would not violate the constitution because contraband was discovered on the person of Ms. Oxley's traveling companion at the jail and because Ms. Oxley was being processed in the county jail pending release on bail. . . . A reasonable officer in her position could have believed that the jail environment and presence of contraband on Ms. Hughes was minimally sufficient to justify the search in question.").

Toro v. Murphy, No. 07-11721-PBS, 2009 WL 5064575, at *6, *7 (D. Mass. Dec. 17, 2009) ("The crucial question in this case is whether the unlawfulness of Murphy's conduct would have been apparent to a reasonable officer in the same position. This demands an analysis of the laws concerning materiality that existed at the time of Murphy's alleged withholding. At that time, evidence was material if it [sic] 'the omitted evidence create[d] a reasonable doubt that did not otherwise exist.' United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97, 112-13, 96 S.Ct. 2392, 49 L.Ed.2d 342 (1976). . . . At the time of the Plaintiff's criminal trial, the Agurs standard required timely disclosure of exculpatory evidence if, 'on consideration of the entire record, the evidence is capable of creating a reasonable doubt that would not otherwise exist.'. . In addition, this duty was extended to the police officers who investigated the case. Commonwealth v. Redding, 382 Mass. 154, 157, 414 N.E.2d 347, 348 (1980) ("The police are also part of the prosecution, and the taint on the trial is no less if they, rather than the State's Attorney, were guilty of nondisclosure.") (internal citations omitted). . . . The Agurs standard was sufficiently specific to 'clearly establish' the right to exculpatory evidence regarding alternative suspects. The big question is whether a reasonable officer in Murphy's position in 1981 would have believed that the evidence of an alternative suspect should have been turned over. Murphy himself has admitted, through deposition testimony, that if he had the report, it should have been turned over as both exculpatory and material. . . . In these circumstances, Murphy is not protected by qualified immunity.").

Bowler v. Town of Hudson, 514 F.Supp.2d 168, 183 (D. Mass. 2007) ("Plaintiffs argue that the First Amendment right of the high school students to engage in non-disruptive speech was clearly established, and that the individual defendants should have known that censorship of HSCCA posters was unconstitutional under Tinker and Fraser. The First Amendment jurisprudence governing a school's regulation of student access to violent speech on the internet with the benign intent to protect students from images which may be upsetting and psychologically damaging is not settled, as is indicated by the fractured decisions in Pico regarding the role of the subjective intent for the censorship and the uncertain status of the 'right to be left alone' under Harper. Given the Court's own difficulty in determining whether a First Amendment violation occurred in this case, the Court cannot find that the First Amendment rights in this case were 'clearly established' in order to defeat the individual defendants' claim of qualified immunity .The Court also finds no evidence that a similarly situated official would have acted differently. The plaintiffs do not dispute that the videos linked by the HCSSA website were upsetting, . . .and plaintiffs do not otherwise challenge the blocking of access to the URL on HHS computers by Technology Director Ms. Schuck. It is understandable that, after limiting access to the URL on HHS computers, a reasonable school administrator would proceed to remove the URL from the Club's posters. Qualified immunity contemplates such errors and mistakes. . . Finally, and curiously, plaintiffs have not argued against qualified immunity for the individual school administrators on the ground that they were impermissibly motivated to punish the Club's speech because of its content. . . . As a result, the Court similarly considers abandoned any claim that the individual defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity because of their impermissible motivation. The Court thus ALLOWS summary judgment as to the qualified immunity of the individual defendants.").

Mongeau v. City of Marlborough, 462 F.Supp.2d 144, 153 (D. Mass. 2006) ("In the immediate case, Mongeau may have a viable claim that his constitutional rights were violated. As discussed, the First Circuit has left the door slightly ajar in substantive due process claims in land-use actions involving allegations of corruption or bribery. Given that the First Circuit has explicitly refused to decide whether such an allegation can make out a section 1983 claim, such a right is not 'clearly established.' Consequently, as counterintuitive as it may seem, Reid is entitled to qualified immunity even if he required mitigation payments in order to grant a permit. This is the logical conclusion that must follow from Harlow and the First Circuit opinions discussing section 1983 in the context of land-use disputes. This qualified immunity follows in the wake of the First Circuit's express reluctance to recognize any type of section 1983 claim in this particular context.").

Charles v. City of Boston, 365 F.Supp.2d 82, 89 (D. Mass. 2005) ("Bogdan's related qualified immunity argument must also fail because it turns on the absence of a clearly established duty for him to disclose directly to a defendant, which is not the constitutional breach that Charles is alleging. Bogdan's duty to disclose Brady information to the prosecutor was clearly established at the time of his investigation into the 1980 rapes (not to mention his duty–unquestionably well-established–to testify truthfully on the stand). Thus, if the qualified immunity question is 'whether a reasonable official could have believed his actions were lawful in light of clearly established law and the information the official possessed at the time of the allegedly unlawful conduct,' . . . the answer is an unequivocal 'no.' Bogdan, an experienced crime lab technician, must have known of his legal obligation to disclose exculpatory evidence to the prosecutors, their obligation to pass it along to the defense, and his obligation not to cover up a Brady violation by perjuring himself. That there is no statutory or common law rule explicitly proscribing such conduct–no case that says 'a crime lab technician whose tests go a long way to exculpating the defendant must disclose that to the prosecutor and cannot lie about them on the stand'–does not mean that Bogdan's behavior is immunized. Some acts are unlawful on their face.").

King's Grant Inn v. Town of Gilford, No. Civ.03-249-SM, 2005 WL 361547, at *4, *5 (D.N.H. Feb. 16, 2005) (not reported)("The general principle stated in Shuttlesworth, however, is too abstract for useful application in considering qualified immunity. See Riverdale Mills, 392 F.3d at 66 ("The district court below erred by posing the second prong as whether 'the law regarding the necessity for a search warrant is clear."). Rather, the proper question here is whether a local government official, in April, May, and June of 2003, should have understood, based on established law, that it was unlawful to deny a request for an exotic dancing permit based upon the applicant's having a 'significant history' of violating alcoholic beverage control laws. . . . When the constitutional right at issue here is properly cast, it becomes apparent that the right was not clearly established. The selectmen made their permit decisions pursuant to an ordinance that had not, to that point, been challenged on constitutional grounds. And, the ordinance was adopted pursuant to the implicit mandate of a state statute, requiring that holders of liquor licenses may 'provide entertainment and dancing ... provided they have received written authorization by the town or city.'. . At the time the individual defendants denied plaintiff's permit applications, no decisional law was in place describing the permissible bases on which written authorization for entertainment and dancing in establishments licensed to serve liquor might, constitutionally, be either granted or withheld. Moreover, neither the Court of Appeals for the First Circuit nor the United States Supreme Court has resolved a case sufficiently similar to this one to provide clear notice that defendants' denial of plaintiff's permit applications amounted to a denial of First Amendment rights. The general principle established in Shuttlesworth was applied, by the Eleventh Circuit, in a somewhat similar factual setting, as described earlier. But, it is not at all clear that the opinion in Fly Fish, constitutes 'a consensus of persuasive authority elsewhere[.]'. . . It cannot be said, then, that the constitutional right at issue here, properly framed, was clearly established in federal decisional law. Finally, the third permit denial (on June 2, 2003) took place after the New Hampshire Superior Court had held that the Inn was not likely to succeed on the merits of its First Amendment claim. At the very least, then, on that occasion, defendants' reliance on the decision of the New Hampshire Superior Court, particularly given the absence of specific federal precedent, was not unreasonable, and did not result in forfeiture of their qualified immunity. Because the contours of the legal right defendants violated were not clearly established at the time they acted, the individual defendants are entitled to qualified immunity from personal liability, and they are entitled to partial summary judgment on that point.").

McIntyre v. United States, No. CIV.A.01-CV-10408-RC, 2004 WL 2230406, at *17, 23-25 (D. Mass. Sept. 30, 2004) ("[W]hen plaintiffs allege that, in disclosing the informant status of McIntyre to Bulger and Flemmi, Connolly acted affirmatively to put the life of McIntyre in jeopardy, they have sufficiently alleged a violation by Connolly of McIntyre's substantive due process right to be protected from the danger of the government's own creation. But the plaintiffs argue in vain when they assert that the 'state-created danger' theory, or the 'constitutional duty not to affirmatively abuse governmental power so as to create danger to individuals and render them more vulnerable to harm,'. . . was clearly established at the time Bulger and Flemmi are alleged to have murdered McIntyre. Soto v. Flores forecloses this argument . . . The defense of qualified immunity applies unless the law is clearly established either by materially similar precedent or by general legal principles that apply with obvious clarity to the facts of the case. . . Under the facts as alleged by the plaintiffs, it cannot be doubted that Connolly violated the substantive due process rights of McIntyre. In fact, because Connolly allegedly participated in and/or aided and abetted the murder of McIntyre, the right in question might be characterized as the right not to be murdered by the government. As so characterized, the right is clearly established by the words of the Fifth Amendment itself. . . But, even if the right is characterized as a right not to be murdered by a private actor where a government actor aided, abetted, collaborated or conspired with the private actor to accomplish the murder, the right was clearly established before McIntyre was murdered. The fact that there is no case proclaiming the existence of the right under factual circumstances like those presented by the case before me does not preclude a determination that the right was clearly established. The Supreme Court has rejected the notion that the determination of whether a constitutional right is clearly established requires that a court find that the facts before it are fundamentally similar to a previous case declaring the right. . . . Based on these principles, I hold that in 1984, the substantive due process right to not be murdered by a private actor where a government actor aided, abetted, collaborated or conspired with the private actor to accomplish the murder was clearly established. Although in 1984 the courts had not addressed factual circumstances 'fundamentally similar' to those alleged by the plaintiffs in this case, 'in the light of pre-existing law, the unlawfulness' of Connolly's conduct was 'apparent.' . . The text of the Fifth Amendment provided the general prohibition against the government's depriving citizens of life. It was also clearly established in 1984 that constitutional violations can be effectuated by private actors acting in concert with government actors. . . . Although none of the parties have addressed the issue, I also hold that, based on the plaintiff's allegations, it was reasonable for Connolly to have been aware that his conduct violated McIntyre's clearly established right to be free from government-involved murder. There are no allegations supporting a conclusion that Connolly made a reasonable mistake as to what the law required, . . . that he was reasonably ignorant of crucial facts, . . .or that any other circumstance existed that would have made it unreasonable for Connolly to appreciate that his conduct was unconstitutional.")

Hudson v. Maloney, 326 F.Supp.2d 206, 210-12 (D. Mass. 2004) ("That the plaintiffs clearly identified viable and pertinent constitutional rights in their Complaint under the First and Fourteenth Amendments is not seriously contested by defendants. . . . Consequently, it is to the second step of the Saucier test that the court turns: would a reasonable prison administrator when confronted, in September of 2002, at the latest, with plaintiffs' demands for Halal meals prepared by Muslim inmates, have determined that a clearly established right was being invoked. Here, it is important not to confuse the general with the particular and to frame the issue precisely. In September of 2002, a reasonable prison official would have known that a prisoner's right to the free exercise of his religion, so long as it did not compromise institutional security, was clearly established, and further that this right encompassed a diet consistent with the prisoner's sincere religious beliefs. . . Rather, the precise question that would have been asked is whether the law had clearly established a Muslim inmate's right to a particular dietary ingredient (Halal meal), prepared in a particular way (by other Muslim inmates), or whether it was sufficient for prison authorities to provide an alternative diet (vegetarian or pork-free) that was 'consistent' with the teachings of the inmate's faith, if not every aspect of his belief. In consulting the decisions of courts that had considered the issue before September of 2002, [footnote omitted] a reasonable prison official would have learned that the vast majority of these courts had determined that a prison permissibly discharged its constitutional duty to respect the dietary beliefs of Muslim inmates by offering an alternative, pork-free diet, and more broadly, that the law permitted prison authorities to limit the dietary options available to prisoners in the interests of reducing the costs and burdens entailed in accommodating the smorgasbord of food-related religious beliefs likely to be encountered in a prison population. . . . In light of this legal precedent, no reasonable prison official would have concluded that Muslim inmates had an established right to Halal meals prepared by other Muslim inmates or that prison administrators did not have broad discretion in the matter of prison dietary alternatives.").

Quiles v. Kilson, 337 F.Supp.2d 224, 231(D. Mass. 2004) ("In the instant case, the defendants are entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the strip searches conducted. It is possible that the plaintiffs' allegations about the City's practice of strip searching, if true, would establish a constitutional violation. The law at the time of this alleged violation, however, was not clear because the First Circuit had not yet decided Swain. The law does not require state actors to 'carry a crystal ball' as to what the future trajectory of the law will be. . . The defendants cannot be expected to have known that the searches, made pursuant to a valid warrant and a City policy with respect to strip searching, violated the law. The individual defendants are, therefore, entitled to qualified immunity with respect to the inside plaintiffs.[footnote omitted] With respect to the outside plaintiffs, the question of qualified immunity is more problematic. The searches themselves were questionable because if the defendants were not in the Apartment, they were almost certainly illegal. The 'all persons' warrant applied only to the persons in the Apartment. There is nothing in the affidavit or elsewhere to suggest that children were involved in selling drugs at 7 Congress Street. If they were not in the Apartment, there was no probable cause to search the outside plaintiffs. Unlike the law with respect to strip searching, which was unclear at the time of the incident, the law relating to probable cause was clear. An objectively reasonable officer should have known that it violated the Fourth Amendment rights of the outside plaintiffs to search them if they were not originally inside the Apartment. The individual defendants are not, therefore, entitled to a qualified immunity defense with respect to the outside plaintiffs.").

Suboh v. Borgioli, 298 F.Supp.2d 192, 205, 206 (D. Mass. 2004) ("In its opinion on this case, the First Circuit ruled that it was clearly established as of 1998 that 'a state official could not effectively resolve a disputed custody issue between a parent and another without following any due process procedures at all[.]' . . . It then indicated that the relevant question, in determining whether Borgioli was entitled to qualified immunity, was whether 'a reasonable officer could have concluded on the facts before him that the Kandys had undisputed custody of the child, despite Suboh's claims, and so no process of any sort was due before the child could be released to the Kandys.'. . By framing the issue in such a way, the First Circuit necessarily reduced the scope of facts determinative to the qualified immunity analysis. Were there, for example, a genuine dispute as to whether Suboh told Borgioli that she was Sofia's biological mother or that she wanted custody of her daughter, the jury would indeed be needed to resolve these crucial questions. To the extent that the determinative facts were unclear or disputed prior to the trial, however, that dispute was resolved by Borgioli's own trial testimony. As noted above, on the stand Borgioli testified that Suboh told him that she was Sofia's biological mother, that she had not signed any papers giving custody of Sofia to her parents, and that she wanted to regain custody of her daughter. Regardless of the apparent credibility or lack thereof of Suboh's statements, [footnote omitted] the Court fails to see how any reasonable officer could not have, at a minimum, concluded that there were indeed competing claims to Sofia's custody such that he simply could not decide the dispute himself. Borgioli argues that 'there was certainly a hotly contested factual dispute as to what [he] knew at various points in his investigation,'. . . but it is undisputed that the crucial piece of information–that Suboh was claiming to be Sofia's biological mother and was asserting a right to custody of her daughter–was known to Borgioli when he decided to place Sofia in the custody of the Kandys. Accordingly, at this point, there are simply no remaining factual disputes that a jury needs to resolve for the Court to be able to rule on qualified immunity, given Borgioli's own testimony. In such a circumstance, it is appropriate for the Court to rule on qualified immunity straightaway, . . and that is what the Court has done here. Given the Court's determinations that (1) the undisputed facts of this case establish that Suboh's procedural due process rights were violated by her failure to receive any hearing attendant to the loss of custody of her daughter; and (2) the undisputed facts demonstrate that Borgioli is not entitled to qualified immunity, the scope of the new trial is necessarily limited. All that remains for the new trial is the important question of what– if any–damages were proximately caused by Borgioli's violation of Suboh's procedural due process rights.").

Pliakos v. City of Manchester, No. 01-461-M., 2003 WL 21687543, at *13, *14 (D.N.H. July 15, 2003) (unpublished) ("A difficult question is presented in this case regarding the level of specificity with which it is appropriate to define the constitutional right plaintiff claims was violated. All can agree that the right not to be subjected to 'unreasonable' or 'excessive' force during the course of an arrest was, when Pliakos was taken into custody, clearly established. . . . If the constitutional right plaintiff claims was infringed must necessarily be defined more precisely, it is far less clear that such a right was 'clearly established' at the time of Pliakos's arrest. . . . Except for Pliakos's predisposition to positional asphyxia (due to, among other things, obesity, acute cocaine intoxication, cardiac hypertrophy, and his violent struggle), he likely would have suffered no lasting adverse effects from his brief detention on his stomach. Reduced to its essence, then, the question presented is whether Pliakos had a clearly established right not to be restrained in the manner (and for the duration) that he was, in light of the risk factors he presented with regard to positional asphyxia (some of which were obvious and others of which were unknown to the officers). . . . The case precedent discussed above does not establish a constitutional right not to be handcuffed in a prone position if one presents some of the risk factors for positional asphyxia. In fact, many of the courts that have confronted this relatively rare situation have specifically concluded, under circumstances very much like those presented in this case, that there is no such constitutional right at all, much less a 'clearly established' right. See, e.g., Phillips, supra; Cottrell, supra. Necessarily, then, an objectively reasonable police officer, presented with the violent circumstances that confronted the defendants on October 13, 1999, would not have realized that restraining Pliakos in the manner (and for the period of time) that defendants did would amount to a violation of his clearly established Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable seizure or the use of excessive force.").

Demers v. Leominster School Department, 263 F. Supp.2d 195, 208 (D. Mass. 2003) ("Because I determined that Michael's constitutional rights were not infringed by the actions of the School Officials, no reasonable government official in the Defendants' shoes would have believed that he or she was violating Michael's rights by suspending him because of the drawing and note. Michael had a record of emotional disturbances and school behavioral problems, some which involved violence or aggression toward others. It was not clearly established at the time that Michael was suspended that disciplining a student, who made a violent and threatening drawing, violated that student's constitutional rights. Finally, there is limited case law on the issue of school violence in this Circuit, which lends further credence to conclude that this area of the law is unsettled. . . Therefore, the individual Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity.").

Aceto v. Kachajian, 240 F. Supp.2d 121, 126, 127 (D. Mass. 2003) ("In sum, the Court holds that on May 23, 2000, it was clearly established under published caselaw that when a non-threatening, non-flight-risk, cooperating arrestee for a minor crime tells the police she suffers from an injury that would be exacerbated by handcuffing her arms behind her back, the arrestee has a right to be handcuffed with her arms in front of her even if the injury is not visible. If the Court assumes Aceto's account of the facts to be true, any reasonable officers confronting Aceto's situation would have known that handcuffing her arms behind her back was unlawful excessive force.").

Soto v. Bzdel, 214 F. Supp.2d 69, 75-77 (D. Mass. 2002) ("In the court's opinion, a plaintiff may state a constitutional claim if, while a police officer is making an arrest pursuant to a warrant, the officer fails to release the plaintiff after the officer receives information upon which to reasonably conclude that the warrant had been recalled. Thus, viewing the facts here in a light most favorable to Plaintiff–particularly the fact that Plaintiff made Defendants aware of the Notice of Recall, but that Defendants chose not to look at that notice–the court finds, for present purposes, that Plaintiff has sufficiently alleged that he was unreasonably 'seized' in violation of the Fourth Amendment. . . . With regard to the second and, in effect, the third questions, Plaintiff asserts that the law was 'clearly established' at the time of the incident that Fourth Amendment seizures must be conducted in a reasonable manner. That may be true as a general proposition. . . However, as the First Circuit has explained, 'the inquiry whether the right at issue [is] clearly established properly focuses not upon the right at its most general or abstract level, but at the level of its application to the specific conduct being challenged.' Singer v. State of Me., 49 F.3d 837, 845 (1st Cir.1995) (citations and internal quotation marks omitted). . .[T]he court must answer the second question in the qualified immunity analysis in the negative. Plaintiff has 'not brought to [the court's] attention any cases of controlling authority in [this] jurisdiction at the time of the incident which clearly established the rule on which [he] seek[s] to rely,' nor has he 'identified a consensus of cases of persuasive authority such that a reasonable officer could not have believed that his actions were lawful.' . . It need hardly be said, therefore, with regard to the third question that no objectively reasonable officer in October of 1999 would have believed that disregarding Plaintiff's Notice of Recall and arresting him based on information from the WMS [Warrant Management System], as did Defendants, was [un]lawful in light of clearly established law. . . . [E]ven though Defendants may well have been cavalier in dealing with Plaintiff, and thus might lose were the court to consider the merits, they cannot reasonably be charged with knowing that they were violating a clearly established right. This ought not hold true in the future. Presently, however, Defendants fall under the umbrella of qualified immunity and the court will grant them summary judgment on Counts I and IV." [footnotes omitted]).

Moreta-Ramirez v. Lemert, 156 F. Supp.2d 138, 142 (D.P.R. 2001) (Clearly, the duty to disclose established by Brady, is imposed on the prosecution. Brady does not express a view as to the duty of police officers to disclose exculpatory evidence. . . In fact, the existence of a constitutionally-derived liability on the part of police officers for failure to disclose and the contours of such liability are not clearly established.").

Reid v. Simmons, 163 F. Supp.2d 81, 96, 97 (D.N.H. 2001) ("In summary, because it was not clearly established in 1987 that a police officer's failure to disclose potentially, though not obviously, exculpatory impeachment material (particularly that which was generated in unrelated investigations) would constitute a discrete and actionable violation of the defendant's constitutional right to due process (independent of the Brady violation which is, of course, caused by the prosecutor's failure to turn over such information), Simmons is entitled to qualified immunity. He is also entitled to the protections afforded by qualified immunity because an objectively reasonable police officer in his situation in 1987, looking forward before Reid's criminal trial, would not have appreciate[d] the potentially material and exculpatory nature of the investigative reports in question. So, even if Simmons did fail to disclose the reports, he cannot be charged with having understood that such a failure would violate federal law by depriving Reid of his right to due process and a fair trial.").

Greenleaf v. Cote, No. CIV. 98-250-B, 2000 WL 863217, at *3 & n.3 (D. Me. March 3, 2000) ("greeing with courts in Konop and Sostarecz that students had clearly established right to be free from unreasonable search of belongings by school officials; disagreeing with Jenkins v. Talladega City Bd. of Ed., 115 F.3d 821 (11th Cir. 1997)).

Grendell v. Gillway, 974 F. Supp. 46, 52 (D. Me. 1997) ("[A]lthough the Court is mindful that the First Circuit has never held verbal threats or harassment to constitute conscience-shocking behavior, the Court is equally mindful that abhorrent conduct is still abhorrent even though it has not been subject to judicial determination. For these reasons, the Court finds that, lack of direct precedent notwithstanding, Gillway's alleged conduct is shocking to the conscience and violative of Grendell's substantive due process rights. Since the Court finds that Grendell has alleged that Gillway violated a constitutional right, it is now appropriate to turn to the issue of qualified immunity and, consequently, the question of whether this right was clearly established at the time Gillway acted. . . .The Court is persuaded that Grendell's right to be free from behavior that is shocking to the conscience was clearly established at the time of Gillway's alleged conduct and therefore holds that Gillway is not entitled to qualified immunity. . . . Simply because there is no clearly defined case law condemning certain conduct does not mean police officers should be free to engage in such conduct, no matter how offensive or destructive to a fair and just society that conduct may be, and then hide behind the shield of qualified immunity. The Court is convinced, therefore, that even in the absence of precedent, conduct that shocks the conscience is so patently egregious that the constitutional right it violates is necessarily clearly established and that a reasonable officer should know that his conduct violates that right.").

Ferreira v. Dubois, 963 F. Supp. 1244, 1258 (D. Mass. 1996) ("[I]t was not clearly established that procedural due process afforded an inmate/defendant the right to have interpreter services for a non-English speaking inmate/witness at a prison disciplinary hearing. Nor was it clearly established that an inmate/defendant had a right to require the hearing officer to query the inmate/ witness as to his ability to speak and/or comprehend English. ").

SECOND CIRCUIT

Shannon v. Venettozzi, No. 17-2092, 2018 WL 4224321, at *2 (2d Cir. Sept. 6, 2018) (not reported) ("Shannon first argues that Officer McTurner's alleged conduct in 2011 was objectively unreasonable and therefore violated his Eighth Amendment rights. We agree that it was objectively unreasonable for a correctional officer to behave as alleged in light of our current standards of decency. As we recognized in Crawford, in 2015, the Eighth Amendment is violated by even a single instance of '[a] corrections officer's intentional contact with an inmate's genitalia or other intimate area' when such contact 'serves no penological purpose and is undertaken with the intent to gratify the officer's sexual desire or humiliate the inmate.'. . But Shannon's legal claim arises from events predating Crawford by four years. Although the conduct alleged in the amended complaint is reprehensible both then and now, when it occurred in 2011, our precedent did not establish that such conduct was clearly unconstitutional. Rather, in Boddie, we had held that a 'small number of incidents in which [the plaintiff] allegedly was verbally harassed, touched, and pressed against without his consent' was not sufficient to state a claim. . . And, prior to our decision in Crawford, district courts had routinely interpreted Boddie to mandate the dismissal of similar claims at the pleading stage. . . In line with this conclusion, we recently affirmed the district court's grant of qualified immunity in Crawford itself, explaining that '[a]t a minimum, any constitutional distinction between [Crawford's] case and Boddie was not clearly established" in 2011, when the conduct in Crawford, too, allegedly occurred. See Crawford v. Cuomo, 721 F. App'x 57, 59 (2d Cir. 2018) (summary order). The same is true here. We therefore affirm the District Court's grant of Officer McTurner's motion to dismiss on qualified immunity grounds.")

Colvin v. Keen, 900 F.3d 63, 75-76 (2d Cir. 2018) ("The Defendants were entitled to summary judgment unless there was clearly established law to the effect that Colvin's speech was on a matter of public concern. There is no clearly established law to that effect. The speech of a public employee is addressed to a matter of public concern where it can be 'fairly considered as relating to any matter of political, social, or other concern to the community.'. . To qualify, the speech must have 'a broader public purpose' and not be merely 'calculated to redress personal grievances.'. . In determining whether speech addresses a matter of public concern, we examine the 'content, form, and context of a given statement.'. .The precedents do not show a 'clearly established' law favoring Colvin on this question. This court has found, on the one hand, that speech debating issues of discrimination, speech seeking relief from 'pervasive or systemic misconduct' by public officials, and speech that is "part of an overall effort to correct allegedly unlawful practices or bring them to public attention' all go to matters of public concern. . . By contrast, we have found speech that 'concerns essentially personal grievances' does not qualify as speech on a matter of public concern[.] . . We have also reasoned that speech is not on a matter of public concern where it has 'no practical significance to the general public[.]'. . It is true that, under certain circumstances, we have found speech to be on a matter of public concern where it sought to 'vindicate ... constitutional rights ... in the face of alleged police misconduct.'. . In Golodner, we reasoned that 'it is axiomatic that misconduct within a police department implicates a matter of public concern.'. . In that case, however, the speech at issue related to alleged policies and patterns of police misconduct that 'raise[d] serious constitutional concerns.'. . Colvin's speech, by contrast, was not addressed to misconduct at all. Colvin merely identified herself as an attorney, told her co-worker and the police officers that she wanted to get her co-worker an attorney and union representative, and advised her friend not to say anything until such representatives arrived. Colvin said nothing to indicate that Ms. Buch's arrest was constitutionally improper. . . Since her speech was not addressed to police misconduct at all, much less to the sort of pattern of misconduct alleged in Golodner, Golodner does not clearly establish that Colvin's speech was on a matter of public concern.")

Berg v. Kelly, 897 F.3d 99, 112-13 (2d Cir. 2018) ("Police officers charged with protecting the President . . . might have reasonably believed that they could temporarily deny freedom of movement to persons on the scene, perhaps even until the President had departed. In short, while the present record does not permit us to conclude, as a matter of law, that the Officers' actions went no further than the special need to protect the President warranted, no then clearly established law would have alerted reasonable officers that their actions did not fall within the special needs exception. Nor is a different conclusion warranted because the police did not deny all pedestrians and traffic movement to the same degree as the protesters. Reasonable officers might have been particularly alert to risks posed by the Occupy Wall Street protesters, whose professed intent was to '#OccupyObama.'. . That a reasonable officer might objectively think that OWS protesters would not leave the area upon release but, rather, would attempt to approach or gain access to the hotel and the President found some support in other OWS protesters' actions only weeks earlier in shutting down the Brooklyn Bridge. . . In sum, in the absence of clearly established law prohibiting the challenged detentions in the circumstances presented, the Officers are entitled to qualified immunity. . . The OWS protesters also assert that they were unlawfully detained for the duration of the President's visit in retaliation for exercising their First Amendment rights. Because the Officers have qualified immunity from suit based on their temporary detention of the protesters, these claims also fail. In Singer v. Fulton County Sheriff, 63 F.3d 110, 120 (2d Cir. 1995), we concluded that 'if [an] officer either had probable cause or was qualifiedly immune from subsequent suit (due to an objectively reasonable belief that he had probable cause), then we will not examine the officer's underlying motive in arresting and charging the plaintiff.' The same reasoning applies to qualified immunity based on an objectively reasonable belief of special needs. We have determined above that officers in the position of protecting the President, as here, would have an objectively reasonable belief under the circumstances that the special needs presented in this case justified their limited detention of the protesters. Our rationale in Singer thus accords the Officers qualified immunity from the protesters' retaliation claims.")

Simon v. City of New York, 893 F.3d 83, 88, 97 (2d Cir. 2018) ("We conclude that, with the facts taken in the light most favorable to Simon, the defendants violated the Fourth Amendment. A warrant must be executed in conformity with its terms. . . Here, the warrant required the defendants to produce Simon to court on August 11, 2008, at 10:00 a.m., but they instead detained her for 18 hours over August 11 and 12, occasionally interrogated her about a crime, and never presented her to a judge. We further conclude that the unlawfulness of the defendants' conduct was clearly established when they acted. This is an uncommon '"obvious case"' in which 'the unlawfulness of the [defendants'] conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . No officer who is executing a warrant that requires that a prospective material witness be brought before a judge at a fixed date and time to determine whether the witness should be detained can reasonably believe that she is free instead to detain and interrogate the witness for hours on end outside of court supervision. . . . Miller, O'Rourke, and Yanez–Marquez, when considered in light of this Court's decisions explaining that an officer executing a warrant must generally comply with its terms, . . . might be thought to 'clearly foreshadow' our ruling today, which would likewise be sufficient to conclude that the defendants are not entitled to qualified immunity. . . But we need not decide whether these out-of-circuit authorities clearly foreshadow today's decision. This is one of the uncommon ' "obvious case[s]"' in which 'the unlawfulness of the [defendants'] conduct is sufficiently clear even though existing precedent does not address similar circumstances.'. . .We conclude, with the First Circuit, that this Fourth Amendment violation is so obvious that it violated clearly established law despite the lack of binding authority directly on point.")

Edrei v. McGuire, 892 F.3d 525, 539-44 (2d Cir. 2018) ("[F]or purposes of 'clearly established law,' we apply the Fourteenth Amendment analysis from Glick, not the Supreme Court's 2015 decision in Kingsley. We begin with the delicate task of defining the right at issue. . . . Here, defendants' frame the question as 'whether the officers violated the Fourteenth Amendment by using the LRAD 100X to aid in moving protesters to the sidewalks after the protest became obstructive and potentially violent.' . . This framing puts not one but two thumbs on the scale in favor of defendants. First, it focuses on the officers' professed objective—moving protesters onto the sidewalk—while ignoring the degree of force that the officers allegedly used. Second, it recasts the protest as 'violent,' a characterization that, based on plaintiffs' allegations and the scene captured in the videos, is at best arguable. . .Perhaps this is an inference that a factfinder might ultimately make, but at this stage we must draw all inferences in favor of the plaintiffs, not the defendants. . . . [A]ccepting the facts alleged by the plaintiffs, the question here is whether, in 2014, non-violent protesters and onlookers, who officers had not ordered to disperse, had a right not to be subjected to pain and serious injury that was inflicted to move them onto the sidewalks. Preliminarily, we address whether this conduct alleges a Fourteenth Amendment violation under the legal standard applicable in 2014. Although our earlier discussion drew on Kingsley, the result is the same under Glick's parallel factors. To repeat, this Court's longstanding test for excessive force claims teaches that force must be necessary and proportionate to the circumstances. . . . Would reasonable officers have known that subjecting non-violent protesters to pain and serious injury simply to move them onto the sidewalks violated the Fourteenth Amendment? Defendants insist that the circumstances before them were too dissimilar from then-existing precedents to provide this notice. They raise two principal arguments. Neither withstands scrutiny. First, the defendants deny that it was clearly established in December 2014 that using force in a crowd control context violates due process. In their view, because this Court has not applied 'substantive due process principles to crowd control,' the officers lacked notice that the right against excessive force applies to non-violent protesters. . . But that is like saying police officers who run over people crossing the street illegally can claim immunity simply because we have never addressed a Fourteenth Amendment claim involving jaywalkers. This would convert the fair notice requirement into a presumption against the existence of basic constitutional rights. Qualified immunity doctrine is not so stingy. . . Training our focus on controlling authority, we see that this Court has repeatedly emphasized that officers engaging with protesters must comply with the same principles of proportionality attendant to any other use of force. . . . Both Parmley and Amnesty America gave the defendants fair warning that the prohibition on excessive force applies to protesters. This is true even though both those cases arose under the Fourth Amendment. . . . Shifting attention from the protesters to the technology at issue, defendants' second argument is that, at the time of the events, the Fourteenth Amendment did not apply to LRADs. . . . [N]ovel technology, without more, does not entitle an officer to qualified immunity. . . . Given our call for common sense in the face of new technology, defendants cannot credibly complain they lacked notice that the proscription on excessive force applied to acoustic devices. . . . Even though sound waves are a novel method for deploying force, the effect of an LRAD's area denial function is familiar: pain and incapacitation. . . . Using common sense, any reasonable officer with knowledge of the LRAD's operations would understand that the area denial function represents a 'significant degree of force.'. . To recap, assuming the truthfulness of the allegations in the complaint, and drawing all reasonable inferences in plaintiffs' favor, the defendants knew or should have known that the area denial function could cause serious injury. When engaging with non-violent protesters who had not been ordered to disperse, no reasonable officer would have believed that the use of such dangerous force was a permissible means of moving protesters to the sidewalks. Whatever legitimate interest the officers had in clearing the street, the use of sound capable of causing pain and hearing loss in the manner alleged in the complaint was not rationally related to this end. We therefore conclude that the district court properly denied the defendants' motion to dismiss based on qualified immunity. . . . Our decision regarding the defendants' use of the LRAD is a narrow one. We do not hold that the Fourteenth Amendment bars law enforcement from using LRADs. To the contrary, we are confident that, in appropriate circumstances, following careful study and proper training, LRADs can be a valuable tool for law enforcement. Their usefulness as a long-range communications device is plain. We also think that, under certain conditions, an LRAD that is properly calibrated might be a lawful means of ordering (or perhaps even compelling) protesters to disperse. We merely hold (1) that, on the allegations before us, which we must accept as true, the plaintiffs have stated a Fourteenth Amendment excessive force claim and (2) that purposefully using the LRAD in a manner capable of causing serious injury to move non-violent protesters to the sidewalks violated law that was clearly established as of 2014. We are also mindful that the complaint before us is just one side of the story, told from the perspective of the plaintiffs. But courts and juries must assess excessive force claims from 'the perspective of a reasonable officer on the scene, including what the officer knew at the time, not with the 20/20 vision of hindsight.'. . It follows that, once the allegations are tested by evidence, particularly evidence about what the officers saw and knew, the defendants may yet be entitled to qualified immunity. We can envision various factual showings that would change the calculus. One key variable is the state of unrest at the protest. The evidence may show that the defendants observed a more violent scene than is portrayed in the complaint and incorporated videos. Another key consideration is how the LRAD was used, most notably the volume of the device and its proximity to protesters and passersby. And, third, as Kingsley acknowledges, much hinges on what the defendants knew. Perhaps the defendants had not seen the report on the Model 3300 and lacked knowledge of the LRAD's harmful effects. The complaint alleges that the NYPD 'has not properly trained its officers' on LRAD use and acknowledges that Department's use of force protocols 'do not account for LRAD use.'. . So perhaps the defendants had received training but reasonably believed that they were not using the device in an unsafe or gratuitous manner. Any one of these non-exhaustive factors could warrant a reappraisal of qualified immunity.")

Monaco v. Sullivan, 737 F. App'x 6, __ (2d Cir. 2018) ("The district court held that Monaco failed to make an adequate showing to survive summary judgment on either the objective or the subjective prongs. When assessing the subjective prong, the district court applied Caiozzo, where we held that a plaintiff must show 'that the government-employed defendant disregarded a risk of harm to the plaintiff of which the defendant was aware.'. . Monaco failed to meet this standard, the court concluded, because the record contained no evidence suggesting that Packard knew that his failure to prescribe Lithium posed a threat to Monaco. On appeal, Monaco does not dispute that he would not meet the Caiozzo test. He instead points out that this Court overruled Caiozzo. In Darnell, decided a year after the district court's decision in this case, we held that a plaintiff can meet the subjective prong of the deliberate indifference test as long as the defendant 'should have known' that his action 'posed an excessive risk to [the plaintiff's] health or safety.'. . Monaco therefore argues on appeal that we should vacate the district court's grant of summary judgment because it applied the now-defunct Caiozzo standard, and a jury could reasonably conclude that Packard acted recklessly under Darnell. We disagree. Assuming arguendo that Monaco is correct that Packard's failure to prescribe Lithium was reckless, Packard would still be entitled to qualified immunity. Darnell was decided in 2017 and thus could not have clearly established that reckless medical treatment amounts to deliberate indifference at the time Packard treated Monaco. Indeed, before Caiozzo, we had never decided this issue at all. . . Because Packard did not violate clearly established law when he treated Monaco in 1998, the district court did not err in granting summary judgment on this claim.")

Montero v. City of Yonkers, New York, 890 F.3d 386, 394, 398-403 (2d Cir. 2018) ("We conclude that the district court correctly held that the existence of a civilian analogue is not dispositive of whether a public employee spoke as a private citizen, but it is merely a factor the court could consider as part of the inquiry into whether the public employee's speech was made pursuant to his ordinary employment-related responsibilities. We nevertheless find that the district court erred in ruling that Montero's speech was not protected because it was tangentially related to his job responsibilities. That fact is not dispositive as a matter of law. It is clear from the pleadings that Montero's union remarks did not fall within his responsibilities as a police officer, and he therefore made these remarks as a private citizen. Because at least some of Montero's remarks addressed a matter of public concern, moreover, we vacate and remand the district court's judgment dismissing Montero's First Amendment retaliation claim as to defendant Olson. We affirm the district court's dismissal of the claims against defendants Moran and Mueller for a different reason: their alleged acts were protected by the doctrine of qualified immunity. . . . We conclude that Montero sufficiently pled that his union remarks cannot be considered 'part-and-parcel of his concerns about his ability to properly execute his duties.'. . The 'critical question under Garcetti is whether the speech at issue is itself ordinarily within the scope of an employee's duties, not whether it merely concerns those duties.'. . Montero made his remarks as union vice president, a role in which he was not required to serve. . . .Nevertheless, Montero would have us go further and decide categorically, as some circuits have, that when a person speaks in his or her capacity as a union member, he or she speaks as a private citizen. . . .While we therefore decline to decide categorically that when a person speaks in his capacity as a union member, he speaks as a private citizen, we conclude that, under the facts of this case as set out in the amended complaint, when Montero spoke in his capacity as a union member, he spoke as a private citizen. This was because, taking the amended complaint's allegations as true, Montero spoke in his role as a union officer, and his union speech was not composed of statements made as a 'means to fulfill' or 'undertaken in the course of performing' his responsibilities as a police officer. . . Consequently, he engaged in citizen speech for purposes of the First Amendment. . . .At this stage in the proceedings, we cannot say that Montero's union remarks about how reductions in police manpower might reduce public safety and his call for a vote of no-confidence in Commissioner Hartnett were solely 'calculated to redress [his] personal grievances' against Olson and his allies. . . Nor, despite the City defendants' contentions otherwise, do we find it critical to this inquiry that Montero made his remarks at a non-public meeting. . . We therefore conclude that Montero has sufficiently pled that his criticism of cuts in police manpower at the June 2010 union meeting and his call for a no-confidence vote in Police Commissioner Hartnett at the February 2011 union meeting qualified as statements on matters of public concern. . . .Defendants Moran and Mueller argue that even if Montero's speech was constitutionally protected and they took adverse employment actions against him for this speech, they are, even on the present state of the proceedings, entitled to qualified immunity. We agree. . . . It is true that at the time Moran and Mueller allegedly retaliated against Montero, we had stated in Weintraub that the 'lack of a citizen analogue [was] "not dispositive" in [that] case.'. . As detailed above, the role of a citizen analogue in determining whether one speaks as a citizen remained murky, however, and we had expressed no view as to its role in protecting union speech outside the context of a union grievance. . . Thus, we had not made clear that, under the circumstances as alleged in the amended complaint, Montero spoke in his capacity as a private citizen. On appeal, Montero contends, once again, that Clue 'clearly establishe[s]' that a person's union activity criticizing management is categorically protected by the First Amendment. . . But, as noted above, Clue was decided before Garcetti, and focused solely on whether the union plaintiffs had spoken on a matter of public concern. . . After Garcetti, it is clear that courts must determine both whether the plaintiff spoke on a matter of public concern and whether he or she spoke as a private citizen. Moreover, in Weintraub, we plainly rejected the notion that one is necessarily speaking as a private citizen when acting in his or her union capacity. Because the specific question of whether the plaintiff's alleged union remarks were protected by the First Amendment was not beyond debate at the time of Moran and Mueller's alleged retaliation against Montero, nor does Clue hold otherwise, we conclude as a matter of law that under the claims as pled by Montero, these defendants are protected from liability by qualified immunity.")

Hancock v. County of Rensselaer, 882 F.3d 58, 61, 69 (2d Cir. 2018) ("[W]e find that even individuals with non-stigmatizing medical conditions have a right to privacy in their medical records, even if their interest in privacy might be less. We REMAND this case back to the district court for further proceedings consistent with this analysis, including a consideration of whether qualified immunity might apply. . . .Because the district court found that Appellants did not have claims under the Fourteenth Amendment, it did not have to pass on whether the individual Appellees were entitled to qualified immunity from those claims. In remanding the case, we instruct the court to determine whether Mahar, Hetman, and/or Young are entitled to it. . . We note that on a summary judgment motion, facts are to be interpreted most favorably to non-movants, i.e. Appellants in this case. We have just discussed how their version of the facts plausibly alleges a violation of a constitutional right. That leaves only the question of whether that right was clearly established at the time of the alleged violation, keeping in mind that qualified immunity law does not require a case on point concerning the exact permutation of facts that state actors confront in order to establish a clear standard for their behavior.")

Crawford v. Cuomo, 721 F. App'x 57, ___ (2d Cir. 2018 ("Plaintiffs first argue that the violative nature of Prindle's conduct was clearly established by Boddie v. Schnieder, where we stated that 'sexual abuse of a prisoner by a corrections officer may in some circumstances violate the prisoner's right to be free from cruel and unusual punishment.'. . This argument is not persuasive. Although Boddie held that inmate sexual abuse could, in principle, violate the Eighth Amendment, it concluded that a 'small number of incidents in which [the plaintiff] allegedly was verbally harassed, touched, and pressed against without his consent' were insufficient to state a claim. . . Contrary to plaintiffs' argument, the allegations we considered in Boddie are quite similar to the allegations here. A reasonable officer could therefore have believed that the sexual abuse here alleged, even if it might violate state criminal law or subject him to tort liability, did not violate the Eighth Amendment. At a minimum, any constitutional distinction between this case and Boddie was not clearly established in March 2011. . . .Plaintiffs next argue that, in 2011, out-of-circuit authorities 'clearly foreshadow[ed]' our holding in Crawford I that Prindle's actions violated the Constitution. . . We disagree. Although some other courts had described an inmate's right to be free of sexual abuse in admirably clear, broad terms, . . . '[t]he dispositive question is whether the violative nature of the particular conduct is clearly established,'. . . and out-of-circuit authority was, at the time, sharply divided on whether abuse comparable to Prindle's was cruel and unusual.")

Almighty Supreme Born Allah v. Milling, 876 F.3d 48, 56-59 (2d Cir. 2017) ("[W]e agree with the district court that Allah's substantive due process rights were violated when he was assigned to Administrative Segregation in October 2010 while a pretrial detainee. Although prison officials are to be afforded deference in matters of institutional security, such deference does not relieve officials from the requirements of due process or permit them to institute restrictive measures on pretrial detainees that are not reasonably related to legitimate governmental purposes. . . Here, in assigning Allah to Administrative Segregation in October 2010, prison officials made no individualized assessment whatsoever of the risk that Allah posed to institutional security. Instead, they placed Allah in Administrative Segregation solely on the basis of his prior assignment to (and failure to complete) the Administrative Segregation program during a prior term of incarceration, consistent with their practice of doing so for any such inmate, unless he or she had nearly completed all three phases of the program or more than five years had elapsed since the inmate's prior term of incarceration. . . That practice may serve as a useful rule of thumb for determining when an inmate who has previously been identified as a security risk is sufficiently rehabilitated, such that prison officials may want to consider whether he or she should re-enter the general prison population. We do not quarrel with the proposition that such rules of thumb may often be appropriate in guiding the many day-to-day decisions that prison officials must make to safeguard institutional security. But when such rules of thumb are applied inflexibly to justify severe restrictions on pretrial detainees at the expense of any meaningful consideration of whether those restrictions are justified by a legitimate governmental purpose, due process concerns come into play. Here, prison officials adhered reflexively to a practice that did not allow for individualized consideration of Allah's circumstances and that required him to be placed in Administrative Segregation regardless of his actual threat, if any, to institutional security. On that basis, Allah was isolated in his cell for up to 23 hours a day; required for months to wear restraints whenever out of his cell, including when showering; allowed very limited opportunities to see his family; and subjected to the numerous other restrictions described above. . . .We agree that Wolfish and its progeny put prison officials on notice that pretrial detainees have a substantive due process right not to be subjected to restrictions amounting to punishment. But just as '[t]he general proposition, for example, that an unreasonable search or seizure violates the Fourth Amendment is of little help in determining whether the violative nature of particular conduct is clearly established,'. . . the general principle articulated in Wolfish does not clearly establish that a substantive due process violation would result from Allah's placement in Administrative Segregation based solely on his prior assignment to (and failure to complete) that program. Nor does Allah identify any other case law that would have placed Defendants on notice that their conduct violated substantive due process.")

Almighty Supreme Born Allah v. Milling, 876 F.3d 48, 60, 62-63 (2d Cir. 2017) (Pooler, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part, and dissenting from the judgment) ("I concur with the majority's holding that Allah's constitutional rights were violated when prison officials failed to consider whether he posed a risk to the institution before placing him in extended solitary confinement. I would additionally hold, however, that the restraints imposed in this case were unconstitutional as a response to the minimal infraction Allah committed. And I would not afford the defendants qualified immunity for having imposed the restraints. . . . In light of the similarity of Allah's conditions to the Supreme Court's example in Wolfish, and in light of the lack of legitimate government interest in instituting those conditions, I would not afford the defendants qualified immunity. Accordingly, I dissent from the portion of the majority's opinion granting immunity to the officials and from its disposition reversing the judgment below.")

Brown v. City of New York, 862 F.3d 182, 190-92 (2d Cir. 2017) ("On the uncontested facts and the two facts that it presumed in Brown's favor, the District Court held that the officers were shielded from liability by their qualified immunity. We agree. As instructed by the Supreme Court, we are 'not to define clearly established law at a high level of generality,'. . . and we consider, as we must, the particular circumstances in which the force was used in effecting Brown's arrest. The force applied, which was the repeated use of pepper spray, the kicking of Brown's legs out from under her to bring her to the ground, and Plevritis's using his hand to push Brown's face onto the pavement, occurred after Brown refused to comply with the instructions to place her hands behind her back for handcuffing. During her noncompliance with the instructions, she was warned prior to each application of the pepper spray. The issue presented, therefore, is whether, under clearly established law, every reasonable officer would have concluded that these actions violated Brown's Fourth Amendment rights in the particular circumstance presented by the uncontested facts and the facts presumed in Brown's favor. Here, those circumstances involved a person's repeatedly refusing to follow the instructions of police officers who were attempting to apply handcuffs to accomplish an arrest. No precedential decision of the Supreme Court or this Court 'clearly establishes' that the actions of Naimoli or Plevritis, viewed in the circumstances in which they were taken, were in violation of the Fourth Amendment. The excessive force cases on which Brown relies do not suffice for this purpose. . . .There is some tension in this Court's case law concerning whether out-of-circuit precedent can ever clearly establish law in this Circuit. Compare Pabon v. Wright, 459 F.3d 241, 255 (2d Cir. 2006), with Garcia v. Does, 779 F.3d 84, 95 n.12 (2d Cir. 2015). Even assuming that such precedent may suffice in certain circumstances, however, we conclude that no such circumstances exist in this case. This is not a case, for example, 'where the law was established in three other circuits and the decisions of our own court foreshadowed' the establishment of the rule of law on which Brown seeks to rely. . . Similarly, we must reject Brown's argument that summary judgment on qualified immunity grounds was improper because the officers allegedly violated the New York City Police Department Patrol Guide directive not to use pepper spray from a distance of less than three feet. Our presuming in Brown's favor the disputed fact as to the distance the officers maintained, as the District Court did, does not change our conclusion. Brown is unable to demonstrate that any administering of pepper spray at a distance of as short as one foot upon an uncooperative arrestee violated 'clearly established' Fourth Amendment law against excessive force. Brown argues that the two officers 'were not entitled to qualified immunity since they violated clearly established law by using substantial and unnecessary force to arrest Ms. Brown when she posed no threat to the officers or others, and there were less aggressive techniques to arrest her for a noncriminal and slight offense.'. . . Her argument is grounded in the Graham factors, but this Court already has concluded that these factors 'would seem to point toward a determination of excessive force,'. . . in concluding that a jury possibly could find the force used against Brown to have exceeded that permitted under the Fourth Amendment. Her positing that she posed no threat and that less forceful methods existed to accomplish her arrest is not directed to the inquiry we must make as to qualified immunity. Again, that inquiry is whether every reasonable police officer would view the force used by Naimoli and Plevritis, in the circumstances in which that force was applied, as excessive according to clearly established law.")

Johnson v. Perry, 859 F.3d 156, 175-77 (2d Cir. 2017) ("Johnson has not called to our attention any case in which a parent has been held to have a First Amendment right to unlimited access to school property. Given the responsibility of school officials to prevent 'the kind of boisterous and threatening conduct' that would interrupt the 'peace and quiet' and 'disturb[ ] the tranquility' required for the academic aspects of a school's functions, . . . we cannot conclude that a parent has a general and unlimited First Amendment right of access to school property. To the extent that Perry banned Johnson from Capital Prep property for purposes other than attendance at sporting events, we conclude that Perry should have been granted summary judgment on the basis of qualified immunity for that aspect of Johnson's First Amendment claim. . . . As indicated in Part II.C. above, unless there is a clear and present danger of disruptions such as disorder, riot, obstruction of the event, or immediate threat to public safety, the school may regulate access to its gymnasium when it is being used as a limited public forum only if its restrictions are reasonable and viewpoint-neutral. The version of the events proffered by Johnson, with the record taken in the light most favorable to him, would permit a rational juror to find that Perry's ban of Johnson from Capital Prep basketball games was neither viewpoint-neutral nor reasonable. The jury could permissibly find that Perry had repeatedly bullied JD, that Perry had falsely denied bullying her and maligned her, and that Johnson had vehemently complained of the bullying and the falsehoods. The jury could further infer that Johnson presented no threat of disruption or of harm to anyone--nor even any specter of intimidation, his daughter having already withdrawn from the varsity team before imposition of the ban--and that Perry's motive in banning Johnson from the Capital Prep limited public forum was to punish him for having expressed his views that Perry had engaged in bullying and falsification. . . . We also conclude, in light of the authorities discussed in Part II.C. above, that the right not to be excluded, based on viewpoint differences or because of possible annoyance, from sports events to which the public was invited was clearly established. Perry's motion for summary judgment was properly denied as to this aspect of Johnson's First Amendment claim. . . Finally, we can see no basis for Perry's claim of qualified immunity with respect to his ban against Johnson's attendance at school sports events held beyond school property. First, the distinction between school regulations applicable on school property and those targeting events beyond school property is one that other Circuits, in assessing whether school authorities' restrictions violated First Amendment rights, had found important, and indeed dispositive. . . .Second, the state championship basketball game from which Perry had Johnson removed was held not only off Capital Prep property but in a stadium at the Mohegan Sun casino, a venue that was privately owned. Persons attending sports events there are invitees of the owner. 'First Amendment protections ... are especially strong where an individual engages in speech activity from his or her own private property,' Papineau, 465 F.3d at 56, or on private property on which the individual is an invitee.")

Estate of Devine v. Fusaro, 676 F. App'x 61, (2d Cir. 2017) ("Even when we view the record in the light most favorable to the Estate, we conclude, as the district court did, that Defendants are entitled to qualified immunity because the asserted right, i.e., Devine's right to be free from less-than-lethal force in the circumstances, was not clearly established in the described circumstances. As the district court observed, three undisputed facts support that conclusion: (1) the police used force designed to be less-than-lethal, rather than deadly; (2) they used such force against a man reasonably believed to be suicidal and armed with a loaded gun while occupying public property; and (3) they used such force only after several hours of a standoff and negotiations that had not convinced Devine to surrender his gun. . . .We accept as true the Estate's assertion that an interval of several minutes passed between the two rounds of rubber baton projectiles fired by Defendants, during which Devine stated, '[W]hat are you doing? ... You guys are going to make me do this[.]'. . But the Estate points to no law clearly establishing that, following such a statement, the firing of a second round of rubber batons in a less-than-lethal manner violated Devine's clearly established constitutional right to be free from excessive force. We acknowledge the tragic circumstances of this case; nevertheless, because the law afforded the defendant officers no 'fair and clear warning' that their conduct might violate Devine's constitutional rights, we affirm the qualified-immunity-based judgment.")
